And I may say without fear of contradiction that it has endeavored to reduce every estimate submitted to the fullest extent possible consistent with a proper administration of governmental affairs. This bill has my hearty and cordial approval. I propose, with your indulgence, to discuss for a little while the general budget of estimates which has been submitted by the Director of the Budget through the President under the budget law. In transmitting the estimates to Congress the President adopts and makes a part of his message the report of the Director of the Budget. In view of the widely published claims that the present administration has adopted a program of strict economy and that great reductions in governmental expenditures have been made, I think it entirely proper in the interest of truth and in order that the exact facts be known to compare the estimates for appropriations for the fiscal year 1923 with the appropriations actually made for the fiscal year 1922. And let it be understood that I take these figures from the report which the President transmitted to Congress, for the law required the President to transmit the actual appropriations for 1922 along with his estimate for the fiscal year 1923. They are his figures or the figures of his Bureau of the Budget, not mine, and will be found in the report which he adopted and made a part of his message. The estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1923, including the Postal Service, amounts to $3,809,413,659.53. The actual appropriations for the fiscal year 1922 amount to $3,771,900,514. In other words, the estimates for 1923 are $37,513,145.52 more than the appropriations actually made for the present fiscal year 1922. Or, if you exclude the Postal Service, which is payable from postal revenue, the estimates for 1923 exceed the appropriations for 1922 by $35,367,631.52.

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], in the course of his remarks, referred to the fact that quite recently a deficiency appropriation was made for the present fiscal year of $65,000,000, and that in all probability additional deficiency appropriations will be necessary before the end of the fiscal year.

I am speaking of appropriations which were made for 1922 under the estimate submitted at that time, because I do not think that it is too much to say that in 1923 there will be deficiency appropriations just as deficiency appropriations have been required for this year and preceding years. And let it be remembered that the appropriations for 1922 carry $35,000,000 for a bonus to civil-service employees which is not included in the estimates for 1923. The estimates for 1923 carry $28,035,138.94 less than was appropriated for 1922 for the War Department, made possible by the action of Congress in reducing the Army. They carry $23,457,500 less for the Shipping Board, due to the fact that it was necessary to complete the construction of a number of merchant ships this year, whereas there will be no construction in the year 1923. They carry $18,603,400 less for payments on principal of public debt than was appropriated for the present fiscal year 1922. If these items are considered and added to the $37,000,000 which I first mentioned, and I think it fair to do so, because the reductions are not due to the economy or any action of the President or his Bureau of the Budget, but are made unnecessary for 1923 by action of Congress, then it will be found that the estimates for appropriations for the fiscal year 1923 for other purposes exceed the actual appropriations made for the present fiscal year 1922 by over $142,000,000.

But let us examine for a moment the figures presented by the President as to the estimated expenditures for 1923 as compared with the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year now in progress and the actual expenditures for the fiscal year 1921. It should be stated that the Postal Service expenditures, amounting to more than $575,000,000, are not included in these figures, inasmuch as they are paid out of postal revenues, the estimated deficit in the Postal Service only being figured in as a part of the expenditures.

It is shown that the total estimated expenditures for 1923, exclusive of Postal Service, are $3,505,754,727, and the estimated total expenditures for the present fiscal year 1922 are $3,967,922,366, while the actual expenditures for the fiscal year 1921 were $5,538,040,689.30, or, as stated by the President in his message transmitting the estimates, the estimated ordinary expenditures for 1923 are $447,704,239 less than the estimated ordinary expenditures for 1922, and $1,961,241,921.20 less than the actual ordinary expenditures for 1921. Or, if the transactions in the principal of the public debt and investment of trust funds are included, they are $462,167,639 less than 1922 and $2,032,285,962.30 less than 1921. It is claimed that these figures show great economy and a close paring of the expenses of the Government by the Bureau of the Budget, acting under the immediate direction and authority of the President. But let us analyze some of the items of expenditure and see whether there has been any such real reduction as would appear from the face of the figures presented. It has been said that figures will not lie, but they can sometimes be so juggled as to conceal the real truth or mislead by failing to present all the facts necessary to a full understanding.

Let us first compare the estimated expenditures for 1923 with the actual expenditures for 1921, and then with the estimated expenditures for 1922. There was expended in 1921 on railroad claims and other expenses growing out of the Government control of railroads the sum of $730,711,669.98. There is no estimate for the expenditure of any sum for this purpose for the year 1923. As is well known, the amounts needed for this purpose in 1923 will be taken care of in another way under the transportation act. There was expended in 1921 for the War Department the sum of $1,101,615,013.32, as against the estimated sum of $369,902,107 for 1923, or a difference of $731,712,906.32, made possible, as we all know, by a material reduction of the Army by act of Congress from what it was during the years immediately following the war.

There was spent in 1921 for the Navy Department the sum of $650,373,835.58, and it is estimated there will be spent for this purpose in 1923 the sum of $431,754,000, a difference of $218,519,835.58, made possible solely by act of Congress in reducing the Navy from what it was immediately following the war and by a reduction of the naval construction program.

There was expended in 1921 for the purchase of obligations of foreign Governments the sum of $73,806,697.44 and $16,781,320.79 for the purchase of farm-loan bonds in order to enable the Farm Loan Board to function, and $922,593.14 by way of unclassified repayments, and more than $35,000,000 by way of bonus to civil-service employees. These were all necessary expenditures for 1921. It is not estimated or contemplated that any sum for any of these purposes will be spent in the year 1923.

There was expended in 1921 for the Shipping Board, largely for construction purposes, the sum of $130,723,268.26, whereas only $50,495,735 is estimated for expenditures during 1923, a difference of $80,227,535.26 arising out of the construction of merchant ships in 1921, all of which will have been completed by 1923.

There were a number of war activities, like the Food and Fuel Administration, War Finance, Grain Corporation, War Trade Board, and the like, growing out of war, which it had not been possible to fully wind up in 1921. There was expended in that year on independent offices of this kind the sum of $83,596,418.52. The estimated expenditures for 1923 are $17,034,583, a difference of $66,561,835.52, made possible by the closing of most of these offices five years after the war.

It is perfectly clear that none of the various sums which I have mentioned as having been spent in 1921, but which will not be spent in 1923, can be credited as an economy to either the administration or Congress. They were expenses growing out of the war which had not been dispensed with in 1921, but which no one would suggest should be carried on in 1923, five years after the war closed.

These sums aggregate the sum of $1,954,244,394.03. If this is deducted from the $2,032,285,962.30, which the President is so careful to point out as the difference between the actual expenditures in 1921 and the estimated expenditures for 1923, and which he claims shows economy on the part of his administration, it will be found there is a real bona fide reduction for governmental activities in operations in 1921 and in 1923 of only $82,041,568.27, or a reduction of only about 2 per cent, which I submit is a very poor showing of economy, and a very poor compliance with the pledges made to the people when it is remembered that in 1921 it was not humanly possible to wholly get away from the enormous expenditures incident to the war. It is high time now that war expenditures should be cut out and our Government get back to a peace basis of expenditure. It would not be unfair to contrast the estimated expenditures for 1923, five years after the war, amounting to $4,081,992,793, including the Postal Service, with the expenditures in 1916, the last year before the war, under a Democratic administration and Congress, and which amounted to $1,114,937,012.32, or, in other words, an excess for 1923 of nearly $27 for each man, woman, and child in the entire country.

Now, I do not mean to say that it will ever be possible, or certainly not for years to come, to get back to the expenditures of 1916. New activities have been taken on, and the Government has engaged in many things that it was not engaged in at that time. We have, of course, the interest on a large public debt to take care of, and things of that sort, but I do contend that five years after the war this Government ought to be getting back nearer to what was expended before the war. And certainly no claim, no just claim, for economy can be made when we are spending, as it is proposed to expend in 1923, an excess of nearly $27 for every man, woman, and child in the country over and above what was spent in 1916.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. OLIVER. Your study of this question, then, suggests there is justification for the comment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the pretended economy of the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There certainly is; and I propose to refer very shortly to the work of the Bureau of the Budget in connection with the estimates submitted.

Mr. BRIGGS. I would like to ask the gentleman to explain at that time, if he can, also the reason for the difference in the bill as reported and the estimates given by the Bureau of the Budget, which proposed to hold the amounts down to the minimum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will be glad to do so.

An analysis of the estimated expenditures for the year 1922 and 1923 show similar results, and an equal and utter failure of the present administration to reduce expenditures for next year from what they are this year, as was solemnly promised the people in the last campaign.

The reductions are $337,679,235, which will be paid to the railroads this year, but which will be taken care of in another way next year: $47,096,000 for the Navy Department; $19,189,299 for the War Department; $23,415,246 for the Shipping Board, and $35,000,000 for the bonus to civilian employees; or an aggregate of $461,380,880. And, mind you, all of these reductions are not due to any economy on the part of the Bureau of the Budget or on the part of the administration. They follow necessarily as the result of the action taken by Congress.

When this sum is deducted from the sum of $462,167,629, by which amount the President boasts the estimated expenditures for 1923 have been reduced from those of 1922, there is left the exceedingly small sum of $786,759, or less than one-fifth of 1 per cent reduction in expenditures as estimated for activities which will be carried on in both the year 1922 and the year 1923. So we see, Mr. Chairman, that while there may be a reduction in expenditures in 1923 from those of 1921 and 1922, such reduction is the natural result of getting further away from the war, and not due to any contemplated economy on the part of the administration. On the contrary, an examination of the estimates will show that an increase is contemplated in many departments of the Government.

These are the first estimates submitted under the budget law. That law was designed to effect economy and cut the expenses of the Government to the lowest possible minimum consistent with proper administration. It makes the President directly responsible to Congress and to the country for the estimates submitted, and provides him with proper machinery to secure full information in order to revise and reduce the expenses of the Government and discharge the responsibility resting upon him. The law as enacted is full and complete, but its administration, as disclosed by the first estimates submitted under it, must prove a severe disappointment to those who labored so earnestly for its passage.

No better illustration of the failure to meet the expectation of the advocates of this law in the reduction of estimates can be shown than in the pending bill. The estimates for the Treasury Department for 1923 were $136,381,551.29. This sum was approved by the Bureau of the Budget and the President, and Congress was asked to appropriate that amount. But your Committee on Appropriations, after full hearings, came to the very clear conclusion that they should be reduced in the sum of $12,491,713.38, or nearly 10 per cent, and they have so recommended; and if this bill is passed as reported there will be appropriated for the Treasury Department the sum of $118,610,959.81, instead of the sum asked for by the President.

Even this is not getting back to anything like prewar expenditures, nor is it a real reduction from the appropriations for 1922 when all the facts are considered, for while it is $17,565,477.48 less, it must be remembered that the appropriations for 1922 carried $18,500,000 for hospitals for disabled soldiers, an item which is not carried in this bill. Leave out this item—and it should be done, for it was for a special emergency and not an ordinary activity of the Treasury Department—and it will be found that the amount carried in this bill exceeds the appropriations for 1922 for similar purposes by about three-quarters of a million dollars.

The figures cited show that there has not been that reduction in the ordinary expenditures of the Government which was promised an overburdened taxpaying public. The only savings result from the elimination of certain war-time activities, which should have been eliminated years ago, and for the failure to do so the majority party must be held responsible, for it has had control of both branches of Congress since March 4, 1919.

I dare say the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], after the appropriation bills have been passed and before the conclusion of the session, will follow his usual custom of making an address to the Congress and the country in which he will claim great economy in the appropriations made, basing his statement on the fact that we are not spending as much in 1923 as we were two or three years after the war had come to a close and when the Government was burdened with certain hang-over war expenditures. But I wish to suggest to the gentleman that when he makes that address not to deal with glittering generalities but that he analyze the figures presented in the budget for the various departments of the Government.

Although what may be called the ordinary expenses of the Government increased to an enormous extent as a necessary result of the war, I challenge anyone to show by an analysis of the detailed estimates contained in this budget that there has been a reduction in the ordinary expenses of the Government. On the contrary, such an analysis will show an increase, as is clear from the budget estimates, which exceed the appropriations for 1922 over $37,000,000, notwithstanding the elimination of a number of war activities. It is not the fault of the budget law, which met with the approval not only of Members on both sides of the Chamber but also of everyone throughout the country who had been advocating budget legislation during previous years. In the last analysis, practically all a budget law can do is to fix definitely the responsibility upon those who are charged with the duty of presenting estimates for appropriations to Congress and to provide the proper working force and machinery for the discharge of that responsibility. This is what the budget law does. For the first time the President is made directly responsible for the estimates submitted. If, therefore, the estimates as submitted are extravagant or greater than the public need demands, the administration can not escape its responsibility.

Section 202 of the budget law provides:

> If the estimated receipts for the ensuing fiscal year contained in the budget, on the basis of laws existing at the time the budget is transmitted plus the estimated amounts in the Treasury at the close of the fiscal year in progress available for expenditure in the ensuing fiscal year are less than the estimated expenditures for the ensuing fiscal year contained in the budget, the President in the budget shall make recommendations to Congress for new taxes, loans, or other appropriate action to meet the estimated deficiency.

The President reports that there will be a deficit, or an excess of estimated expenditures over estimated revenues for the present fiscal year of $24,468,703 and for the fiscal year 1923 of $167,571,977. I respectfully submit that the President has failed to comply with the express requirement of this law in advising Congress as to how this deficit may be provided for.

Let me read all he says on the subject. He says this:

> For the purpose of providing a portion of the funds necessary to balance the budget for 1923, in which the estimated expenditures exceed the estimated receipts by the sum of approximately $150,000,000—

It is over $167,000,000—

> I recommend the following legislation in connection with the naval appropriation bill for 1923, which would result in the eventual automatic release of $100,000,000 now held in the naval supply account of the Navy Department:
> "Hereafter, until the naval supply account shall have been reduced to a maximum sum of $150,000,000, which shall not thereafter be exceeded, one-half of all reimbursements otherwise due to the naval supply account, whether from current issues or from sales, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and only one-half shall be credited to the naval supply account."

As you know, the naval stores supply amounts to $250,000,000. The President has recommended that it be reduced to $150,000,000. resulting in a saving of $100,000,000; but it will be saved over a period of years and there will be nothing like $100,000,000 saved during the fiscal year 1923 to take care of the deficit which he says will exist.

Now, what does he say further?

> With continued pressure for economy in all departments and the passage of such legislation the balancing of total receipts and total expenditures for the fiscal years 1922 and 1923 should be accomplished.

Now, if that statement had been made by any person other than the President of the United States I should have called it ridiculous, but I have too high a regard for the President personally, and also as Chief Executive of the Nation, to apply that description to it. But the President is in the position of coming to Congress and solemnly saying that Congress must appropriate a certain amount of money for 1923 to meet the positive needs of the Government, and in the same message he tells Congress, in effect, that if it will reduce those estimates then this deficit which he has estimated can be taken care of.

If the President of the United States knew where those estimates could be reduced it was his duty under the plain provision of the law to have told the Congress and your committee just how the reduction could be made. More than that, he should not have asked Congress to appropriate more than is actually needed for the economical administration of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In the report of the Director of the Budget does he undertake to discuss what you describe in the statement issued by your committee as the permanent and indefinite appropriations, and does he undertake to advise whether or not they are capable of reduction?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The President does not in his message, but my recollection is that the Director of the Budget does take the position that these continuing appropriations or indefinite appropriations should be discontinued, and that there should be a repeal of many of the appropriations to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As it caught my attention in looking at this very interesting statement, something like 40 per cent of the annual appropriations are of that character which you describe as continuing appropriations, and what are stated in the statement to be permanent or indefinite appropriations. In other words, something like 40 per cent of the appropriations every year are not made upon an annual basis, but are made in statutes that run indefinitely. That is correct, is it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure the gentleman has investigated sufficiently to be accurate as to the percentage. I do not recall the exact figures, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], chairman of the committee, has stated that it is his firm purpose to later on bring in a bill which will repeal appropriations of that character just so far as it can properly be done. Of course we all realize that it ought to be done in the interest of economy and good government and efficient government, because Congress should have an opportunity to pass upon these appropriations year by year, and that, of course, can only be done by a submission of the estimates and the making of annual appropriations.

Mr. MANN. That 40 per cent, however, includes the interest on the public debt and the sinking fund. What is the occasion for making an annual appropriation for the payment of the interest on the public debt? Can anybody see any reason for that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I see no particular reason for that, because, of course, that is a fixed sum and must be appropriated and paid by the Government.

Mr. MANN. Or the sinking fund.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Except to inform Congress and the country as to just how much interest we are paying from year to year.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing that that be done.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But there are many other appropriations that ought to be made annually instead of indefinitely.

Mr. MANN. I know, but when a man talks about 40 per cent it sounds large; but when the first item is more than 25 per cent what is left does not sound so big.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The deficit as estimated by the President for 1922 will be over $24,000,000. Since then Congress at the earnest request of the President has passed a bill appropriating $20,000,000 for Russian relief. True, that sum is to be paid out of funds belonging to the United States Grain Corporation; $7,000,000 of the funds belonging to that corporation are now in the Treasury, and when they are drawn out to make that payment it will necessarily increase the deficit estimated to that extent. And in addition thereto the United States Grain Corporation, I understand, has something over $12,000,000 to its credit outside of the Treasury of the United States, which if it had not been applied to that particular appropriation would have eventually been covered into the Treasury and served to reduce the deficit to that extent.

There is a further request of Congress to appropriate $11,500,000 for the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal from a private operating company, the principal stockholders of which, I am told, are New York capitalists. The plain letter of the law was not complied with as to either of these requests. Now, let me read from section 202 of the budget law:

SEC. 202. (a) If the estimated receipts for the ensuing fiscal year contained in the budget, on the basis of laws existing at the time the budget is transmitted, plus the estimated amounts in the Treasury at the close of the fiscal year in progress, available for expenditure in the ensuing fiscal year, are less than the estimated expenditures for the ensuing fiscal year contained in the budget, the President in the budget shall make recommendations to Congress for new taxes, loans, or other appropriate action to meet the estimated deficiency.

In other words, when the supplemental requests or estimates are such as to cause a deficit it was the duty of the President under the law to have told Congress how the money was to be derived, whether by taxation or loan. That plain provision of the law has not been complied with.

The budget law abolished the position of Comptroller of the Treasury and the six auditors of the Treasury and created the position of Comptroller General of the United States, who is charged with all the duties formerly performed by those officers whose position were abolished. But he is charged with additional duties, the strict performance of which are absolutely essential to a well-rounded and effective budget system. I read from section 312 of the budget law, page 7:

SEC. 312. (a) The Comptroller General shall investigate, at the seat of government or elsewhere, all matters relating to the receipt, disbursement, and application of public funds, and shall make to the President when requested by him, and to Congress at the beginning of each regular session, a report in writing of the work of the General Accounting Office, containing recommendations concerning the legislation he may deem necessary to facilitate the prompt and accurate rendition and settlement of accounts and concerning such other matters relating to the receipt, disbursement, and application of public funds as he may think advisable. In such regular report, or in special reports at any time when Congress is in session, he shall make recommendations looking to greater economy or efficiency in public expenditures.

There has been no effort to comply with this express requirement. No report has been submitted; Congress has received no information. So far as known, he has only performed the duties of former auditors whose positions were abolished. So far as we know, the Comptroller General is only engaged in auditing the expenses of the Government, and no effort has been made to comply with the strict requirements of the law, which placed on him the duty to make a report to Congress and make recommendations to Congress looking to greater economy and efficiency in public expenditures as a result of his investigations. It was understood that when the Comptroller General was appointed and the budget law went into effect the Comptroller General or some of his officers would sit in with the various subcommittees on appropriations and give them information as to the expenditures of the various departments when it came to making up future appropriations for the departments.

I submit that up to this time, although the law was passed early in June, 1921, there has been a total failure on his part to comply with what I conceive to be one of the most important functions of the office of the Comptroller General, and which was emphasized by all of those who spoke on the subject when the bill was pending. He either does not know his duties or he has chosen to ignore them. Unless he performs this service, there was no reason to do away with the Comptroller of the Treasury and the six auditors, unless it was to provide him with a job at a fat salary and a long tenure.

I have not referred to this for the purpose of making captious criticism of anyone, although any official who ignores the plain letter of the law is deserving of censure. I have referred to it solely for the purpose of emphasizing the importance and necessity on the part of every official, whether high or low, to strictly comply with the provisions of the budget law, and with the hope that there may be a more faithful administration of it in the future. Laws are passed to be observed and obeyed, not to be ignored, and if the budget law is to be ignored or disregarded by any official upon whom it places responsibility, then the efforts of those who so earnestly worked for its passage will have been in vain, for it soon will become a dead letter. The budget law was designed to effect economy and promote efficiency in government, but this will not be accomplished unless it is faithfully administered. No law, however salutary, is worth the paper on which it is written unless it is properly administered, and I am anxious that this great legislative reform shall not be emasculated at the outset by the ignoring of any of its provisions, either by the executive or the legislative departments of our Government.

The majority leader, the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming, has several times boasted of the passage of the budget and has claimed for his party the credit for its enactment at the last session, notwithstanding it was earnestly supported by Democrats as well as by Republicans. He is to be excused for that, because it is about the only thing of genuine constructive importance which was done at the last session of Congress.

But let me say to him that while both the Republicans and Democrats voted for it, its administration rests entirely with his party, and if through faulty administration the law shall fail to accomplish the objects for which it was passed, then the people will hold his party responsible. In my judgment, by far the most important question which confronts Congress to-day is the reduction of governmental expenditures. The people are being taxed to death. They have been promised economy, but what they desire is more practice and less preaching. It has been repeatedly asserted that there have been great reductions, but that fact can only be demonstrated by a reduction of taxes, and this has not been done except as to the larger incomes and excess profits.

The man of moderate means has been given little if any relief, and even now there is a formidable movement for a sales tax, which is nothing more nor less than an effort to further increase the burdens of the masses of the people in order to relieve the large fortunes of the country. Basing my statement on the estimates submitted, little relief in the way of reduction of expenditures is to be expected except through Congress, and more particularly through the House of Representatives, which, after all, has been the one branch of the Government upon whom the people could rely in the last analysis for the practice of economy. It is to be hoped that the estimates as submitted will be greatly reduced, but in doing so let me express the hope that the reductions will not be made with the mental reservation that the appropriations now asked will be granted in full during the next fiscal year and after the election through the medium of deficiency appropriation bills. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to discuss this bill nor take up much of the time of the House, but in the beginning of the new year I am going to take this opportunity, without complaint or criticism of anyone, to mention a few things that I want to see. I speak as a Member of the House, who holds no brief for anybody, who asks no favors of anybody, and whose sole purpose is to be of some public use.

Between now and March 27 I want to see the appropriation bills reported to the House on schedule time and promptly considered and passed, putting the House on record in favor of an early adjournment of the Congress. [Applause.] I want to see a Republican House sustain a Republican President, whose every act since his inaugural has shown his unselfishness and his absolute devotion to his country. [Applause on the Republican side.] I want to see the legislative program of the administration enacted into law at the earliest possible moment providing a substantial foundation for the revival of business and the return of general prosperity. [Applause on the Republican side.] I want to see a Republican House, with a majority materially greater than the Democratic membership, sustain Republican policies through party solidarity, enforced if necessary by party discipline, in order that a small Democratic minority may not continue to control a Republican House and inflict upon the people its pernicious nostrums for public ills. Lastly, I want to see public expenditures pared to reasonable necessities. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If we do these things we can rest assured of the election of a Republican House in November, which will mean the continuance of economical and efficient government, continued reduction in public expenditures, and the consequent continued reduction in the burdens of taxation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In conclusion I want to suggest a few things to remember.

Let us remember that this is a government of parties, not of men, and that great reforms can be instituted and carried to completion only through party solidarity. Let us remember that since the election of Lincoln the history of this country, in no small degree, is the record of achievements of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Republican side.] However, let us always remember that this is an age of progress, that we can not rest upon the achievements of the past but must gird up our loins to meet and solve satisfactorily the great problems of the present and of the future, because only in this way, which is a hard road to travel, requiring ability, intelligence, alertness, capacity for work, and indefatigable industry, can we retain the support and confidence of the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE]. I was particularly struck with his very forceful appeal that a Republican House, with a majority greater than the total Democratic membership, should be disciplined into cohesion, and I thought it worth while, inasmuch as the gentleman from New York did not suggest any plan of discipline, out of consideration to the many Republican friends that I have, to bring to their attention and to the attention of the country one definite plan which has been intimated for disciplining Republican gentlemen and bringing about cohesion.

I chanced to see yesterday an interview in the Baltimore Sun of December 26 last with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who occupies a very responsible position as "coheser" in the Republican organization, being chairman of the Congressional Republican Committee, and who thus is in a particularly favorable situation to exercise certain powers that it is expected might bring about cohesion. It seems to me that somewhere back in the past some gentleman used an expression about "the cohesive power of public plunder." I think this interview perhaps deserves more emphasis and a wider circulation than it has as yet received. I have spoken to several gentlemen who had not heard of it, and I am going to venture to read it:

"It is true," said Representative FESS in discussing the report that plans are under way to bring about greater cohesion among Republicans in Congress through the application of pressure, "that the members of our executive committee have under consideration now a proposal that campaign funds be withheld from Republicans who will not stand with the organization on party measures.

"For the most part," said Mr. FESS, "the Republicans who have voted with the Democrats against party measures come from districts that are either normally Democratic or Republican by small majorities. Their votes in many instances are attributed to a desire to satisfy the Democratic element of their constituencies.

"On the other hand, most of the members of our executive committee come from the big contributing States, like New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Ohio. They do not feel that the funds collected there should be sent into other States to help elect men who will not stand with the party after they have been elected. The question whether these funds shall be withheld in the fights for reelection has not been decided one way or the other as yet."

I do not know whether the remarks of the gentleman from New York made a few moments ago indicates that a decision on this very momentous question is being approached or not. I assume, however, that we shall hear more of this and that a decision will be reached, probably not at a very early date, but reached, ultimately—maybe about the time the tariff bill comes back, or some period about that time. [Laughter and applause on Democratic side.] At any rate, Mr. Chairman, we shall wait with great interest to see what becomes of it. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the President, through the Secretary of Agriculture, has called a national agricultural conference for January 23, with the view of discussing agriculture from every standpoint, and finding remedial measures to meet the present farm situation and to agree upon a permanent policy for developing a self-sustaining agriculture.

Let us hope that practical representative men will participate in this conference and that they will suggest ideas which can be crystallized into law and will give relief to the people.

At this conference we should also have men engaged in allied industries, for instance, transportation, because they dovetail and must be considered together.

My judgment is, however, that we should make use of the information we have already gathered as a result of the investigation made by the joint House and Senate committee, and carry out the sensible and practical views contained in their report issued recently. That would give immediate relief while we go ahead with the conference. Let us consider for a moment some of the recommendations contained in this report.

First. The legalization of cooperating marketing combinations.

Second. The lowering of freight rates.

Third. The establishment of agricultural representatives in the foreign countries.

Fourth. Credit facilities corresponding to the farmer's turnover and having longer maturity, which would enable payment to be made from the proceeds of his farm.

Fifth. The perfection of a warehousing system, which would provide a uniform liability on the part of the warehouse proprietor and in which the moral and financial hazards would be fully insured.

It was suggested in this connection that the States pass uniform laws regulating the liability of warehousemen and the services they render, so that together the Federal Government and the State could give the producers a better system of grading their products, and a warehouse receipt that would permit him to carry on his business with his merchant and banker with more facility than he has now.

This system would not only afford protection to our products from bad weather but would also give us a better rate of insurance.

Sixth. Extension and better supervision of the statistical division of the Department of Agriculture, which would prevent, in my judgment, erroneous crop estimates, which usually fall heavy on the agricultural sections.

This would also promote better record keeping of the cost of producing farm products on the basis of the farm-plant unit and would encourage more efficient methods of farm management.

Seventh. More adequate wholesale terminal facilities, particularly for handling of perishable food at primary markets, and a more thorough organization of the agencies and facilities of distribution in the large consuming centers of the country.

Eighth. Development of better roads to local markets, joint facilities at terminals connecting rail, water, and motor transport systems, and more adequate facilities at shipping points, with a view to reducing the cost of marketing and distribution.

Ninth. Direction of greater effort in the improvement of community life.

This joint House and Senate committee is composed of experienced and practical men who have held long hearings during which representative men from every section of the country were heard, and I submit that the report just issued and those to be made by them in the future be studied very carefully.

One of the most pressing problems mentioned in the report is the one recommending a reduction in freight rates. Those engaged in transportation, as well as the Interstate Commerce Commission, should understand that unless these transportation freight rates are reduced at once, a whole lot of perishable food will rot on the farm, because it is impossible for it to bear the cost of transportation. And the result will be lessened production on the farm, acute suffering in the large consuming centers of the country, and, in the end, loss of business to the railroads.

If you will bear with me one moment I will call your attention to a concrete case on my own farm. I have here an account of a sale made a few days ago, which, I believe, ought to be interesting to the Members representing the consumers in the large cities who complain of the high cost of living, and many of whom hold the producers of the agricultural sections responsible for their suffering.

The best Porto Rican yam sweet potatoes sold at this sale brought 75 cents a barrel. I pay here 5 cents apiece for those potatoes. Blue Rose rice was sold at $2.15 a barrel. This rice retails here for 10 cents a pound. Home-made cane sirup was sold at 40 cents a gallon. Sirup much inferior to it retails here at 25 cents a half pint. The highest offer made for corn was 30 cents a barrel in the shuck, which was not sold. The balance of cotton of 1920, which cost about 28 cents a pound to produce, was sold at 15 cents. The best Lespedeza hay made was sold at 30 cents a bale.

Now, there is a concrete case where every article produced was sold below the cost of production. Therefore you can readily understand that if such a condition continues to exist, with the high rate of taxation, it will be a question of a very short time when the farm will have to go.

We are told to diversify, and we do diversify, but what good does it do to produce an excess of food products on the farm with the view of shipping it to the large centers when the freight rates will cost more than we are paid for the products at home? I repeat, I mention this case of my own, and, of course, that is the case with every other farmer, to give the representatives from the cities a thorough understanding of the situation, so that they will help bring pressure to bear on those engaged in transportation and the Interstate Commerce Commission for lower freight rates if we are to continue to produce.

With farm products selling below the cost of production on the farm, and the exorbitant prices in the cities for food and clothes, how can we expect to get along? It means that the purchasing power of the agricultural section is absolutely destroyed, and, of course, with the purchasing power of so many people destroyed, we must expect millions of people to remain unemployed. The banker, the merchant, and the manufacturer, and those engaged in the professions can not prosper unless those who do business with them can purchase and pay for what they purchase. Then, too, in the cities those who work for wages can hardly make ends meet when they must pay such exorbitant prices.

With such a wide gap existing between the producer and the consumer, efforts must be made to bring them closer together. And we who represent the agricultural sections appeal to those who represent the congested centers to work together and in harmony with the view of correcting whatever evils exist in our system of distribution and marketing.

It is agreed by all that agriculture is the foundation of the industrial pyramid, and yet if there is no change in the drift it is very evident to one who observes that we will soon face the impossible task of making the pyramid stand on its apex.

Why not be practical and learn lessons from the past instead of discussing high-sounding theories? In Russia, for instance, where the government under sovietism attempted to compel the farmers to produce, but keeping only enough for the bare necessities of life and turning the balance into the common fund, it was soon discovered that production was diminished, transportation destroyed, causing people to starve. And to-day Lenin, who is the brain of sovietism, is appealing to Russia to recognize the principle that one must be rewarded for his work if production and business are to return.

Another lesson which can be a warning to us is the case of Austria-Hungary. Following the war the country was divided, and while Austria was left with its universities and Vienna with its bureaucratic center, the headquarters of the great railway administration and the financial and banking heart, it was soon discovered that they could not live because the plains of Hungary, which furnished the foodstuffs for the old Empire, had been taken away from them. If this political disruption was a necessity, it soon became clear that the same did not hold good for its economic organization. None of them could live alone. Each had need of the other for its economic life and development. Therefore, it became necessary to reconstruct economically. The first step was an understanding between the countries. Then came the reorganization of international navigation, and now a commercial agreement has been entered into. When this has been extended, the balance will be restored and they will all prosper together, provided, of course, they go to work, which is very much needed all over the world if we are to return to normal conditions.

No "back-to-the-farm" movement in this or any other country will succeed until the farm is made more attractive, until rural communities offer some of the attractions enjoyed by the people living in the cities. It is vital to the future security of the world that those who labor, whether on the farm or in other fields of industry, should be encouraged to work and economize with the view of owning their homes and raising their families in proper environments, because during this period of unrest, when so many wild theories of government are being preached, it is to those who own their homes and are contented mainly that we must look for the preservation of the Republic.

A good deal has been said recently about a so-called agricultural bloc. I do not know that such a thing really exists, but I do know that this propaganda was started at a time when Members representing agricultural sections began to fight together, regardless of parties, not for favors but for justice for the agricultural sections. For instance, it was made very plain to the manufacturers that the tariff could not be looked upon any longer as a political question but as an economic question, and that when the Government went to the customhouses of the country to collect a duty on imported goods, it made no difference what the duty was called, the protection that resulted from it had to be distributed equally between the producers of agricultural products and the manufacturers, and that the protection must not be to enrich a few at the expense of the many, but to make good the difference between the cost of production in foreign countries where a low standard of living exists, and the cost in America, where we have a higher standard of living, with the view of keeping up our American industries and giving employment to the American people.

It is a pity that those who worry and complain of this so-called agricultural bloc should not worry a little more when they come face to face with blocs seeking special privileges. A representative government is never in danger as a result of conflicts of ideas, ambition, and policy; it is in danger only when those in control ignore the people. Those of us who have made the fight for agriculture on this floor have never asked for special privileges or favors, but we have asked for justice for all the people from all the sections of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. I am wondering whether the gentleman has the items of cost of distribution; the cost, for instance, of sweet potatoes; what is the cost to the provision man and what price he gets from the retailer, and where these costs go.

Mr. LAZARO. Of course we know that the freight rate is quite a factor, but there are middlemen who must be looked after. My understanding is that the Department of Justice right now is investigating this matter with a view of finding out why products are sold so cheaply where they are produced and so dearly where they are consumed.

Now, I take it that we will have a report of that soon and something will be done to eliminate whatever useless men are found in this gap between the producer and the consumer.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAZARO. I will.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Last summer I was informed that watermelons in the South weighing about 30 pounds were put on cars at 8 cents apiece, or $80 a thousand; that the freight on those melons here was about 8 cents, increasing the price of the melons to 16 cents. Those melons were sold at 4 cents a pound, or $1.20, and they made it $1.25 to have round figures. Now, if that information is sound, and I have reason to believe it is, what can we do to correct a situation of that sort? We talk a great deal about it and all want to help, but what can we do to bring about the relief desired?

Mr. LAZARO. Well, my reason for speaking this afternoon and for giving the committee my own experience with the sale of products on my farm and what I was paying for what I consumed was to try to arouse a feeling among the Members, and especially of those who live in the large centers, to see if something can not be done to remedy this situation, because we know that to-day less than half the population of this country reside on the farm, and that they will not continue to produce at a loss, and certainly those who represent the consumers in the large centers must understand that unless something is done to remedy the situation production will diminish, and in the end not only will they have to pay more than they are now paying but there will be acute suffering as a result. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the address of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I was glad when the gentleman [Mr. MADDEN] was elevated to that position, for I knew he had not only the intelligence but I believed the nerve, if I may so express it, the courage to stand by his convictions. We feel that he will in due time earn the title of "watchdog of the Treasury." We have faith and confidence that our great chairman will not be deflected from his main purpose of firm economy in our governmental affairs. And I was delighted to hear the speech of the gentleman on my right [Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee], who very broadly and very patriotically stood up for the budget law and courageously directed public attention to certain infractions of that law. He should be sustained in the position he has taken, and the Congress should insist that the findings of the Budget Commission be adhered to unless on account of conscience we are unable to subscribe to their findings. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] referred to the debts due us by foreign Governments and observed that the House had passed a bill empowering our splendid President and the Treasury Department to refund those debts, put the obligations in negotiable securities, but that the legislation was not yet complete. Out of delicacy he did not advert to the fact that the measure is now held up or slumbering in one of the committees of the body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an article of news which was printed in a recent issue of the Wall Street Journal.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the article in the time of the gentleman.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEWSPAPER SPECIALS.

American Paris dispatch says instruction to French delegates at Washington to stand firm on submarine issue is looked upon in France as hint to America that Hughes's proposals can not stand unless United States makes substantial concessions to Europe. Concessions hoped for include: That American creditors grant long delay to Belgium for payment of her war obligations, in which case Belgium is willing to forfeit 50 per cent of her priority rights to German indemnity in favor of France; that United States forego temporarily claims for payment of expenses of occupation; and that Ambassador Harvey be sent to Cannes meeting of supreme council as plenipotentiary instead of as observer.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, we may or we may not indorse the business policy or subscribe to the political doctrines of the Wall Street Journal, yet I think it is true that the Journal's facilities for gathering the news are of the best and its reports of fact very dependable.

The item just read, although widely circulated, has not been denied. It will be observed that the gist of the dispatch from Paris, France, is to the effect that instructions from the French Government to her delegates now in Washington to stand firmly opposed to the proposition of Secretary Hughes concerning the limitation of undersea craft is to be regarded as a hint to the United States that if the latter shall waive certain rights in respect to claims against Belgium, France, and Germany, then France will yield in respect to the matter of limiting the number of submarines.

The American people have always held France in high esteem, but France has been acting rather strange of late, and by her conduct is jeopardizing the friendship of our people. If France is playing the game ascribed to her she will not be successful. She can pay us what she owes us and go her own way. The conference is dealing with a subject of the very highest importance—one that concerns the saving of perhaps millions of lives and the destiny of the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are those in this country—not many, I am pleased to know, but a few—who are encouraging France and the other nations to whom we have loaned money in the hope and belief that America will cancel such loans. The persons who thus encourage are holding out a false hope; they are doing our debtors, no less than America, a grave injury. As germane to the subject, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an excerpt from a news item which appeared in a recent number of the Washington Post.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the article will be read in the time of the gentleman.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUSTICE CLARKE WANTS WAR LOANS CANCELED—SAYS UNITED STATES SHOULD ACT BOTH FROM FRIENDSHIP AND TO REVIVE WORLD TRADE.

(By the Associated Press.)

CLEVELAND, OHIO, December 27.

That the war loans made by the United States to the Allies should be "promptly and wholly canceled" was urged by Justice John H. Clarke, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in an address at the weekly noonday luncheon of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce to-day.

After stating that the loans aggregated about $9,500,000,000, and with the interest now amounted to $11,000,000,000, Justice Clarke said he would consider the proposal to cancel them first as a matter of friendship for and justice to the nations which risked all with us and sacrificed much more than we did in support of the great common cause, and, second, on the basis of cold, practical business policy.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Gentlemen will note that at the very time when the American delegates at the Arms Limitation Conference were striving with the representatives of foreign powers to come to agreement with reference to limitation of undersea craft, that a member of the Supreme Court of the United States in a public address—that was sent broadcast, all over the world—expressed the opinion—more than that, declared—that it was the duty of America to cancel the war loans of $10,000,000,000 to foreign nations upon the grounds of "friendship and justice," and also as "a good business policy." The reputation of Mr. Justice Clarke, as a citizen and jurist, has never been questioned, and what I am now saying does not in any manner reflect upon his private character or judicial reputation. But it seems to me that the learning and experience of this judge ought to have rendered him the more cautious in taking liberties that have had, in some degree, a direct tendency to encourage France to believe that by holding up the agreement to reduce submarines, she would be able to induce the Government to cancel the vast money debt she owes us.

Mr. Justice Clarke thinks that "justice" requires us to cancel the war debt. I deny that justice requires anything of the sort.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Wait until I conclude.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Since when did England or France become a pauper or an object of charity? We spent nearly as much money in the war as England, although the latter was in it nearly three years before we got in.

Then, we are told that to cancel over $10,000,000,000 debt to our Government, when our Government is indebted to her own people over $20,000,000,000, "would be a good business policy." The fact is we do not want business that bad.

It is said that we ought to forgive this debt to the nations as an act of "friendship." The time has not come when we are required to buy friends with money. France should be our friend forever for what we have already done for her. France has been very exacting with us. She demanded damage for smoking her bridges; rental for ground occupied by our soldiers in the trenches fighting the battles. The vast war supply of goods we let her have at one-fourth their cost—and these she has not paid for—in large proportion were shipped back to America and sold to our people at a price three or four times as great as what she paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think he is aiding these propagandists by placing this statement from Justice Clarke in the RECORD?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. No; I do not. I am warning the American people against such propagandists. Forewarned is forearmed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman extending his remarks? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. It has been calculated that if the Germans were to pay the war indemnities in gold coin it would require 85 railroad trains of 40 cars to the train to haul that gold. Since France will get the lion's share of this gold, there is no reason why she should not pay unto us that which she owes.

Mr. Justice Clarke is not qualified to speak for us on the subject involved, for the reason that he has a life job, drawing an annual salary of $14,500 that can not be diminished during his tenure, and which is not subject to taxes.

The money loaned to the Allies by the Government was the money loaned the Government by the people. And the people—not Mr. Justice Clarke—will have to be taxed to pay the bonds. As a legislative officer and as one of the people whose salary and income will be taxed by governments—national, State, and municipal—I respectfully insist that foreign Governments pay unto us every dollar that we loaned them, and with interest. Propaganda for the cancellation of the war loans should not be tolerated. Alien influences, operating in subtle fashion and covert form, most likely will be brought to bear on America to induce her to cancel the war loans.

Patriotic, courageous Americans should be ever vigilant to discover and expose insidious propaganda from whatever source and in whatever form, having as its object the annulment of the loans made to foreign Governments during the period of the war. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to pay my respects to the Veterans' Bureau "as is and where is."

Everybody familiar with the subject knows that Congress has been anxious to deal liberally with our disabled soldiers. I do not believe that there has been a Member of the House who has not supported with all his soul the measures designed for the relief of those disabled in the World War.

But Congress has had great difficulty with its instrumentalities for the administration of soldier relief. Of course, at the beginning of this work in the War Risk Bureau there was great confusion. The entire forces and machinery had to be organized, and there was necessarily many faults and deficiencies. But that was over four years ago. Congress has been patient. Congress has from time to time passed laws to remedy the causes of inefficiency upon the part of these instrumentalities. We have tried to straighten out the kinks. But always the sympathetic efforts of Congress have been thwarted by the inertia and ineptitude of bureaucrats, by the inefficiency of officers chosen to pass on to the disabled men the relief voted by Congress.

Constantly we have been promised that there would be a change for the better. Constantly we have been told by those responsible that the errors, delays, and mismanagement of which just complaint was made would not be allowed to continue. With each change in the administration of the bureau created to administer the soldier relief, with each reorganization, with each step in its development, we have been promised that our troubles should be at an end. But the end of inefficiency has never come; the end has not yet come. I think the country should know, that the disabled soldiers should know, what Members of Congress are being brought to realize, that the administration of soldier relief is in many respects proceeding from bad to worse.

The time for promises and excuses is past; valid reasons for inefficiency can no longer be presented. Yet evidence is daily accumulating that instead of conditions with the bureau getting better they are becoming worse. Patience has ceased to be a virtue. We have the right to be exasperated.

RANK STUPIDITY.

Instances of lack of sympathy, of inefficiency—nay, more, of the rankest kind of stupidity—upon the part of the bureau come to my attention every day. I do not know whether I handle more soldiers' claims for compensation and training than other Members. All of us handle them for our constituents. There are thousands of these cases in my files. My office receives an average of some 50 letters a day about such claims and writes more. I give these matters my personal attention. Of course, Members of Congress are not the agents of the claimants, are not their attorneys; we are not selfishly interested in whether their claims are allowed or disallowed. But I feel it my duty as the representative of the disabled men who are my constituents to see that their claims are fairly presented, are acted upon with a fair degree of expedition, and that the claimants get a certain measure of justice. I also feel that as an American citizen it is my duty to those who offered their lives for their country to give them such proper help as I can. It is touching to receive, as I sometimes do, a letter, couched in awkward language and written in a spirit of humility, thanking me for what I have done for some poor fellow who lost his health in the service of his country. I always waive aside any thought that I am entitled to thanks for anything that I may do for these men. Always the thought comes, "If you, my boy, could make the sacrifice that you have made; if you could leave home and loved ones and suffer the discomforts of a soldier's service, with your life at stake; if you could do that for your country, surely any Congressman can well afford, is honored even, to try to do something to make good to you the loss which you sustained."

Perhaps I may handle more of these claims than other Members. Some of you have very efficient clerks that are able to relieve you of much of the work. Problems connected with them are presented to us all. These things come before me daily. I want to say to you, my friends, that I have reached the point of extreme exasperation with the methods of the Veterans' Bureau.

I do not want to make any caviling criticism. I do not call in question mere matters of judgment nor criticize where there is room for difference of opinion. Then the responsibility is with the bureau and not upon me. There are many heartbreaking delays, many inexcusable rejections, many awards of mere pittances where substantial sums should be given, many stubborn refusals to consider the statements of noninterested witnesses. But with these matters it is not my present purpose to deal. But for inefficiency, for evasion, for stupidity and indifference that reaches almost to the verge of actual perversity or malice, I feel that I must take some concern. I feel it my duty to protest, that I must not longer remain silent. It is upon Congress to take some action which will insure that these things will appear in a diminishing quantity.

ACTION WANTED, NOT WORDS.

When the present Director of the Veterans' Bureau took office I read in the press a statement from him that "the latchstring would hang outside his door." I was glad to read that, and I know the hearts of many of the boys who had been waiting and longing throughout the months for a fair decision upon their claims were gladdened to read it. But, my friends, I am not able to see that the director's fine professions have been translated into even the minimum of action. Interviews laudatory of the bureau, and obviously emanating from it, appear frequently in the press. The director or some one else down at the bureau evidently has much talent in the press-agent line. But for action, for decision, for doing justice to these boys, for making proper awards upon their claims, I look in vain; it is not there. Almost every day some bureau decision impresses me with the thought that many claimants are receiving payments of compensation to which they have small right, and on the other hand that a large number of claims which are full of merit are being denied.

I do not like mere general scolding. It is not my habit to criticize in general terms. I like to come down to brass tacks. I want to show the House by specific instances the methods that are being used by the bureau. I do not criticize idly and for no purpose. There is no use for me to write a letter to the director asking him to correct abuses. Nothing would result. From this floor is one place that the people of America can speak to their officials; they may speak through their Representatives, and something is usually done to correct evils complained of here. So that for the purpose of having inefficiency remedied, I am speaking here now. I want the director and his subordinates to read in the RECORD what I am saying. I want them to give heed to it. I want them to change their methods. I want our disabled soldiers to derive a benefit from changed conditions. I want the responsible officials to look up the cases which I shall now call to your attention and answer what I am saying if they can.

These are not selected cases. They came before me in a single day. They are mere illustrations from a day's run that came to my desk on yesterday. They are just sample cases, all coming in a day's work. Let us see from them what are the methods of the bureau.

THE CASE OF EARL E. BISHOP.

Here is the case of Earl E. Bishop, C–11488. I wrote to the bureau and made inquiries about this claim. I wrote this:

If the same has been rejected inform me whether it was upon a finding that claimant's disability arose prior to his entering the Army and was not aggravated by his service.

I got back the reply that the claim had been rejected—because it did not appear from the medical evidence on file that Mr. Bishop had a compensable disability that was either incurred in the service or aggravated thereby.

As will be observed, my question was not answered. There was no answer that gave me any information worth anything. I was unable to determine from that reply whether that boy was disabled when he was enlisted, and a notation made of his disability under the law, so that he was not compensable, or whether his disability originated after his service. I could not even tell from the letter whether they found that he was disabled to a degree less than 10 per cent. There was not a single fact stated in the reply on which I could advise this man so as to have him furnish further evidence on which his claim would be allowed.

It was merely a blind decision; a "judgment for the defendant," as though entered by a stupid and prejudiced justice of the peace who would not give his reasons for fear they were wrong. I then wrote again and asked—

Whether said claim is rejected upon a finding that claimant is not 10 per cent disabled, or upon a finding that his disability existed prior to his service, or arose after his discharge. If upon the finding that his disability existed prior to the service, kindly inform me as to whether notation thereof was made at the time he enlisted.

I was trying to hem in the bureau so as to find out something about the facts in the case. What answer did I get? It was this:

The military records of this claimant show that he was discharged from the draft for being "practically blind in right eye, very poor vision left eye. Existed prior to service."

Mark you, now, they were saying that he had been "discharged from the draft," trying to make out that he had never been enrolled as a soldier at all. The fact is that he enlisted September 19, 1917, and was discharged for disability March 2, 1918. I asked in my letter whether his disability was noted at the time he enlisted. I got no answer. I do not yet know what the facts are. If he had the disability at the time he enlisted and it was not noted, that boy under the plain letter of the law is entitled to compensation. But what I object to so much in his case is not that he was refused compensation, for that might have been an honest mistake, but that he was refused information as to why his claim was disallowed; that I, his Congressman, was not permitted to know the findings upon which the High Mightiness of this bureau based its decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 10 minutes more.

CASE OF LIEUT. JOHN D. BARCROFT.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The Bishop case is merely a type. By the same mail I got the same kind of a reply in another case, the case of Lieut. John D. Barcroft, claim 817289. Here is the bureau's statement:

This claim was rejected on October 10 for the reason that the evidence failed to show his disability to be of service origin.

Did his disability exist before he enlisted? Did it originate after he came out of the service? Did it originate in the line of duty as the result of his own misconduct? Why was this claim disallowed? I do not know. I am unable to find out from the bureau. Yet the boy says he was gassed and spent three months in a base hospital; he served his country 38 months and has been disabled ever since he was discharged.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. From the fact that the gentleman and the other Members have received so many letters of that kind, does he not think it probable that it is really a form letter?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It was probably written by a clerk. It seems we do not need expert officials or medical advisers in the bureau, but merely clerks who have sense enough to pick out a form and send it to a Congressman who is making an inquiry. Is it possible that our time has so little value that it may be frittered away by subordinate officials with evasions and subterfuges? As I say, such action reaches beyond the realm of pure stupidity. It comes close to malice and perversity.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Does the gentleman realize that under this decentralization plan we are receiving now almost entirely form letters, especially since the records have been sent to New York and elsewhere, and that when a Congressman complains there is an exchange of form letters between Mr. Forbes and Mr. Updike?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That statement applies to certain cases. It does not apply to these cases that I have mentioned here.

The bureau is not responsible for the so-called decentralization plan. That plan was a mistake. I need not argue that fact to those who are familiar with its workings. It is a failure. It does not produce results. But Congress did that. We took unbaked advice; but ours is the responsibility. The decentralization plan was adopted upon the urging of a committee of the American Legion. Instead of decentralization we have merely created an "Office of Circumlocution." The only good result of that plan, so far as I have been able to see, is to provide jobs for worthy ex-officers who are also true-blue Republicans.

There were perhaps some half-dozen other cases of similar nature that came to me at the same time. I will refer to only one more of them. I made inquiry in the case of Victor Perry, C–453251. Back came the bureau's characteristic reply:

The record in this case discloses the fact that all of the evidence submitted has been carefully considered and the opinion rendered that the claimant's disabilities were not due to or incident to service. Therefore no compensation is payable.

ONLY A TOTAL OF $8 FOR PERMANENT PLEURISY.

Dr. Wood Price, C–827117, served as a lieutenant in the Dental Corps. He had pneumonia, resulting in chronic pleurisy, which his physicians tell him is probably permanent—not that the disease will be fatal, but that it will trouble him more or less as long as he lives. Proofs were filed and examination held and the munificent award of $8 made to Dr. Price; $8 for a single month, mind you, not $8 monthly; but a single $8 for the month of November, 1921. Why beginning November 1 and why ending November 30? "Deponent saith not"; I have been unable to learn. In the interest of curiosity, if not in behalf of justice to a disabled soldier who served his country worthily, I would really like to know.

Alfred E. Cody, C–165536–N. His training was discontinued and he was placed on the compensation roll as total temporary from March 1, 1921, to May 26. The bureau claims to have paid him in full for this period. Cody claims that he has not been paid. I wrote the bureau:

Have claimant's award audited and inform me as to date of compensation award, amount thereof, any changes in same, and payments which have been made claimant.

The bureau replied:

The records of this bureau show that claimant entered vocational training on November 9, 1920, and was discharged therefrom on February 28, 1921. Upon his discontinuing vocational training on the latter date an amended award was approved in his favor which entitled him to compensation in the amount of $80 per month under a temporary total rating, effective from March 1, 1921, which amount was continued to May 26, 1921, the day preceding the date that claimant resumed vocational training.

I did not get the information asked for. My questions were evaded. What checks have they sent claimant? Has he really been paid in full? I do not yet know, although I have repeated my inquiry in the same terms.

A MOST EXASPERATING CASE.

The case of DuRant L. Bevill, C–473733, is one of the most exasperating that has come to my notice. The bureau started out November, 1920, by rejecting Bevill's claim for compensation on the ground "Disability not due to service." Of course, it was only a printed letter with a filled-in blank that Bevill got. That seems the only kind of letter that the disabled boys are considered by the officials of the bureau to be entitled to receive. Claimant wrote on November 22, 1920, asking the bureau what further evidence was required. No answer from the bureau; of course, no answer. Again on March 31, 1921, claimant made further inquiries—again no answer; and finally, in October, he asked me to help him with his claim. The bureau's reply to my inquiry was:

It has been determined from a review of the evidence contained in the record of the case that this claimant's disability, attributable to his service, is less than 10 per cent, and therefore not compensable under the war risk insurance act as amended.

I got no information of the least value. I inquired again. The Bureau replied:

You are advised that all evidence on file in the case has been carefully reviewed, and it is found that your constituent is not suffering from any disability of a degree of 10 per cent or greater resulting from his military service.

I filed additional proof showing claimant's disability to be substantially greater than 10 per cent, and succeeded in getting him reexamined. After repeated inquiries I received the bureau's letter, dated December 17, 40 days after the examination, from which I quote:

You are advised that this report has come to hand, and the evidence contained therein as to claimant's disability has been carefully reviewed in connection with the other evidence contained in the records of the case, and it has been found insufficient to show service connection of his disability.

The bureau had now shifted its rejection to the ground that service connection has not been shown. Yet claimant was discharged from the service for the same disease with which he is now suffering. I pushed the bureau further on this point, and was informed that his disability existed prior to enlistment. I have now asked whether his disability was noted at the time he enlisted. Thus, by pushing the bureau from point to point and exercising extraordinary patience and industry, perhaps after months of effort I may get the information which should have been given in the bureau's first letter.

COMPENSATION REDUCED WITHOUT EXAMINATION.

Now, there is another practice that is even more serious in its results than the methods I have pointed out. It appears that the bureau has now adopted the practice of reducing the compensation of disabled men without examinations. Did you know that, gentlemen? I am going to cite some instances which show such a practice. I have here the papers in the case of Simon Joseph Williams, C–61817.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will say that I have a case of that kind that came to me just this morning.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have personal knowledge about this case. This boy was discharged from the Navy because he had become demented. Shortly after his discharge he was found to have active tuberculosis. Since May, 1921, he has been at the tuberculosis hospital at Johnson City, Tenn., as a bureau patient. I notified the bureau by letter on June 18, 1921, that he was there. My letter was acknowledged six weeks later. He has been there ever since. He has a dependent mother, a widow. He had an award of $90 per month. On November 19 the bureau wrote me:

A recent examination has been had and a report furnished the medical division of this bureau. Based upon this medical examination, compensation has been reduced from the rating of temporary total to temporary partial, 55 per cent, which entitles the claimant to compensation in the amount of $49.50.

I was amazed to learn that this man's compensation was to be reduced. I knew that he was still in the hospital at Johnson City and demented. I knew he had had tuberculosis for many months, so I took the matter up again. I wrote the bureau that I was informed that this boy was hospitalized, and I asked them to inform me if that information was correct; I asked also to be informed as to the basis of the proposed reduction. I got back this reply:

The files of the bureau disclose Mr. Williams is receiving compensation in the sum of $49.50 a month, according to a disability rating of 55 per cent temporary partial.

I wrote again to the bureau:

Kindly reply to the question asked in my letter of 5th instant, which is whether the proposed reduction in claimant's award is based on a physical examination. I should like to know the occasion for the proposed reduction.

The bureau replied:

You are advised that the rating of 50 per cent temporary partial is based upon the medical examination made on September 29 by Dr. G. C. Freeman in United States Public Health Hospital, No. 45, Biltmore, N. C.

The bureau had no record of the claimant having been admitted to the national sanitarium at Johnston City, Tenn.

The facts are that this man had never been at Biltmore, but had been at Johnson City all the time. Dr. Freeman had probably never been within 100 miles of Johnson City.

The examination was alleged to have been held in September. The reduction was to become effective in January. I ask you how it is possible to make a fair decision upon a claim, effective three months hence, based on what a man's condition is expected to be at that time? A claimant's condition must be found at an exact time. How can it be prognosticated that three months hence a man will have recovered from 50 per cent of his disability? It is absurd.

Now here is the similar case of Hugh C. Graves, C–372384–M. This man is suffering from chronic arthritis and has had it ever since he was discharged from the Army. He is hospitalized at Hot Springs. He is receiving $80 monthly. On December 8, 1921, the bureau wrote me that he would be cut to $8, effective January 1, 1922. By pinning them down I succeeded in learning that his last examination—the examination upon which the reduction was alleged to be based—was made on August 28, 1921.

IN HOSPITAL WITH TUBERCULOSIS—GETS 20 PER CENT RATING.

Here is the case of Jean R. Edwards, C–1128241. This man is tuberculous and has been in a hospital for months. He was discharged from the Army because he had active tuberculosis. Here is his discharge for "S. C. D." He has received an award based on a rating of 20 per cent disability. I recently had a letter from the bureau in which they said that this man's disability, lung trouble, has been rated at 20 per cent and inviting him to prove service connection. Nevertheless he is down and out in the hospital.

Now, I must close. I can not take up all the cases to which I would like to refer; there are too many. But I will not close until I call attention to the case of William Rice Brandon, C–122945. He was discharged from the Army for tuberculosis, and was rated from the time he was discharged as totally and permanently disabled. He was allowed $100 a month. His mother is a poor widow solely dependent on him. The bureau allowed her $10 a month for dependency. After paying her for 24 months, $240, they wake up and find that claimants who are permanently and totally disabled are not entitled to a dependency allowance. I have no doubt that it will be news to Members that if a man is temporarily disabled he may have a dependency allowance for as much as $135 if he is a widower with five children and his parents are dependent upon him, but if he is permanently disabled, with the same dependents, he can not get more than $100 a month. They finally waked up and demanded of this old woman that she immediately refund the $240. She could not do it; she had spent it for bread and shelter. Then they demanded it of the boy, incurably ill of consumption, fighting his last battle in some western hospital trying to live as long as he can. They demanded of him that he refund the $240. Of course, he could not do it. Then they notified him that he would receive no more compensation until the amount of the $240 had been retained from his payments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The final result is that the boy was forced to agree to refund it at the rate of $40 a month, so that during that time he only gets $60 a month for six months. From this he is paying his own way at the hospital, fighting for his life even as he fought for his country.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States are resolved that our soldier relief work shall be efficiently carried on and that men disabled by reason of their service shall be aided with sympathetic liberality. That sentiment of their constituents is fully reflected by Members of Congress. We are tired, as the country is tired, of inefficiency in the Veterans' Bureau, of neglect, indifference, evasion, and delay.

The sooner the officials and employees of the bureau realize this situation, the better it will be for them as well as for us. Congress will not sit idle while the methods are being followed as illustrated in the cases which I have presented. The director and his assistants must make up their minds either to change their practices or to vacate their positions. If they are not going to change, then the sooner they vacate the better.

The Veterans' Bureau was not created as a money-saving device. We could save more money by abolishing it. It was created as a channel for the distribution of funds appropriated by Congress for the relief of disabled soldiers. The laws are ample. They were passed in a liberal and sympathetic spirit. They should be interpreted in a like spirit. Let us have done with inertia, suspicion, and quibbling. The country wants the disabled soldiers relieved. The bureau must submit to the will of the people.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I also yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I wish to express first my congratulations to the chairman and members of the Committee on Appropriations for the splendid work they are doing in systemizing this branch of the public business. I also wish to call attention to the comment made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] while the chairman of the committee was on the floor. It brought out very clearly and forcefully the fact that the budget as submitted for the first time had not produced the wonders in reduction that were prophesied when we had the bill under consideration originally. My personal acquaintance with the methods and provisions employed, and those that seem to be necessary from the real nature of the work, had prepared me fairly well to endure the great surprise that may have come to others. At the same time I wish to say that there is in the system of the budget a methodical course of procedure that will in time greatly bring out the best possible results in systemizing the expenditures of the executive branch of the service. The manner in which this bill comes to us to-day discloses the business of the Treasury Department alone and will be very helpful in the future as a matter of reference for reliable information. Those who have had to deal with appropriations of different years for different branches of the service will appreciate the difficulty we have formerly had in securing accurate estimates showing the cost of each branch of the public service for a given period.

That difficulty resulted from the fact that portions of the expenditures of each branch of the service many times were carried in different bills, and it was quite impossible to know when we had reached a correct estimate of the cost of each branch of the service. It is very helpful indeed to have the facts brought together in the form in which they appear in this bill for the Treasury Department. So, I take it, it will be in connection with the other branches of the service, and when we shall have rounded out, in this session of Congress, a review and passage of the appropriation bills, we will have accurate information ready at hand upon these points.

Of course we were all very much interested in the clear, forceful analysis given by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MADDEN] outlining the general provisions of the bill. I noted with special interest his statement that none of the increases of salaries suggested by the departments and recommended by the Bureau of the Budget had been allowed in the bill; in other words, that no advances had been made upon existing salaries. Immediately I asked myself this question: What provision does the bill make or does any other provision of law make for the lowering of the salaries that were boosted upward in the midst of the war? And at this point I shall be glad to have the attention of the members of the committee.

Take, for example, a few cases that I may cite indefinitely, perhaps not by name, although I could do that if desired. I can give dates and citations to the official record in support of these statements, and as I review these facts briefly I desire it to be understood that I disclose them for the purpose of showing a line of action which I think we ought to consider and ought to take.

For illustration, not long ago Congress was asked to create the position of Undersecretary of the Treasury with a salary of $10,000, in order that the head of the department might secure some one who was adequately qualified to discharge the duties of that position. That statement, of course, conveyed the idea that some one would be sought out because of his marked ability for the particular things to be done. Congress passed the law, provided the appropriation, and immediately thereafter the person who was then serving as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury at $5,000 a year was appointed Undersecretary of the Treasury at $10,000 a year, the net result being merely an advance in salary of $5,000 a year for the appointee. Note also the fact that this same person was appointed in the department on July 8, 1918, at a salary of $3,500. His first act immediately following his appointment was the promotion of two of his subordinates to $5,000 a year each. Now I want that to stand over side by side with the proposition of business economy. I want that to reveal the policy of departmental procedure.

May I go a step further? I can give you an indefinite number of these cases, but here is an instance in which a clerk serving at $1,600 a year in 1914, is now receiving $6,000 a year.

Here is another where a clerk was receiving $1,800 in 1911, and is now receiving $6,000.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Is that for the same work that he was performing then?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. There is a slight difference in assignment, but very little difference in the individual. I have not the time to go into details upon that point.

Here is another case of a clerk who in 1914 was receiving $900, who is now receiving $3,500.

Another, of a clerk who in 1911 was receiving $2,000, who is now receiving $3,000.

Here is another case of a clerk in the Post Office Department at $1,800 just before the war, transferred to the Treasury Department at $2,000, now receiving $4,500.

Here let me call attention to an item in the bill. I want to challenge the attention of the committee upon that point. The budget, as I recall it, recommended to Congress an increase in salary of $500 for the Chief of the Division of Appointments in the Treasury Department, a chief who handles the entire range of the appointment service of that department. His salary for a considerable period of time has been $3,000. No increase was made during the period of the war, strange as it may seem. The estimate as submitted asked an increase of $500. The budget recommended it. The committee reports it at $3,000 as before. Note the contrast in this case, will you, where a clerk transferred from the Post Office Department, who had been receiving $1,800, comes to $2,000, and then to $4,500 as appointment clerk in the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Place that side by side with the work and the salary of the chief of the appointment division of the department; a man handling only part of the appointment work of the department getting $4,500 a year, while the appointment clerk for the whole department gets $3,000. I will not dwell any longer upon that.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course the gentleman from Nebraska does not charge the committee with that?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Oh, no. I simply want to put the committee into an attitude of prayerful meditation. I am calling attention to these items which I hope will receive correction. I congratulate the committee on finding as much as they have. I have been able to rummage about here and there and have found a few things that may have escaped the attention of the committee.

The McAdoo profiteers in the Treasury Department were jubilant during the period of the war. They were in safe retreat from the weapons of war at the front, while their salaries were boosted by their chief toward the sky.

Billions of dollars were squandered upon railroads and through contractors under the cost-plus system and millions more were wrung from the taxpayers and the Liberty-bond purchasers of the country to pay the increased salaries and expenses of the profiteers.

Will Secretary Mellon and Commissioner Blair have the wisdom, fairness, and courage to reduce these profiteers to an equitable level with the other employees in the civil service of the country? The people expect an affirmative reply. We await results.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Was this party who was in the Post Office Department and who was transferred and who ultimately received $4,500, paid out of a lump-sum appropriation or a statutory appropriation?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. He was paid out of a lump-sum appropriation, and that is an item in this bill that we ought to consider very carefully when we reach the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. How did his compensation compare with that of his predecessor?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. There was no predecessor, so far as I know.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It was a new position?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The duties were discharged before by the chief clerk of the bureau without any additional compensation.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman stated that the clerk who made only a part of these appointments got more money than the man who made them all. Do the appointments made by the Internal Revenue Bureau have to be O. K.'d by the Bureau of Appointments in the Treasury Department?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. They go through the Division of Appointments in the Treasury Department proper, and the Secretary of the Treasury must pass upon them before they are consummated.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does not the gentleman's real complaint lie against the method of making lump-sum appropriations, and giving a bureau chief the right to apportion salaries?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I call this to your particular attention when you come to the appropriation for the Bureau of Internal Revenue. I leave that matter for the present, but I want to say that the Chief of the Division of Appointments has the whole range of appointments in the Treasury Department, while the appointment clerk in the Bureau of Internal Revenue has only that bureau to arrange in detail.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Has not the Secretary of the Treasury power to cut that lump-sum allotment of $4,500 to $3,000?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. He and the commissioner have, if they will do it, but I want to see a limitation placed on the appropriation bill that will compel it.

Mr. MADDEN. There is a limitation on the appropriation now to prohibit them from increasing any compensation.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. But would it decrease the compensation?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Then, should we not put in a provision that will bring these things to the proper level? I have here about 2,000 names which I could read if it were worth while and time would permit to bring out this story; I think I have given enough, however, to show the real purpose. Mr. Chairman, let us put these facts with these salaries listed as they were during the period of the war side by side with the bulk of the clerks in the departments who receive only $240 as a bonus.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman is familiar with the Treasury Department, having served in that department. Could he not draw an amendment and offer it to this bill which would cover these lump-sum allotments so as to equalize them with the statutory roll?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I could fix it to suit myself, but the gentleman must excuse me from undertaking that in the presence of the brilliant ability of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Can not the gentleman at least persuade the committee to exert itself to adopt an amendment like that?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. With the help of the gentleman from Texas that is what I am trying to do.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I was suggesting——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. And I am very much obliged for the suggestion. Think of it. Here is a bonus of $240 for each of the people who have really done the work of the Government. Are you going to leave them where they are or put them down and leave these other fellows up? Is that practical, is that fair, is it just? Moreover, let these people whose salaries have been boosted in this manner stand side by side with the boys who fought in the trenches for $33 or $30 a month, as the case may be. Let them stand side by side with the taxpayers of the country who have been putting the money into the National Treasury to pay this bill; let them stand side by side with the people who bought the bonds to furnish the money to pay these salaries. You are making demands for the reduction of wages on the outside in order that commodities may come to a price that the people can afford to pay. What will this committee do, what will this House do, what will this Congress do with these salary profiteers to whom I have referred only briefly? There are 2,000 names here, showing a list beyond the level of reason, and until everybody is brought to that plane these people should come down where the other people are compelled to stay. I ask the Committee on Appropriations to meditate upon these suggestions and act in keeping with economy and the taxpayers' interests. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL].

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Chairman, on December 6, when President Harding addressed the Congress he made this statement:

> Something more than tariff protection is required by American agriculture. Every proper encouragement should be given to the cooperative marketing program.

I desire to state to the House that during the past four or five months in Kentucky we have built up a farmers' cooperative organization, and I believe it will be of interest to the House and to the country at large to know something about it. We have recently formed an organization in Kentucky of 55,000 paid-up membership farmers for the purpose of selling our tobacco crop through a cooperative marketing association, the tobacco crop being the principal money crop of the State of Kentucky. Our membership extends into the States of West Virginia, southern Indiana, and southern Ohio, which States grow the same type of tobacco that we grow in Kentucky. This organization is thoroughly perfected, now ready to do business. As I said, we have a membership, paid-up, of 55,000 farmers, controlling 200,000,000 pounds of burley tobacco, which we are now ready to put on the market, and these 200,000,000 pounds constitute 85 per cent of the entire production of that type of tobacco.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANTRILL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is this association affiliated with the Farm Bureau Organization?

Mr. CANTRILL. The association is not affiliated with any farmers' organization. It has had the complete support of the Farm Bureau Organization, of the Farmers' Union, and of every farmers' organization which is organized in our section of the country. We have recently incorporated under the laws of the State of North Carolina. We have under our control, belonging to the organization, 115 large, complete warehouses ready to handle this tobacco crop, these warehouses costing between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. I believe that this is the largest organization in point of numbers of any cooperative association in the United States. By the direct vote of the 55,000 members we have selected able, conservative business men to handle this organization. We expect to get a price for this tobacco crop which will total between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000, and that will be, as we hope, the average sum per annum paid to the organization.

At this time when there is a national conference to be held here in the city of Washington to discuss the welfare of the farmers, as a Kentuckian and one who has taken an active part for the past four or five months in building up this organization, I take great pride in telling the House and the country of the association, and I sincerely trust that the farmers of the country in other lines of agriculture will follow this same plan, because, say what we will, however well disposed Congress might be to help the farmer in his present plight, yet in large measure his welfare and prosperity is dependent upon what he does for himself. Some time ago, years ago, we tobacco growers in Kentucky learned that lesson. We have put an end to this senseless habit of the tobacco grower dumping his tobacco on the market and taking whatever price the Tobacco Trust sees fit to give him. We have put our industry upon a business basis. We have pledged practically the entire production of this crop to our own association. We have $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 worth of warehouses, 115 in number, in which to handle this crop, and we do not intend to sell a pound of it until we get a fair and reasonable profit on every pound that we have produced. We are tired of being the serfs and slaves of the Tobacco Trust in Kentucky, and I commend this kind of organization to the farmers of the United States in other lines of agriculture.

With the permission of the House, Mr. Chairman, and I now ask it, in the extension of my remarks I desire to incorporate in the RECORD the contract which the farmers of this association have signed. It is a contract which has stood the test of the courts. It points the way by which farmers can pool their crops upon a business basis and in a legal way, and I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to print the contract with an explanation of the contract as part of my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentlemen of the committee, in making this campaign to organize these farmers, which lasted four or five months, that we have the united support of practically every newspaper in our State. We had all the bankers practically in our State behind us, who had agreed to stand with us and help us finance the organization. The financing of the organization, which will require some ten to twenty million dollars, has been the easiest part of our program. The real trouble that we had was to get the farmer himself to see the necessity of this organization and to sign this contract; but, thanks to the support of the press, of our bankers, of our business men, and practically every citizen of Kentucky, we finally perfected an organization of 55,000 members, with 85 per cent of the Burley tobacco under our control. I desire to state to the Members of the House that of the 10 or 15 per cent of the tobacco farmers who did not come into the organization, that the price which they are receiving for their tobacco is double what they received last year before the association started. We expect a higher price for the tobacco pledged to the cooperative association.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANTRILL. I do.

Mr. SNYDER. I notice the gentleman some time ago commented upon the bankers and the different people who assisted in the organization. The gentleman started his remarks by reading a statement from the President of the United States, and I have not noticed that he commended him for that. Is he not entitled to a little consideration?

Mr. CANTRILL. Who is entitled to a little consideration?

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman read in connection with his remarks a statement from the President of the United States——

Mr. CANTRILL. I did.

Mr. SNYDER. I had not noticed that when the gentleman commended the others who assisted in organizing the association he referred to the President in commendatory terms.

Mr. CANTRILL. Well, in answer to the gentleman I beg to say that I give the President full credit for his suggestion along cooperative lines. I took it for granted that I did not withhold any credit from him. What I wanted to impress upon the committee was——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman an additional five minutes.

Mr. CANTRILL. What I wanted to impress upon the committee was that the farmers of the country learned this lesson of cooperation before the President ever suggested it to the country, but I would not withhold credit from the President, and I heartily commend him for calling attention of the country to it, and that is why I read from his message. I give him full credit.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit, I fear my friend misunderstood the proposition of the gentleman from New York. What he intended to ask was whether or not the gentleman from Kentucky was going to give credit to the President for admitting that the tariff bunk was not helping the farmer.

Mr. CANTRILL. In the limited time I had I did not take the floor to go into any political discussion of this matter, but simply wanted to put the facts of this organization before the House especially on the eve of this conference.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANTRILL. I do.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman stated this contract to which he referred had been upheld by the courts. Has it been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States or the courts of Kentucky?

Mr. CANTRILL. In answer to the gentleman I may say I am not a lawyer and could not say whether the Supreme Court has passed upon the contract or not, but it has been through the courts.

Mr. WALSH. This organization was formed in Kentucky without any legislation being required from the Legislature of Kentucky, was it?

Mr. CANTRILL. I will say this to the gentleman, that in Kentucky we had a very stringent antitrust law, and there was some doubt in the minds of those of us who tried to build up this organization whether or not the contract was against the Kentucky law. This organization was incorporated in North Carolina. Our legislature is now in session, began two or three days ago, and the first bill which was introduced was in reference to this matter, and the legislature is sitting in continuous session, so that the present law upon the Kentucky statute books can be repealed so as to make an absolutely clear track in reference to the legal authority for this association.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my observation has been that one of the chief troubles—and I wish I had time here this afternoon to go into all the details of this organization—but one of the first troubles in organizing the farmer into a large cooperative body is to secure the money and the means of placing the arguments before the farmer himself. No farmer can afford to spend thousands of dollars for publicity, for speakers, and for a great campaign to organize thousands of farmers. In our State this difficulty was met by a gentleman of Kentucky, one who had the welfare of the State at heart, one who had ample means, one who is the editor of two of the greatest newspapers in Kentucky; and he, out of his own means, spent thousands of dollars and put behind the organization the full power of his great newspapers so that this organization could be put upon its feet.

I refer to Judge Robert Bingham, the editor and owner of the Louisville Courier-Journal and the Louisville Times, who, out of his own pocket to the extent of thousands and thousands of dollars, furnished the money in order that this organization might be put upon its feet. Those of us in Kentucky who are interested in the growing of tobacco feel a debt of great gratitude to him for the splendid work that he has done along this line. Another great editor who supported the organization with great power and success was Mr. Desha Breckinridge, owner of the Lexington Herald.

In the extension of my remarks I want to place the contract which the farmers signed and other information in the RECORD, with the hope that they will be of great service to the other farmers of the country who wish to organize cooperative associations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BURLEY TOBACCO GROWERS' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION AGREEMENT.

WE ORGANIZE A NONPROFIT COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION TO SELL OUR TOBACCO INTELLIGENTLY.

The undersigned propose to organize a nonprofit association, without capital stock, for the purpose of promoting, fostering, and encouraging the business of marketing tobacco cooperatively; for reducing speculation; for stabilizing the local tobacco markets; for cooperatively and collectively handling the problems of tobacco growers; and for other pertinent purposes.

WE AGREE WITH EACH OTHER—NO OUTSIDERS IN THIS CONTRACT.

We, the undersigned, in consideration of the premises and of our mutual undertakings and of the agreement of each and every party hereto, do hereby agree as follows, each for himself and collectively for the express benefit of and as the association to be organized:

WE AGREE TO BE MEMBERS.

1. We will become members of the Burley Tobacco Growers' Cooperative Association, a nonprofit association, without capital stock, to be organized under the laws of the State of North Carolina. We agree individually and collectively that the directors of the association to be organized may reincorporate the association under the laws of the State of Kentucky when suitable legislation is enacted in this State.

ONLY GROWERS OR LANDLORDS WHO HAVE TOBACCO TO SELL CAN BE MEMBERS.

2. The association may include in its membership any tobacco grower, including the landlord or tenant or lessor or lessee of land on which tobacco is grown, provided the landlord or lessor receives all or part of the rental in tobacco.

WILL HAVE 25 DIRECTORS—THE OFFICE WILL BE AT RALEIGH, N. C., OR LEXINGTON, KY.

3. The affairs of the association shall be controlled by a board of 25 directors; and the legal office of the association shall be at Lexington, Ky., or at Raleigh, N. C.; and the chief operating office shall be at Lexington, Ky.

TWENTY-TWO DIRECTORS ARE TOBACCO GROWERS—THERE WILL BE 22 DISTRICTS.

4. (a) The members shall elect 22 directors from among members actually residing and growing tobacco in districts to be fixed equitably by the organization committee on the basis of the tobacco produced by the members actually signed up prior to incorporation.

Each district shall include approximately the same estimated production as any other district; but counties within each district shall be kept intact.

The 22 directors, by a two-thirds vote, shall choose three directors at large, one from each of the States of Kentucky, Indiana, and Ohio, to represent the interests of the public on the general board. These directors need not be growers of tobacco and may take part in all the discussions in the directors' meetings. Any of these directors who are actual growers of tobacco, and if they are growers, are also members of the association, shall have a vote upon all subjects coming before the board of directors.

5. (a) The members in each county in each district shall meet annually for a primary election, to be held in the county and conducted, as, where, and when specified by the directors; and shall select one delegate for every million or majority fraction of a million pounds of tobacco represented in the preceding year by the members in such county. The said delegates shall then meet where, when, and as instructed by the directors, and shall select one member in each district to be presented as the nominee to represent such district. Such nominee must be elected as director at the general meeting.

VOTING BY MAIL.

(b) If unable to attend, the members may vote at such primary meeting by mail on a signed ballot prepared under directions of the board of directors.

The first primary to select incorporating directors shall be held within 30 days after announcement of the completion of the minimum sign up, herein provided for.

DISTRICT ALWAYS TO HAVE FAIR REPRESENTATION.

6. The organization committee, at least 20 days before the first primary meeting, and the directors, by a majority vote, at least 20 days prior to all succeeding primary meetings, shall fix and specify or change the said districts, and the counties included therein, so as to maintain at all times fair and equitable representation of the tobacco-producing counties and districts included in the membership.

BOARD WILL HAVE AN EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

7. The board shall appoint an executive committee of five directors to conduct the affairs of the association, subject to the general control of the board of directors.

LOCAL BRANCHES WILL BE MAINTAINED.

8. Informal local branches of the association shall be created and maintained in every district, county, and central locality. Each district shall have its own officers, who may attend the meetings of the board of directors and act in an advisory capacity.

The association will provide uniform rules for such branches.

ONE MAN—ONE VOTE.

9. Every member of the association shall have one vote.

ENTRANCE FEE, $5—CASH, TOBACCO, OR NOTE.

10. Every member shall pay an entrance or organization fee of $5.

ASSOCIATION WILL HAVE SUITABLE ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION AND BY-LAWS.

11. The association shall confine itself to the problems and marketing of tobacco and tobacco products only, and for its members only. It shall have suitable articles of incorporation and by-laws stating the purposes and powers of the association, the rights and duties of members, manner of forfeiture of membership, value of property interest on withdrawal, and any other necessary, pertinent, and important points of organization as determined by the organization committee or the board of directors.

ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE.

12. The association shall be organized by an organization committee composed of the following:

Robert W. Bingham, Louisville; Ralph M. Barker, Carrollton; Edward Bassett, Lexington; Walter Bennett, Richmond; Desha Breckinridge, Lexington; T. S. Burnam, Richmond; Johnson N. Camden, Versailles; Samuel Clay, Paris; W. A. Clements, Springfield; John T. Collins, Paris; T. J. Curtis, Richmond; L. A. Faurest, Elizabethtown; Harry Giovannoli, Lexington; H. B. Hanger, jr., Richmond; Shelby T. Harbison, Lexington; Martin L. Harris, Rising Sun, Ind.; Price Headley, Lexington; J. R. Jones, Cynthiana; J. N. Kehoe, Maysville; the Rev. John F. Knue, McQuady; Bedford Macklin, Frankfort; William A. McDowell, Lexington; Dr. Frank L. McVey, Lexington; Charles N. Manning, Lexington; L. L. Neale, Richmond; Stanley Reed, Maysville; N. C. Ridgeway, Falmouth; Joseph E. Robinson, Lancaster; W. E. Simms, Versailles; Fred C. Stilz, Lexington; James C. Stone, Lexington; Sunshine Sweeney, Lexington; B. A. Thomas, Shelbyville; C. L. Walters, Shelbyville; J. Quincy Ward, Cynthiana; John Woodford, Paris; C. A. Meek, Carrollton; J. A. Donaldson, Carrollton; George Powell, Bedford; Prentice Heath, Bedford; D. A. Bell, Bedford; R. B. Brown, Warsaw; B. F. Mylor, Warsaw; A. T. Mills, Owenton; Charles Danner, Vevay, Ind.; John R. Crockett, Sharpsburg; J. S. Hocker, Stanford; J. W. Gaines, Lawrenceburg; J. N. W. McClure, Paris; Buckner Woodford, Paris; John W. Heflin, Flemingsburg; C. D. Asbury, Augusta; R. P. Taylor, Winchester; J. H. Sousley, Flemingsburg; Lewis L. Walker, Lancaster; Robert J. Denny, Nicholasville; James C. Averitt, Lebanon; Bush W. Allin, Harrodsburg; Samuel Houtchens, Chaplin; Herdy Myers, Carlisle; Chambers Perry, Mount Olivet; Reuben F. Offutt, Georgetown; E. T. Holloway, Taylorsville; Robert S. Walker, Versailles; Lindsay Duncan, La Grange; C. O. Hempfling, Taylorsport; F. T. Logan, Danville; B. E. Allen, Lexington; V. S. Metcalfe, Dry Ridge; J. D. Craddock, Munfordville; A. D. Keith, Tolesboro; Clark B. Patterson, Mount Sterling; Martin Light, McKinneysburg.

This committee may increase its membership from time to time as may be deemed necessary. The committee may elect new members in place of any who may resign or be unable to act, and take such steps as it may deem advisable to secure subscribers for this agreement and members of the association. There will be an executive committee of five members to conduct the detailed affairs of organization work. This executive committee shall be made up of Robert W. Bingham, Ralph M. Barker, James C. Stone, W. E. Simms, and John T. Collins. It will be the duty of the executive committee to open headquarters, incur necessary obligations, make necessary expenditures, and do any and all things incident and necessary to the executive work of carrying on the membership campaign. It will have all the powers of the full organization committee.

SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT OF THE PRODUCTION IN KENTUCKY, INDIANA, TENNESSEE, AND OHIO MUST BE SIGNED UP.

13. (a) If by November 1, 1922, signatures of tobacco growers or persons eligible for membership, covering at least three-fourths of the aggregate production of Burley tobacco in Kentucky, Indiana, Tennessee, and Ohio in 1920, shall not have been secured for this agreement, the organization committee shall so notify every subscriber at his address noted below prior to November 15, 1922, and his signature and the agreement signed by him shall be deemed canceled.

BINDING AGREEMENT.

(b) If the signatures of the growers of the said three-fourths shall be secured by the said date, November 1, 1922, then this agreement shall be binding upon all the subscribers in all of its terms and there shall be no right of withdrawal whatsoever.

STARTS WITH 1921 CROP IF YOU SECURE THE SIGN UP.

(c) If the said three-fourths is secured prior to November 15, 1921, the organization committee shall notify all subscribers and proceed to organize the association as soon as practicable, and shall handle, in addition to the crops set out in the marketing agreement, whatever of the 1921 crop the grower has on hand, free of lien, at the date of notice of incorporation of the association.

STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE CONCLUSIVE.

(d) For all matters of production or signatures and for all statements of fact in connection herewith, the written statement of the organization committee, signed by its chairman, shall be absolutely conclusive, with or without notice to the subscriber.

COMMITTEE KEEPS TRUE ACCOUNTS.

14. The organization committee shall keep a full, true, and detailed account of expenditures, including salaries, fees, and cost of every kind, and shall have such accounts audited and render a written report thereof to the board of directors of the association when organized, and shall thereupon turn over to the association any balance remaining in its hands and free of obligations. If it is not so organized, such balance shall be prorated among the signers hereof.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO GO AHEAD.

15. (a) We do hereby authorize the organization committee, as the representative of all the subscribers, to take such steps as it may deem proper, especially in Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, West Virginia, and other Burley tobacco-growing States, to secure subscribers hereto; and when the adequate number has been secured, to hold primary elections and have the signers select delegates to elect the organizing directors from among growers subscribing hereto, together with three public directors, conforming as closely as possible to the provisions of paragraph 4; and to take all steps necessary and advisable to organize the association.

ASSOCIATION TO KEEP UP ORGANIZATION WORK.

(b) The association when organized shall make every reasonable effort to secure signatures of additional growers to the standard marketing agreement.

HOW YOU SECURE, FINANCE, AND CONTROL ANY PLANTS YOU MAY NEED FOR CURING, DRYING, PROCESSING, OR STORING ANY TOBACCO.

16. (a) After due investigation the association may cause a warehousing or other corporation to be organized in any community or district, or generally where any such need is indicated, by written request of at least 100 members, for the purpose of leasing, purchasing, or constructing and operating warehouses, drying or curing plants, storehouses or factories, or other places, to handle, treat, process, manufacture and warehouse, or store any or all of the tobacco delivered by members of the association. The association, in all such cases, shall endeavor to acquire or lease existing warehouses and plants, especially where they are owned by growers.

APPROPRIATE NAME.

(b) Such corporation shall have an appropriate name, indicating the district; and shall have common capital stock and preferred capital stock in amounts estimated as sufficient for their purposes by the directors of the association.

ASSOCIATION CAN NOT PUT UP ANY PLANTS AGAINST DESIRE OF MEMBERS.

(c) The association shall send a written notice to every member in that district, or generally notifying the members of the intention to organize such a corporation, specifying the amount of capital stock involved, nature of plants, location of plants, and specific purposes.

The members shall have two weeks within which to signify their dissent or disapproval of such a plant. If within two weeks of the mailing of such notices by the association the majority fail to file written notices of such disapproval or dissent, the association shall proceed with its program and shall organize the corporation as indicated.

COMMON STOCK HAS ALL THE VOTING POWER—ONLY MEMBERS CAN OWN THIS.

(d) The authorized common stock shall exceed in amount the authorized preferred stock. The common stock shall be sold only to members of the association at par; but no member shall purchase originally or directly more than one share or enough to qualify as a director. The common stock shall have all the voting power of the corporation.

PREFERRED STOCK HAS NO VOTE, BUT HAS GUARANTEED DIVIDENDS—ANYBODY CAN BUY PREFERRED STOCK.

(e) The preferred capital stock shall be divided into five equal classes, all bearing 8 per cent cumulative dividends and having similar preferences, subject to retirement with a bonus of 2 per cent at the rate of one class or one-fifth thereof annually, beginning June, 1923.

The preferred stock may be sold to any person, firm, or corporation whatsoever.

LIMITATION ON STOCK ISSUES IS APPROXIMATELY TWO-FIFTHS OF A CENT A POUND EACH YEAR.

(f) The original issue of preferred stock, including all five classes, shall not exceed 2 cents for each pound of tobacco of the 1920 crop covered by the membership of that district; but this amount may be increased proportionately as the membership increases.

FUNCTION OF CORPORATION AND RELATIONS TO MARKETING ORGANIZATION.

(g) The association shall make a cross contract with the corporation providing substantially as follows: That the corporation shall handle, process, dry, cure, condition, manufacture, treat, store, ship, and deliver, all as required and directed by the association, the tobacco delivered to it by and at the order of the association. Such services will be on a nonprofit basis, and the corporation shall receive therefor only the actual costs of such operations and amounts, apportioned over the operation of any one season, sufficient to pay a dividend of 8 per cent on the outstanding common stock and the dividend on the outstanding preferred stock and to retire each of the five calendar years, beginning with 1923, one-fifth of the preferred stock, or one class thereof; and sufficient amounts for taxes, insurance, depreciation, betterment, and commercial and secondary charges, all as the directors of the association may instruct and limit the corporation and not otherwise.

The corporation will agree to do no buying or selling of tobacco whatsoever.

PUBLIC WAREHOUSES.

(h) Any warehouse shall be conducted as a public warehouse, with such charges as may be imposed through an official body or with such charges as are generally prevalent in the district; and any profits made from such operation as a public warehouse shall be utilized for payment of overhead expenses of the corporation.

HOW YOU RETIRE PREFERRED STOCK.

(i) The association will retire each class of preferred stock and pay the dividends on the stock by deductions from the marketing proceeds of the members generally or within the respective districts in which or for whose use or benefit the warehouses, etc., are acquired or built and operated.

If, however, any central plants are purchased, constructed, or leased, or operated for the general benefit of several or all of the districts, such deductions shall be made from the proceeds of the several or all districts, as the directors may determine conclusively, to conform to the general extent of the beneficial purpose.

GROWERS GET CREDIT FOR ALL DEDUCTIONS TO RETIRE STOCK.

(j) As the preferred stock is retired the association will calculate the value of the contribution from each grower's tobacco toward such retirement and toward payment of dividends on the common and preferred stock, and the corporation will credit and issue from time to time to each such member common stock in an equivalent amount, at the book value thereof, as conclusively established by the directors of the corporation as soon as the aggregate deductions equal the book value of one or more shares.

MARKETING AGREEMENT IS HERE ACCEPTED.

17. (a) The subscriber agrees (1) to execute, when requested by the association, a marketing agreement in terms substantially the same as those set forth in the agreement herewith embodied; or (2) at the option of the board of directors to be bound by the terms of the following marketing agreement.

For such purposes signature to this association contract shall be deemed to all effects the same as signature to the said marketing agreement and as acceptance of the exercise of such option by the board of directors. Notice thereof shall be mailed to each subscriber at his address noted below.

THIS IS AN APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP.

(b) The subscriber here applies for membership in the association when organized and expressly agrees that his signature to this association contract and to the marketing agreement, herewith embodied, and to this application for membership shall be irrevocable, except as provided in paragraph 13; and that he so agrees, in order to induce other growers to sign this agreement for his benefit as well as their own general benefit and the public welfare.

Acceptance of this application for membership and of the marketing agreement shall be deemed conclusive, upon the mailing of the notice by the association; and such mailing and notice shall be conclusively established by the affidavit of the secretary of the association.

BURLEY TOBACCO GROWERS' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION MARKETING AGREEMENT.

MEMBER'S AGREEMENT WITH THE ASSOCIATION.

The Burley Tobacco Growers' Cooperative Association, a nonprofit association, hereinafter called the association, first party, and the undersigned grower, second party, agree:

THIS IS FOR COOPERATIVE MARKETING.

1. The grower is a member of the association and is helping to carry out the express aims of the association for cooperative marketing, for minimizing speculation and waste and stabilizing tobacco markets in the interest of the grower and the public, through this and similar obligations undertaken by other growers.

GROWER SELLS TOBACCO TO ASSOCIATION FOR FIVE YEARS.

2. The association agrees to buy and the grower agrees to sell and deliver to the association all of the tobacco produced by or for him or acquired by him as landlord or lessor during the years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, and 1926.

IF YOU HAVE A CROP MORTGAGE THAT TOBACCO DOES NOT HAVE TO GO TO THE ASSOCIATION IF YOU CAN NOT CONTROL IT.

3. The grower expressly warrants that he has not heretofore contracted to sell, market, or deliver any of his said tobacco to any person, firm, or corporation, except as noted at the end of this agreement. Any tobacco covered by such existing contracts or crop mortgage shall be excluded from the terms hereof for the period and to the extent noted, if the lien holder insists upon the exercise of any right of possession or sale.

THE ASSOCIATION TELLS YOU WHERE TO DELIVER.

4. (a) All tobacco shall be delivered at the earliest reasonable time after cutting or curing, to the order of the association, at the warehouse or plant controlled or specified by the association; or at the nearest warehouse, if the association controls or specifies no warehouse or plant in that immediate district; or by shipment, as directed, to the association; and by delivery to the association of the indorsed warehouse or other receipts or bills of lading, properly directed.

POOR TOBACCO IS PENALIZED.

(b) Any deduction or allowance or loss that the association may make or suffer on account of inferior grade, quality, or condition at delivery shall be charged against the grower individually.

ASSOCIATION WILL TRY TO STANDARDIZE METHODS.

(c) The association shall make rules and regulations and provide inspectors or graders to standardize and grade the quality and method and manner of handling, curing, and shipping such tobacco, and the grower agrees to observe any such rules and regulations and to adopt the grading established by the State and Federal authorities and the association.

ALL TOBACCO WILL BE POOLED FOR EACH YEAR BY TYPE AND GRADE.

5. The association shall pool or mingle the tobacco of the grower with tobacco of a like type, grade, and quality delivered in the same crop year by other growers. The association shall classify the tobacco and its classification shall be conclusive.

The tobacco delivered in any crop year to any point at the order of the association shall be handled in one major pool; and the minor pools shall be by type and grade.

ASSOCIATION WILL RESELL ALL TOBACCO AND PAY NET PROCEEDS TO GROWER—COSTS OF OPERATION AND OVERHEAD WILL BE DEDUCTED, BUT THE ASSOCIATION FORBIDDEN TO MAKE ANY PROFIT FOR ITSELF.

6. The association agrees to resell such tobacco, together with tobacco of like type, grade, and quality delivered by other growers under similar contracts, at the best prices obtainable by it under market conditions, and to pay over the net amount received therefrom (less freight, insurance, and interest) as payment in full to the grower and growers named in contracts similar hereto, according to the tobacco delivered by each of them, after deducting therefrom, within the discretion of the association, the costs of maintaining the association and of handling, grading, and marketing such tobacco, and of creating funds for credits and other general commercial purposes (said funds not to exceed 1 per cent of the gross resale price). The annual surplus from such deductions must be prorated among the growers delivering tobacco in that year on the basis of deliveries.

EVERY GROWER GETS THE SAME AMOUNT FOR THE SAME TYPE, QUALITY, AND QUANTITY OF TOBACCO.

7. The grower agrees that the association may handle, in its discretion, some of the tobacco in one way and some in another; may sell some upon delivery; may cure or process or manufacture all or any portion thereof, but the net proceeds of all tobacco or tobacco products of like type, quality, and grade, less charges, costs, and advances, shall be divided ratably among the growers in proportion to their deliveries to each pool, payments to be made from time to time until all the accounts of each pool are settled.

The association may contract with the owners of redrying plants to redry and store the tobacco delivered by the members of the association.

THE TOBACCO WILL BE SOLD ANYWHERE—FOR EXPORT OR OTHERWISE—WHERE IT WILL BE MOST PROFITABLE.

8. The association may sell the said tobacco, within or without the United States, directly to manufacturers or exporters or otherwise, at such time and in such form and upon such conditions and terms as it may deem profitable, fair, and advantageous to the growers; and it may sell all or any part of the tobacco with or through any other agency hereafter established for the cooperative marketing of the tobacco of growers in other States throughout the United States under such conditions as will serve the joint interest of the growers and the public; and any proportionate expenses connected therewith shall be deemed marketing costs under paragraph 6.

THE ASSOCIATION CAN RAISE MONEY TO MAKE FIRST PAYMENT TO GROWERS.

9. The grower agrees that the association shall borrow money in its name on the tobacco, through drafts, acceptances, notes, or otherwise, or on any warehouse receipts or bills of lading, or upon any accounts for the sale of tobacco, or on any commercial paper delivered therefor. The association shall prorate the money so received among the growers equitably, as it may determine, for each district and period of delivery.

The association agrees to accept drafts drawn against it by the grower for any amount specified and determined by it, upon delivery of tobacco hereunder, and to assist the grower to discount such drafts, secured by the warehouse receipts, through the most advantageous banking system.

OFFICES OR PLANTS WHEREVER THEY ARE NEEDED.

10. The association may establish selling offices, warehouses, plants, marketing, statistical, or other agencies in any place.

YOU CAN STOP GROWING TOBACCO IF YOU WISH.

11. The grower shall have the right to stop growing tobacco and to grow anything else at any time at his free discretion; but if he produces any tobacco or acquires or owns any interest in any tobacco as landlord or lessor during the term hereof it shall all be included under the terms of this agreement and must be sold only to the association.

YOU DO NOT HAVE TO DELIVER ANY PARTICULAR AMOUNT.

12. Nothing in this agreement shall be interpreted as compelling the grower to deliver any specified quantity of tobacco each year, but he shall deliver all the tobacco produced by or for him.

YOU DELIVER ALL THE TOBACCO YOU RAISE.

13. (a) This agreement shall be binding upon the grower as long as he produces tobacco directly or indirectly, or has the legal right to exercise control of any commercial tobacco or any interest therein as a producer or landlord during the term of this contract.

(b) If this agreement is signed by the members of a copartnership, it shall apply to them and each of them individually in the event of the dissolution or termination of the said copartnership.

YOU MAY MAKE A CROP MORTGAGE—THE ASSOCIATION WILL TRY TO HELP YOU SECURE STANDARD TERMS.

(c) If the grower places a crop mortgage upon any of his crops during the term hereof, the association shall have the right to take delivery of his tobacco and to pay off all or part of the crop mortgage for the account of the grower and to charge the same against him individually.

The grower may place a crop mortgage upon his tobacco, and shall notify the association prior to making any such mortgage. The association will assist and advise the grower in any such transaction as far as it deems proper.

STATISTICS ARE NEEDED.

14. From time to time the grower agrees to mail to the association any statistical data requested, on the forms provided for that purpose by the association.

ALL CONTRACTS ARE ALIKE.

15. This agreement is one of a series generally similar in terms comprising with all such agreements, signed by individual growers, or otherwise, one single contract between the association and the said growers annually and individually obligated under all of the terms thereof. The association shall be deemed to be acting in its own name for all such growers in any action or legal proceedings on or arising out of this contract.

THE GROWER AUTHORIZES THE ASSOCIATION TO PROVIDE CURING OR REDRYING PLANTS IF IT NEEDS THEM.

16. (a) The grower hereby expressly authorizes the association to deliver to any warehousing or other corporation organized for cooperation with this association any or all of his tobacco for handling, processing, or manufacturing, or storing; and to charge against his tobacco and his prorated share of the funds necessary to create a reserve, equivalent to one class of its preferred stock annually plus bonus, to retire the said class; and to pay the dividends on all outstanding stock thereof.

(b) The grower shall be charged for such deductions only on account of warehouses or plants within his district or within his benefit, as determined conclusively by the association; and for such deductions the grower shall receive a proportionate interest in such corporation.

ANY OLD CROP TOBACCO MAY BE DELIVERED TO THE ASSOCIATION TO SELL.

17. If the grower has on hand, upon the date of mailing notice of the actual incorporation of the association, any tobacco of the 1921 or any other crops, free of liens and capable of delivery, he shall deliver such tobacco to the association, as it may direct, to be graded by the association and marketed by it, in pools wholly separate from all other deliveries hereunder, but generally in the manner here set forth.

DO NOT BREAK THE CONTRACT—THIS IS EXPENSIVE.

18. (a) Inasmuch as the remedy at law would be inadequate; and inasmuch as it is now and ever will be impracticable and extremely difficult to determine the actual damage resulting to the association should the grower fail so to sell and deliver all of his tobacco, the grower hereby agrees to pay to the association for all tobacco delivered, consigned, or marketed or withheld by or for him, other than in accordance with the terms hereof, the sum of 5 cents per pound as liquidated damages, averaged for all types and grades of tobacco, for the breach of this contract; all parties agreeing that this contract is one of a series dependent for its true value upon the adherence of each and all of the growers to each and all of the said contracts.

YOU WILL GET HIS TOBACCO ANYWAY.

(b) The grower agrees that in the event of a breach or threatened breach by him of any provision regarding delivery of tobacco, the association shall be entitled to an injunction to prevent breach or further breach thereof and to a decree for specific performance hereof; and the parties agree that this is a contract for the purchase and sale of personal property under special circumstances and conditions, and that the buyer can not go to the open markets and buy tobacco and replace any which the grower may fail to deliver.

VIOLATORS PAY THE COSTS OF FIGHTING THEM.

(c) If the association brings any action whatsoever by reason of a breach or threatened breach hereof, the grower agrees to pay to the association all costs of court, costs for bond and otherwise, expenses of travel and all expenses arising out of or caused by the litigation and any reasonable attorney's fee expended or incurred by it in such proceedings; and all such costs and expenses shall be included in the judgment and shall be entitled to the benefit of any lien securing any judgment hereunder.

THE CONTRACT IS COMPLETE ON ITS FACE.

19. The parties agree that there are no oral or other conditions, promises, covenants, representations, or inducements in addition to or at variance with any of the terms hereof, and that this agreement represents the voluntary and clear understanding of both parties fully and completely.

NATIONAL CENTRAL AGENCY.

20. The association is expressly authorized to exercise any or all of the grading, inspecting, marketing, or other powers or rights granted hereunder through any central agency to be organized for coordinating the activities of this and similar cooperative marketing associations in other States. The association shall, if possible, enter into any contract for such purpose and may agree to pool the products delivered hereunder with products of similar variety, grade, and quality delivered to generally similar associations under marketing agreements substantially the same in effect as this agreement; and to unite with any such associations in the joint purchase, construction, lease, or use of facilities and to assume obligations therefor.

Any costs of maintaining such central agency shall be prorated among the said associations on the basis of the gross-sale proceeds from the products delivered by them, respectively, and shall be considered part of the costs and deductions provided for in paragraph 6.

The association agrees to assist in forming such central agency as soon as any similar association is organized in the United States.

Read, considered, and signed by the grower as of the date determined by the association contract, in the State herein below indicated.

(End of marketing agreement.)

MINOR CHANGES MAY BE MADE.

21. These provisions are subject to minor modification or amendment by the organization committee on the suggestion of State officials or otherwise so as to carry out the general purposes hereof.

ALL CONTRACTS ARE THE SAME—THERE ARE NO FAVORITES.

22. It is expressly agreed that this instrument is one of a series substantially identical in terms. All such instruments shall be deemed one contract for the purpose of binding the subscribers to the same extent as if all of the subscribers had signed one such contract.

A, B, C OF BURLEY TOBACCO GROWERS' MARKETING CONTRACT—READ THE CONTRACT FIRST THEN CAREFULLY READ THIS A, B, C—IT CONTAINS ANSWERS TO ALL YOUR QUESTIONS.

"A, B, C" OF BURLEY MARKETING PLAN.

Q. Who will be the members of this association?—A. Any person who grows tobacco, whether he be a landowner, a renter, or a tenant. However, landlords who do not grow tobacco themselves but rent their land out to tenants must receive at least a part of the rental in tobacco in order to join.

Q. Who will manage the affairs of the association?—A. An expert manager hired by the directors of the association.

Q. How many directors will there be?—A. Twenty-two. The whole Burley producing area will be divided into 22 separate districts, each district representing as nearly as possible the same amount of tobacco grown as every other district. Each district will probably include two or three counties, but no county can be divided between two districts.

Q. How will the directors be elected?—A. The members of each county will meet and elect a delegate. Later the delegates elected at these county meetings within a given district will meet and choose the director who is to serve on the regular board. Such director must be a grower of tobacco within the district which he represents. In addition there will be three public directors chosen, one from each State, by the regularly appointed board.

Q. Will a large grower have more votes than a smaller one?—A. No. Each member will have one vote, regardless of whether he is a landlord, renter, or tenant, or whether he is a large grower or a small one. Every member of the association must have the same right, same privileges, and the same advantages that every other member has. Consequently, each member will share equally in the control of the association.

Q. Suppose a member can not attend these meetings, what then?—A. In that event he shall vote upon a ballot which will be sent to him, and shall mail it to the judges in charge of the election.

Q. May the growers vote by proxy?—A. No. Proxies might be manipulated to the disadvantage of members. Nothing will be done in connection with the association which in any way may give one member an advantage over another.

Q. What relation will the preliminary committee have with the association? —A. None whatever. The business of the preliminary committee is merely to conduct the organization campaign, to get signatures to the contract, etc. When 75 per cent of the Burley tobacco grown in Kentucky, Indiana, and Ohio is signed up, the preliminary committee will arrange for elections in the various counties. The growers at these elections will choose their own delegates to the district meetings where the directors will be chosen. When that is done the work of the preliminary committee will end.

Q. When will this first election be held?—A. As soon as 75 per cent of the tobacco is signed up. But this must be done before November 15, 1922. If 75 per cent is not signed up by that time, all the work will be dropped.

Q. Is it planned that the association will sell this year's crop of tobacco?—A. Every effort will be made to obtain the minimum of 75 per cent by November 15, this year. If the committee succeeds in this, the association will be incorporated, the election of directors held immediately, and this year's crop will be sold by the association.

Q. How will it be known that 75 per cent is actually signed up?—A. Every grower who signs a contract will be asked to state the number of pounds of tobacco grown by him last year and his estimated production this year. The preliminary committee will total all these amounts, which must be equal to at least 75 per cent of the whole crop, before the incorporation of the association is possible.

Q. As a member of the association, will I get the same price for my tobacco as the directors get for theirs?—A. Yes. The directors' tobacco will be graded and classified in the same manner that yours will be. Consequently, a particular classification will contain a certain amount of your tobacco and a certain amount of the directors' tobacco. Since the price received for each grade of tobacco will be averaged, each grower will receive the same price for a particular grade of tobacco as will the directors.

Q. Who will sell the tobacco for the members?—A. An expert tobacco salesman hired by the directors of the association.

Q. If I grow better tobacco than my neighbor, shall I receive more for it?—A. Yes. All the tobacco will be carefully graded and each grade sold separately. For example, there may be 25 or 30 grades, and tobacco grading No. 1 put in the No. 1 classification, tobacco grading No. 2 in the No. 2 classification, tobacco grading No. 3 in the No. 3 classification, and so on down the line. If the grower delivers 1,000 pounds of tobacco to the association, and has 500 pounds of No. 1 grade, 200 pounds of No. 2 grade, and 100 pounds in each of grades 3, 4, and 5, he will be given a receipt showing just how much tobacco of each grade he has. Consequently, the more tobacco he has grading No. 1 the larger will be his returns.

Q. If I join the association, when will I receive the first payment upon my tobacco?—A. As soon after delivery as the tobacco can be graded sufficiently to determine how much the banks will loan upon it. This loan will be made and paid over to you probably from one to three days after delivery. It will constitute the first payment upon your crop. As the tobacco is sold, the first money received will be used to pay the loan at the bank. After that, it will be divided among the growers as it is received.

Q. How large will the first payment be?—A. In normal years it should be equal to about 60 or 75 per cent of the sale value of the tobacco at time of delivery.

Q. What will be done with the tobacco between the time of its delivery and its sale?—A. It will be graded, dried, and stored.

Q. Who will do the drying and storing?—A. The association?

Q. Where will it get the plants and warehouses?—A. A separate warehousing corporation will be formed. This corporation will be the property of the association.

Q. How will the association buy these warehouses?—A. An amount of preferred stock equal to the value of the warehouses to be purchased will be issued. This stock will be issued in five different classes—classes A, B, C, D, and E. It will be sold to anybody who wants to buy it, whether they are growers or not. It will be provided in the stock certificate that the stock is to be bought back by the association, one-fifth at the end of the first year, one-fifth at the end of the second year, one-fifth at the end of the third year, one-fifth at the end of the fourth year, and one-fifth at the end of the fifth year.

Q. Where will the association get the money to buy back this preferred stock?—A. By deducting it from the sale price of tobacco. The growers' tobacco, therefore, will pay for the warehouses.

Q. What credit will the grower get for this?—A. As soon as a particular class is bought back by the association the amount of money from a particular grower's crop used in the repurchase of it will be figured and the grower given common stock equal to such amount. At the end of the 5-year period, therefore, the value of the warehouses will be represented by this common stock held by the growers. Consequently the growers themselves will own the warehouses at that time.

Q. Will a grower be permitted to sell his common stock?—A. No. If he sells his farm, however, or if he does not sign a second contract at the end of the first 5-year period, the association will buy back his common stock at its face value.

Q. Where will these warehouses be located?—A. Wherever they are needed.

Q. Who will determine whether or not a warehouse is needed in a particular locality?—A. That will vary. If it is to be a central warehouse used by growers of more than one district or community, the members of the association as a whole will determine this. But the necessity for a particular local warehouse will be determined by the growers of that locality. Separate corporations will be formed so that the growers within a particular locality will be the ones who will own these local warehouses after they are paid for. Their tobacco alone will be used in paying for them.

Q. How much of the returns from the tobacco can be used for warehouse purchases?—A. Two-fifths of a cent a pound for the 5-year period.

Q. Can a grower place a mortgage upon his crop?—A. Yes; and such crop mortgage will take precedence over the contract between the association and the grower. In such cases, however, an effort will be made by the association to sell the tobacco for the holder of the mortgage.

Q. If I sign the contract will it prevent me from selling my farm?—A. Nothing is said in the contract about land. The contract doesn't run with the land; it runs with the grower. Any member can sell his farm and stop growing tobacco; but if he does, he will have no vote in the affairs of the association.

Q. To whom will the association sell its tobacco?—A. To whomever will pay the highest prices—dealers, exporters, and manufacturers. It is proposed, however, to sell direct to exporters and manufacturers in so far as is possible.

Q. What will the association do if manufacturers refuse to deal with it?—A. If that should occur, the association would have the alternative of doing its own manufacturing. But the manufacturers will not refuse to buy from the association. Manufacturers need tobacco. The association will need to sell tobacco. There should be no fear of difficulty between the association and manufacturers.

Q. Does the grower agree to deliver a certain amount of tobacco to the association?—A. No. Only the amount that he grows. He may stop growing tobacco altogether if he wishes. But if he grows tobacco during the life of the contract he must deliver it to the association.

Q. If there is an overproduction will the association see that the crop is "cut out"?—A. No. The association will never instruct its members to "cut out" growing tobacco in case of overproduction. But the association does not intend to glut the market with tobacco. In any one year it will sell only the amount required by the manufacturers. Consequently in years of overproduction there will be a "carry-over" at the end of the selling season. Growers will only receive the loan value of this "carry-over." Consequently they will be penalized for overproduction the year that it occurs.

It is reasonable to assume that if the planting season finds a lot of tobacco of the previous year's crop still unsold the growers will use their own judgment as to how large the crop should be that year. Circulars will be sent out from time to time showing the amount of tobacco on hand, the condition of the market, and the approximate amount of tobacco needed for manufacturing during the coming selling season.

Q. What will happen if a grower refuses to deliver his tobacco to the association?—A. This would be expensive to the grower. The contract provides that in such a case the association may go before a court and get an injunction against the grower forbidding him to sell any tobacco to an outsider. Then the association can get a "decree of specific performance" from the court, which decree will command the grower to deliver his tobacco to the association. If the grower refuses to comply with the demand of the court he will be put in jail for contempt. In addition, such a "welching" grower will have to pay damages to the association equal to 5 cents a pound for all tobacco sold by him before the court order was issued.

Q. How do you know that this can be done?—A. It has already been done in 14 such cases. The type of contract used by the association is absolutely binding. Courts have ruled the legality of this contract so many times that this point is settled beyond question.

OUTLINE OF PLAN, "COOPERATIVE" BURLEY TOBACCO MARKETING ASSOCIATION.

The organization committee on cooperative Burley tobacco marketing, with Judge Robert W. Bingham as chairman, are recommending to the growers of Burley tobacco the so-called "California plan" of cooperative marketing.

BEST AUTHORITIES CONSULTED BY COMMITTEE.

The plan was adopted after weeks of careful study and investigation, covering a series of conferences with some of the best authorities in the United States upon cooperative marketing and finance. Among them was Mr. Aaron Sapiro, the California attorney, who has led in the work of organizing the commodity associations of California and other Western and Southern States.

PLAN INDORSED AT MANY PUBLIC MEETINGS OF GROWERS.

At Louisville on April 26 and 27 Mr. Sapiro explained the plan to a meeting of 30 representative growers from the Burley producing section of Kentucky, and the plan was accepted by every one present.

On May 5 at Paris, Judge Robert W. Bingham outlined the plan to about 300 growers, and they accepted it unanimously. Mr. J. R. Howard, president of the National Farm Bureau Federation, was present at this meeting and gave his indorsement to the idea.

Bankers of group 8 of the Kentucky Bankers Association at their annual meeting at Lawrenceburg May 25, after hearing Mr. Sapiro, passed a resolution indorsing the plan as outlined to them. The resolution reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the eighth group of the Kentucky State Bankers' Association go on record as favoring the cooperative plan of marketing Burley tobacco outlined by Aaron Sapiro and as declaring that the plan is both wise and feasible as applied to the sale of Burley tobacco in this and adjoining States."

At Versailles the same day a meeting of 50 of the largest and most influential tobacco farmers of the whole blue grass section of the State listened to Mr. Sapiro more than two hours. It was the consensus of opinion expressed at that meeting that the Burley tobacco industry should be organized upon the so-called California plan.

On May 26 at Lexington representatives from nearly all the Burley producing counties unanimously indorsed the plan and indicated that the organization committee on cooperative Burley tobacco marketing should proceed with the organization of a permanent cooperative marketing association for the whole Burley tobacco growing industry.

Finally the regular meeting of group four of the Kentucky Bankers' Association at Elizabethtown on May 30, after hearing Mr. Sapiro explain the plan for cooperative marketing, unanimously indorsed that method of marketing as applying to Burley tobacco, in the following language:

"Be it resolved by the fourth group of the Kentucky Bankers' Association, That as it is the opinion of this group that the cooperative plan for marketing Burley tobacco, as outlined by Mr. Sapiro, is feasible and well adapted to the needs of Kentucky and adjacent States, this group hereby indorses the plan and pledges its hearty support and assistance in presenting it to tobacco growers of Kentucky."

ORGANIZE ON THE CALIFORNIA PLAN.

It is proposed that growers in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and other Burley-producing States organize themselves into a cooperative marketing association upon a plan similar to that of the large commodity-selling associations in California and other Western States, where cooperative marketing has been developed over a period of 25 years of successful operation.

A NONSTOCK COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION COMPOSED OF GROWERS ONLY—GROWERS CONTRACTS UNBREAKABLE.

There will be one solid organization of Burley tobacco growers, each grower signing, with all the others, an absolutely binding contract to sell through the association all the Burley tobacco which he grows for a period of five years.

The association will be without capital stock and will be operated strictly upon a nonprofit basis. The main office will be at Lexington.

MEMBERS NOT OBLIGED TO GROW TOBACCO.

The growers will not be required to grow a given amount of tobacco—any one of them may stop growing tobacco altogether. They are merely required to deliver to the association all the Burley tobacco they raise or have an interest in as landlord or otherwise.

GROWERS WILL RECEIVE THE FULL SALE VALUE OF TOBACCO LESS NECESSARY OPERATING EXPENSES.

In return for the grower's agreement to deliver for sale through the association all the tobacco grown by him over a period of five years, the association will agree to sell such tobacco at the best prices obtainable, and return to the grower the full amount received, less actual operating expenses.

There are no profits in the management of cooperative marketing associations; expenses, therefore, are always small. For example, the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, which does a business of approximately $60,000,000 a year, makes its sales at a cost to the growers of less than 3 per cent.

MEMBERS WILL BE TREATED ALIKE, ALL RECEIVING EQUAL PRICES FOR THE SAME GRADE OF TOBACCO.

The tobacco of all the members will be carefully graded and sold according to the grades and classifications to be established by the association.

Prices received for tobacco of a given grade will be averaged and each grower will be paid the average price for all his deliveries of tobacco of that grade. Thus, all members of the association will receive equal prices for tobacco of like grades.

SUBSTANTIAL ADVANCES MADE TO GROWERS AS TOBACCO IS DELIVERED TO THE ASSOCIATION.

As soon as a member's tobacco is graded he will be given a receipt showing the amount of each grade of tobacco he has delivered to the association, and a loan will be obtained for him equal to the loan value of his deliveries. This loan will constitute the first payment upon his crop.

MONEY PAID OVER TO GROWERS AS SOON AS SALES ARE MADE.

As the tobacco is sold, returns from the first sales will be used to repay the loan. After that, money as it is received from sales will be divided among the growers according to the amount of tobacco of the different grades which each member has delivered to the association.

GROWERS WILL FORM A SUBSIDIARY WAREHOUSING CORPORATION.

The growers through their association will organize a warehousing corporation for the receiving, grading, drying, and storing of tobacco awaiting sale. This corporation will lease or purchase such warehouses and other facilities as are necessary to meet the needs of the association in every community or locality.

PREFERRED STOCK SOLD TO ANYBODY.

The financing of the warehouse corporation will be provided by the issue of preferred stock, which will be offered for sale to the investing public. In addition, the association may use this stock as payment to owners of warehouses for their plants and facilities. The preferred stock will have no vote, but will be guaranteed cumulative interest at 8 per cent.

WAREHOUSES PURCHASED UPON EASY TERMS.

The preferred stock will be sold in five classes, one class to be redeemed or repurchased at the end of each year for a period of five years. Each year a sufficient amount will be deducted or set aside from the returns on sales to buy back one class of the preferred stock. As each class is redeemed, each grower will be given common stock equal to the amount of such deductions as are made from his deliveries of tobacco for the buying back of this stock.

ONLY GROWERS CAN VOTE.

The common stock will have all the voting power, consequently the control of the affairs of the subsidiary warehousing corporation will be entirely in the hands of the members of the marketing association.

AMOUNT OF PREFERRED STOCK ISSUE LIMITED.

The contract provides that the amount of preferred stock thus issued for the purchase of local and district warehouses for handling and storing tobacco shall not exceed two-fifths of a cent per pound upon the tobacco handled each year.

ONLY GROWERS CAN BELONG.

No one not an actual grower of tobacco can be a member of the organization. As soon as a member ceases to be a grower, his membership in the organization will be automatically suspended.

AFFAIRS IN CONTROL OF GROWERS.

The Burley tobacco-producing area will be divided into 22 districts. At a special meeting the growers from the counties making up each district will elect delegates who will choose the director to represent them on the managing board. Every director must be a member grower from the district which he represents. It will be his duty always to serve the interests of the members of his district to the best of his ability.

ALL GROWERS WILL HAVE EQUAL REPRESENTATION.

All districts shall include as nearly as can be made possible, the same estimated production, but no county can be divided between two districts. If in any year the membership gains of particular districts are materially larger than those of other districts, there will be a reapportionment made by the board of directors in order to maintain approximately equal representation of the districts.

ONE MAN—ONE VOTE.

Every member of the association will have only one vote, consequently a fully democratic type of organization will be provided.

LOCAL BRANCHES WILL BE MAINTAINED.

Every district, county, and central locality shall have its own informal local branch of the organization, and in addition to the regular board of directors each district will have its own set of officers who may attend directors' meetings and advise with them in the conduct of the association's affairs.

A STRONG ORGANIZATION OR NO ORGANIZATION.

Signatures to the growers' marketing agreement covering at least 75 per cent of the total production of Burley tobacco must be secured by November 15, 1922, or all of the contracts signed up to that time will be automatically canceled. This will insure an organization big enough to be a really dominant factor in the market at all times.

MAY START WITH 1921 CROP.

A strong effort will be made to obtain the necessary 75 per cent of the crop by November 15, 1921. If the committee is successful, the organization will handle this year's crop.

INFERIOR TOBACCO SOLD SEPARATELY.

If a grower delivers to the association any tobacco of quality too poor to be sold with any of the established grades, such tobacco will be sold separately and the grower will receive only the actual price obtained upon such separate sale.

By unanimous consent, Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska and Mr. VARE were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of this measure it might be well to remember that it is the first bill reported under the Director of the Budget and the first indication of the advantages of the budget system is shown in its compilation.

Much has been done in this measure to demonstrate that the budget is a move in the right direction. As an instance, I will cite the bill contains appropriations which are $17,770,591 less than the total 1922 appropriations for the Treasury Department, but of this amount $12,696,827 was reduced by the Appropriations Committee and not by the Director of the Budget.

The chairman of the Appropriations Committee deserves every compliment which has been given him on the speedy and efficient work he has performed in having this bill reported at such an early date and showing such wonderful savings for the Government.

Mr. MARTIN B. MADDEN has been courteous in every respect throughout the hearings on this bill, but firm in his endeavor to lower the cost of government to the people of the United States. His committee has not permitted a single increase in lump-sum appropriations for salaries and no specific increases have been allowed.

Congress and the country are to be congratulated upon having a chairman of the Appropriations Committee who has had vast business experience and who has a thorough congressional training. If he continues his aggressiveness and vigilance on all the appropriation bills, and I know he will, he very probably will achieve the title, as has been said, of the "watchdog of the Treasury." He has demonstrated that preserving and intelligent ability to secure the cooperation of the heads of the departments.

The decreases in appropriations, made one after another, were in a majority of cases made with the approval of the department chiefs. They do not represent economy of the cheeseparing variety but sound business sense injected into Government business.

Referring again to the budget, it is a framework upon which a system of constructive authority can be built around the Chief Executive with the budget officer as his mouthpiece. The only means by which the system will accomplish all it is intended to do is by presidential pressure, and presidential pressure can be slight until it becomes known that an officer of the Government under Civil Service must make his record after employment as well as during his examination for the place.

What has been done in this bill can be done in every bill, and I have every confidence in the various subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee to pare the appropriations to the limit. With the proper insistence on the part of the President, the department heads will keep within the appropriations passed by Congress, and I venture to say that a saving of half a billion dollars will be made by the Government by the operation of the budget system within a year.

The President has held several meetings with the bureau chiefs, and this bill we are now considering reflects considerable economy. But with all this Gen. Charles G. Dawes, who is an untiring official, who is not only capable and industrious, admits that the surface has hardly been scratched. He did not have time to go into all the details of the work because of the necessity of submitting the budget to Congress at an early date according to law.

According to the hearings, however, time was not the only thing that he had to meet. Policies of the Government as laid down by Congress should be to put more business into Government affairs and to keep less Government in business. It should be said for the budget officer that at no time did he attempt to usurp the prerogatives of Members of Congress. He confined his labors to economy and efficiency based on policies laid down by Congress.

In working for economy and efficiency the Appropriations Committee and the House of Representatives are only making good to the people of the United States the pledge of the Republican Party in its platform, upon which our President and the Republican Members of this chamber were elected. I refer to the plank in the platform which pledged the party to—a careful readjustment to a peace-time basis and to a policy of rigid economy, to the better coordination of departmental activities, to the elimination of unnecessary officials and employees, and to the raising of the standard of individual efficiency.

With the firm determination of the chairman of the committee in command the same policy of economy and efficiency as is demonstrated in the present bill will be carried out in the remainder of the appropriation bills. The public will know that these pledges of the Republican Party are to be carried out and the confidence of the people in the party, so ably demonstrated last year, will be maintained and strengthened.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. DE VEYRA].

Mr. DE VEYRA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some remarks on the so-called report of the Woods-Forbes commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from the Philippines asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, namely:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The paragraph is still open for points of order and amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1922.

Hon. FREDERICK GILLETT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I beg to submit my resignation as a member of the following committees:

Roads.
Insular Affairs.
Revision of Laws and Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Yours, respectfully,

R. WALTON MOORE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. GARNER. I offer the resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 260.

Resolved, That ROBERT WALTON MOORE, Member of Congress from the eighth district of Virginia, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution is agreed to.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. OSBORNE, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. STEVENSON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

Mr. HOGAN (at the request of Mr. KLINE of New York) on account of illness.

Mr. RAKER, additional leave of absence for five days, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, January 6, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

450. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of money expended for the encouragement of the breeding of riding animals suitable for the military service; to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

451. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report showing the number and cost of publications issued and distributed by the Panama Canal during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Printing.

452. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting draft of a bill to continue until June 30, 1923, the Naval Militia as a part of the Naval Reserve force; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

453. A letter from the President of the United States, transmitting suggested legislation authorizing the Secretary of War to expend from the appropriation for "Disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees" a sum not exceeding $856,680 for the purchase of real estate in Europe for burying places for American military dead (H. Doc. No. 145); to the Committees on Military Affairs and Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 59) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to protect certain restricted members of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 545), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. VAILE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7053) to grant certain lands to the city of Canon City, Colo., for a public park, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 544), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from consideration of the bill (H. R. 9146) granting a pension to Abner Lehman, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HUTCHINSON: A bill (H. R. 9751) extending the time for completion of the bridge across the Delaware River authorized by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co., or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River," approved the 24th day of August, 1912; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BIRD: A bill (H. R. 9752) to provide for improving, remodeling, and extending the Federal grounds and buildings now housing the post office at Wichita, Kans., and acquiring other or additional site therefor, if necessary; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: A bill (H. R. 9753) to secure Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 9754) providing that proposed legislation dealing with Indian affairs be submitted to Indian councils; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9760) granting a pension to Daniel L. B. Downey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9761) granting a pension to Rosetta Davis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 9762) for the relief of J. P. Littell; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: A bill (H. R. 9763) granting a pension to George W. Matthews; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9764) granting a pension to James U. Brigham; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HIMES: A bill (H. R. 9765) granting a pension to Catharine Davis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PADGETT: A bill (H. R. 9766) granting a pension to R. T. Crews; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RODENBERG: A bill (H. R. 9767) granting an increase of pension to Peter Urban; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHELTON: A bill (H. R. 9768) granting a pension to Eliza F. Atkinson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9769) granting a pension to Julia A. Dugan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9770) granting an increase of pension to Clara Blunt; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. VAILE: A bill (H. R. 9771) granting an increase of pension to Henry F. Tower; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. VOLK: A bill (H. R. 9772) granting a pension to Isidore Cohen; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WEAVER: A bill (H. R. 9773) granting a pension to Levi J. Tipton; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

3407. By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of J. W. H. Eason, exalted leader of the American Negro, and others, urging Congress for the early passage of the Dyer antilynching bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3408. By Mr. DYER: Letter from the George P. Plant Milling Co., of St. Louis, Mo., protesting against making the Fordney tariff bill permanent; also letter from the St. Louis Cash Register Co. (Inc.), of St. Louis, Mo., asking that the present tariff bill be amended or revised; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3409. Also, letters and petitions from the following organizations and business people in St. Louis, protesting against the increased cost in first-class postage: The Visiting Nurses' Association; South Forest Park Residents' Improvement Association; Kurlander Bros. & Harfield; Williams Patent Crusher & Pulverizer Co.; St. Louis Convention, Publicity, and Tourist Bureau; the Automobile Club; Columbia Terminals Co.; International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers; Hess & Culbertson Jewelry Co.; International Shoe Co.; O. C. Conkling; Dr. R. L. Alsaker; Art Publication Society; Missouri Sunday School Association; Whistle Co.; Talbot Manufacturing Co.; Bayle Food Products Co.; Home Life Insurance Co.; Milbradt Manufacturing Co.; St. Louis Clock & Silverware Co.; Hibbeler Leaf Tobacco Co.; the Electric Storage Battery Co.; St. Louis Chamber of Commerce; United Christian Missionary Society; and petition from St. Louis firms; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

3410. By Mr. GALLIVAN: Petition of William A. L. Bazeley, commissioner and State forester, Commonwealth of Massachusetts, protesting against the transfer of the Forest Service and the national forests, in whole or in part, from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior, this matter being covered by House bill 5694 and Senate bills 2740 and 2382; to the Committee on the Territories.

3411. Also, petition of the Boston Varnish Co., J. B. Lord, president, relative to the proposed duty on raw sugar; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3412. Also, petition of the United Improvement Association of Boston, protesting against the passage of the bill now pending in Congress which would prevent the use of special-delivery stamps on any mail matter except letters; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

3413. Also, petition of William C. Adams, director division of fisheries and game, Commonwealth of Massachusetts, recommending the passage of the bill presented by Congressman ANTHONY, of Kansas, providing for the establishment of national bird refuges and public hunting grounds; to the Committee on Agriculture.

3414. By Mr. GERNERD: Papers to accompany House bill 9736, granting an increase of pension to Mary R. Pendleton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

3415. By Mr. HAYS: Petition of J. S. Clark and 16 other citizens of Douglas County, Mo., against the passage of House bill 4388; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3416. By Mr. KISSEL: Petition of the adjutant general of the State of New York, urging the passage of House bill 7943; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

3417. By Mr. SMITH of Michigan: Petition of 62 citizens of Michigan, protesting against passage of Senate bill 1948, regulating Sunday observance by force in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

3418. By Mr. SNYDER: Petition of Owens & Griffiths, of Utica, N. Y., opposing rates of duties advocated by California Almond and Walnut Growers' Association; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3419. By Mr. SWING: Petition of sundry citizens of California, protesting against the passage of the Sunday compulsory observance law; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

3420. Also, petition of various citizens of Bishop, Calif., opposing the passage of the compulsory Sunday observance law (S. 1948); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 6, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, remembrance of past mercies compels us to recognize constantly our dependence upon Thee, and as we enter upon the duties of the day we desire Thy help. So help us that all the while in the journey of life we may realize that goodness and grace are the portion promised to those who trust Thee. Hear us for Christ's sake. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

TYPEWRITERS, ETC., EXCHANGED BY FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement showing the number of typewriters, adding machines, etc., exchanged by the commission during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the International Reform Bureau at its twenty-seventh anniversary meeting, December 9, 1921, favoring the enactment of legislation providing for a national uniform divorce law, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the International Reform Bureau at its twenty-seventh anniversary meeting, December 9, 1921, favoring more stringent enforcement of the so-called Roddenbery Act, relative to interstate transmission of prize-fight motion pictures and amendment of that act so as to provide punishment for violation thereof by imprisonment in addition to fine, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the International Reform Bureau at its twenty-seventh anniversary meeting, December 9, 1921, favoring the enactment of legislation excluding fraudulent devices and lottery paraphernalia from the mails, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the International Reform Bureau at its twenty-seventh anniversary meeting, December 9, 1921, favoring the passage of Senate resolution 142, directing an investigation of the alleged political activities of the motion-picture industry, and the enactment of legislation to regulate motion pictures in interstate commerce, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2411) to vacate certain streets and alleys within the area known as the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia, and to authorize the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to its southern terminus south of Dahlia Street, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Blair Road, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 386) thereon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 1878) to permit the State of Montana to exchange cut-over timberlands granted for educational purposes for other lands of like character and approximate value, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 387) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 244) to provide for the disposition of abandoned portions of rights of way granted to railroad companies, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 388) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 1034) to establish a game sanctuary in the watershed of the South Fork of the Flathead River in the Flathead National Forest to perpetuate a breeding place for game animals, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 389) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 2556) for the relief of Edwin Gantner, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 390) thereon.

Mr. LADD, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1318) granting to certain claimants the preferential right to purchase certain alleged public lands in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 391) thereon.

INDIAN CHILDREN IN MONTANA STATE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 140) relative to payment of tuition for Indian children enrolled in Montana State public schools. The matter being of some urgency, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the joint resolution may be read before I consent to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Assistant Secretary read the joint resolution as follows:

Resolved, etc., That nothing contained in the provisions of section 10 of the act of February 14, 1920 (41 Stat. L., p. 421), and of section 10 of the act of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L., p. 1237), shall be construed to preclude the payment of tuition for Indian children enrolled and educated in Montana State public schools, pursuant to annual or existing appropriations of public money for payment of such tuition.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Montana to explain what change in the law is made by this measure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The joint resolution is presented at the request of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Appropriations have been made for the payment of tuition of Indian children attending public schools on the reservation. The Indians not paying any taxes, of course tuition is exacted of them, and appropriation has been made of $15,000 to cover the tuition; but there is another statute which provides that the appropriation shall not be available unless Indian children are admitted to the schools upon the same terms as white children. The comptroller has construed that statute as prohibiting the utilization of the appropriation, because he holds that the Indian children are not admitted upon the same terms as the white children, the white children being admitted without tuition while the Indian children are charged tuition. Therefore he holds up the appropriation. The department asks that tuition be permitted to be paid in accordance with the appropriation notwithstanding the provisions of the statute referred to by the comptroller.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the measure is a fair one.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEO N. LEVI MEMORIAL HOSPITAL, HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys I report back favorably, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the bill (S. 2186) granting certain lands in Hot Springs, Ark., to the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association, and I submit a report (No. 385) thereon.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the exclusive right to use, occupy, and enjoy the possession of all of lots Nos. 1 and 2, in block No. 114, in the city of Hot Springs, Ark., is by this act granted to the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas for the purpose of erecting and maintaining thereon an addition to or extension of its present hospital building, located on adjoining lots, Nos. 3 and 4, in said block 114, in said city of Hot Springs, Ark. The rights and privileges granted under this act shall continue as long as the property is used and occupied for the purposes mentioned in this act, subject, however, to the following conditions and limitations, namely, that unless said Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital shall within five years after the passage of this act erect and equip a suitable and sightly addition to or extension of its present hospital building or if said Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association shall at any time hereafter use or permit the premises to be used for any other purpose than that herein granted, or if at any time pay wards are maintained in any buildings erected upon the lots hereby granted, then and in either event all the rights, privileges, and powers by this act granted and conferred upon said association shall be forfeited to the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association is now operating a hospital on lots adjoining those to be granted under the terms of the bill. It is an organization conducted almost entirely for charity. It is performing a wonderful work. While those who maintain it are of the Jewish faith, yet no racial or other distinction whatever is made in conferring benefits in the hospital. Benefits are conferred upon all classes and all races. I have visited the hospital myself within the last few months, and regard it as very useful and very beneficial to the community.

In Hot Springs there appear annually many hundreds of persons who are indigent and who require hospital treatment. This organization is furnishing that treatment. Its quarters are too small to meet present and growing requirements, and it is absolutely necessary that it enlarge its plant. The bill grants additional ground, upon which an annex may be constructed.

Hot Springs is a national park. For more than half a century its waters have been regarded as a specific cure for rheumatism, gout, and many other diseases. Thousands of poor, afflicted persons are attracted there for treatment. These conditions impose heavy burdens on the community, and there exists an imperative demand for the enlargement of the hospital operated by the Leo N. Levi Memorial Association. This enlargement will require the additional space which the lots granted in this bill afford.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 2934) to provide for the issuance to John W. Stanton by the Secretary of the Interior of patent to certain land, upon payment therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2935) to amend section 3 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish free transportation and subsistence from Europe and Siberia to the United States for certain destitute discharged soldiers and their wives and children," approved June 30, 1921, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 2936) authorizing the Postmaster General to investigate conditions arising from contracts in star route, screen wagon, and other vehicle service entered into prior to January 1, 1919; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 2937) to continue in effect paragraph 8 of the section relating to medals of honor, distinguished-service crosses, and distinguished-service medals of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, as approved July 9, 1918 (Fortieth Statutes, p. 871); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2938) to prohibit building by the Federal Reserve Board, or by Federal reserve banks and branch banks, without consent of Congress, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 2939) for the relief of the William D. Mullen Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 2940) granting an increase of pension to Charles L. Berkheimer; to the Committee on Pensions.

APPOINTMENT OF EX-SERVICE MEN AS POSTMASTERS.

Mr. ROBINSON. I introduce a bill to authorize and provide for a preference to ex-service men in the appointments of postmasters. I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

The bill (S. 2933) to authorize and provide for a preference to ex-service men in the appointments of postmasters was read twice by its title and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the Civil Service Commission certifies the names of persons eligible for appointment to the position of postmaster it shall certify only the names of persons who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during the World War and who were honorably discharged therefrom or separated therefrom under honorable conditions whenever any such persons are eligible for such appointment, and such persons shall be given preference and priority in such appointment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—PAIRS.

Mr. BORAH. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 205) was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be, and the same are hereby, amended by adding a new rule to be inserted in its appropriate place among the standing rules, to wit: That pairs will not hereafter be recognized by the Senate except in instances where a Senator is detained from the Senate on account of illness or upon the official business of the Senate.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK QUARTERS.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I have two communications from the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board in relation to the quarters of the Federal reserve banks and their branches. I ask to have them printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 5, 1922.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am inclosing for your information copy of a letter which the board is sending to-day to the chairman of the board of directors of each Federal reserve bank.

The buildings of the Federal Reserve Banks of Richmond, Dallas, and Kansas City have been completed, and they are now being occupied by the banks. The Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta has outgrown the building which it is now occupying, and the work of constructing an annex large enough to meet present requirements is now well under way. The building of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston is nearly completed, and some departments of the bank have already been moved into the new building. The buildings of the Federal Reserve Banks of Chicago and San Francisco are also well advanced, and it is expected they will be ready for occupancy within the next few months. Contracts have been let in connection with the construction of buildings of the Federal Reserve Banks of New York and Cleveland which can not now be canceled, and the work of construction must accordingly proceed. The Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia was able to purchase a building which after certain changes and the addition of a large vault is suitable for its purposes, and this building is occupied by the bank. The contracts for the foundations of the building for the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis were let some time ago, and the foundations will be completed within the next 10 days. No contracts, however, have yet been let for the superstructure. No contracts have so far been let for the building of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland has completed repairs and additions to the building of its branch at Pittsburgh, and has acquired a lot for the use of its Cincinnati branch, but no contracts have been let for the construction of the building and that branch is still occupying leased quarters which are very inadequate. The Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond some years ago purchased a building for the use of its Baltimore branch, which has proved to be entirely too small, and more than a year ago it acquired a larger building site in that city. It is proposed to erect a building upon the site so acquired and upon its completion to sell the building which is now being occupied by the Baltimore branch, but no contracts have been let for the new building. The Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta has purchased a building for the use of its branch at Nashville, which must, however, be remodeled before it can be utilized, and no contracts have yet been let for these necessary changes. The Atlanta bank has purchased a site upon which it is proposed to erect a building for the use of its branch in New Orleans, but the construction contracts have not yet been let. It has also purchased a lot for the use of its Jacksonville branch, but has not yet entered into any contracts for the construction of the building. The Detroit branch of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago is occupying leased quarters which are entirely inadequate and unsuitable in many respects, and the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago has recently bought the ground in Detroit upon which it proposes to erect a building, but no contracts for construction have yet been let. The Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis more than a year ago purchased a lot upon which it proposes to construct a building for the use of its branch in Little Rock. Plans have been made but contracts have not yet been let. The St. Louis bank purchased a building in Louisville which has proved to be entirely too small, and it has since acquired 50 feet of ground adjoining on which it proposes to construct a 2-story annex uniform in style with the present building. Contracts for construction have not yet been let. The Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis completed some time ago its building for the branch at Helena, Mont. The Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City has acquired a lot in Denver, but has not yet let contracts for the construction of a building which is badly needed. It has not yet let contracts for the building to be used by its branch in Oklahoma City, but has purchased a building for the use of its Omaha branch. The Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas completed about two years ago the building for its branch at El Paso, and the work of construction on the building for its branch at Houston is well under way. The Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco about a year ago bought a lot for the use of its Salt Lake City branch, but has not yet begun the preparation of plans for a building and consequently has let no contracts.

No real estate has yet been bought for the other branches of Federal reserve banks—Buffalo (New York), Birmingham (Atlanta), Memphis (St. Louis), and Portland, Seattle, Spokane, and Los Angeles (San Francisco)—which are occupying leased quarters, which answer the purpose for the time being, but it is evident that ultimately all these branches must either be given more adequate quarters or must be abandoned.

Since the Subtreasuries were abolished the Federal reserve banks have been exercising the functions formerly performed by the Subtreasuries, and these functions have been extended, wherever present facilities admit, to the branches. In view of the large amounts of actual cash and securities held by all Federal reserve banks and branches, it is very important that they be provided with proper vault facilities. Several of the Federal reserve banks are very anxious to let contracts and proceed with the work of construction of buildings, which are urgently needed, but the board is not willing that anything should be done to defeat the intent of Congress. As a vote will be taken on the pending amendment at an early date, it is not thought that any serious inconvenience will result from awaiting an expression of the will of Congress.

It seems proper to call your attention to the fact that full and detailed reports of the building operations of Federal reserve banks have been made to Congress in the annual report of the Federal Reserve Board each year, as well as in the board's reply to Senate resolution 153, which has been published as Senate Document 75.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Hon. GEORGE P. MCLEAN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 5, 1922.

Subject: Building operations of Federal reserve banks.

CHAIRMEN OF ALL FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

DEAR SIR: On December 19, 1921, an amendment was proposed by Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, to Senate bill 2263, which by agreement will come to a vote on the 17th instant, reading as follows: "The Federal Reserve Board shall have no authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any building of any kind or character, or to authorize the erection of any building, without the consent of Congress having previously been given therefor in express terms."

The Federal Reserve Board has never assumed that it has authority to enter into any contract for the erection of any kind of building. The directors of Federal reserve banks are, however, empowered under the provisions of section 4 of the Federal reserve act "to make contracts" and "to exercise all powers specifically granted by the provisions of this act and such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking within the limitations prescribed by this act."

The board has always taken the view that the law authorizies directors of Federal reserve banks to provide their banks and branches with such buildings and equipment as may be necessary for the proper conduct of their business. There is nothing in the Federal reserve act that requires the specific approval of building contracts by the Federal Reserve Board, but under its power of general supervision (par. j, sec. 11) the board has required all Federal reserve banks to submit for its consideration all options for the purchase of real estate, all plans and specifications for buildings and vaults, and has advised the banks that they should not enter into any contracts involving investments of this kind until the board had had an opportunity to make any suggestions or offer any objections as it might deem proper.

In some cases buildings of Federal reserve banks and branches have been completed and in others contracts have been let which must necessarily be carried out. Although the amounts involved in the erection of Federal reserve bank buildings represent investments of the banks' own funds and not the expenditure of public moneys, the board feels, nevertheless, that no attempt should be made by any Federal reserve bank to anticipate any action by Congress which may tend to restrict or modify its present authority, and you are requested to advise your directors at once that the board advises that no new contracts for the construction of a building be entered into by them until there has been opportunity of ascertaining the disposition of Congress toward the amendment above quoted.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

FRANCO-JAPANESE PACT.

Mr. BORAH. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a portion of an article written by Frank H. Simonds. I have marked the portion of it which I desire to have inserted. It quotes a treaty or an understanding or agreement between France and Japan with reference to Far Eastern matters and gives some comment on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Washington Herald, Jan. 6, 1922.]

SIMONDS SEES UNITED STATES TANGLE IN FIVE-POWER TREATY.—EXPRESSES SURPRISE THAT JAP-FRANCO PACT WOULD NOT BE ABROGATED.

(By Frank H. Simonds.)

* * * * * * *

Perhaps more important was the problem raised by the Franco-Japanese treaty of 1907. It will be recalled that the chief reason for the four-power treaty was the American desire to eliminate the Anglo-Japanese alliance and that the four-power treaty represented that substitute for the Anglo-Japanese alliance which the United States Government was willing to accept. From the American point of view the United States was willing to agree to respect the integrity of Japan and to consult with the Japanese, with the British, and with the French in case of a difference between two of the four powers signing the treaty, or in the case of a difference between one of them and an outside power. In return for this Great Britain and Japan agreed in article 4 of the treaty that the Anglo-Japanese alliance should be terminated.

TREATY TEXT SURPRISE.

What occasioned surprise yesterday was the discovery of the text and the significance of the Franco-Japanese treaty. This brief treaty is as follows:

"Animated by the desire to strengthen the relations of amity between them and to remove from these relations all causes of misunderstanding for the future, have decided to conclude the following arrangement: 'The Governments of Japan and France, being agreed to respect the independence and integrity of China, as well as the principle of equal treatment in that country for the commerce and subjects or citizens of all nations, and having a special interest to have the order and pacific state of things preserved, especially in the regions of the Chinese Empire adjacent to the territories where they have the rights of sovereignty, protection, or occupation, engage to support each other for assuring the peace and security in those regions, with a view to maintain the respective situation and the territorial rights of the two high-contracting parties on the continent of Asia.'"

Examination of this document raises several questions at once. First of all, why did not the four-power treaty provide that this Franco-Japanese alliance should be terminated when the four-power treaty should be ratified? Second, what complications are involved in a four-power agreement among France, Great Britain, the United States, and Japan, covering the regions of the Pacific Ocean, and the two-power treaty between Japan and France dealing with the mainland of China? Under the four-power treaty we are bound to consult with Japan in case she feels herself threatened by any power within or without the agreement. But the slightest examination of the terms of the Franco-Japanese alliance demonstrates a fertile field for differences between Japan and France on the one hand and China or Russia on the other. Indeed, the recent charges of the Tchita Government take on a slightly different aspect when viewed in the light of the language of this treaty.

FOUR-NATION ASSOCIATION.

At the present moment it would seem that the four-power treaty establishes an association among four nations in the Pacific. Two of them—Great Britain and Japan—were bound by a formal alliance; two—Japan and France—by a kind of contract which closely resembles an alliance. Since the four-power treaty does not specifically provide for the termination of the two-power treaty, it remains living and effective. Japan is thus able to call upon France for support in any questions arising on the mainland of Asia and in any conference called as a consequence of difficulties arising on the mainland of Asia. France and Japan would seem bound to act in unison within the four-power conference, one of the functions of which is to determine what, if any, action shall be taken in view of existing conditions.

Inquiry discloses the fact that up to the present moment there have been no discussions whatever in the conference looking to abrogation of the Franco-Japanese alliance. There was a suggestion yesterday that possibly this treaty might be disposed of in the nine-power treaty, also in process of drafting, but there was a very frank declaration that the four-power treaty had been negotiated and signed without any regard to the Franco-Japanese alliance, and that France had been asked to join Great Britain, the United States, and Japan in this Pacific agreement without receiving any request to drop the Japanese alliance.

In sum, an examination of the subject of the Pacific agreement indicated that the English expected and the Americans did not expect some kind of an agreement for conference and consultation in the five-power treaty similar to that found in the four-power treaty. And it similarly disclosed the fact that up to the present moment nothing has been done to eliminate the Franco-Japanese treaty, which parallels closely the Anglo-Japanese treaty, and pledges to all the four nations signatory to the Pacific act to mutual support on the Asiatic mainland.

FINANCIAL CONDITIONS IN FRANCE.

Mr. KING. I should like to have inserted in the RECORD a brief statement appearing in last night's Star from Mr. Paul Scott Mowrer concerning the expenditures made by France in the rehabilitation of her devastated territory. There has been, I think, very much unjust criticism of France recently in American newspapers and in the foreign press, and I believe these figures will throw some light upon the frightful financial burdens which were imposed upon France by reason of the war, and occasioned by the devastation of her territory and her efforts to restore it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Washington Evening Star, Jan. 5, 1922.]

FRANCE LOANING ON GERMAN DEBT—GOVERNMENT HAS ADVANCED FIFTY BILLION FRANCS ON EXPECTED PAYMENTS—ADVISER EXPLAINS POLICY—CASENAVE TELLS HOW ISSUES OF NOTES WERE REPLACED BY TREASURY BILLS.

(By Paul Scott Mowrer.)

The French Government has already advanced 50,000,000,000 francs for pensions and the reconstruction of the devastated regions against the payments hopel for ultimately from Germany, according to a statement made to me to-day by Maurice Casenave, chief financial adviser to the French delegation. As a result, reconstruction is well under way. Homes have had to wait; but the fields are under cultivation again, and one sees in the devastated regions "beautifully equipped new factories, surrounded by huts, in which employer and employees alike are living in hardship.

ACCUSED OF JUGGLERY.

"The French Government has been accused of having recourse to financial jugglery instead of paying for reparations by means of taxation," continued M. Casenave. "But how could such enormous sums be covered by taxation? We have been deprived of about one-fifth of our taxable revenue by devastation. The rest of France has suffered from the war. Two million able-bodied young men are dead or crippled; the rest of the men were all mobilized. Can it be imagined that, in these conditions, the rest of France could be taxed without limit? According to calculations recently made, England is being taxed 26 per cent of its total annual income, the United States 8 per cent, Germany 12 per cent, and France 19 per cent. Is 19 per cent too little considering that of a total population of 40,000,000, 4,000,000, living in the devastated regions, were ruined, and are not taxable?

LOANS ARE FLOATED.

"To meet the reparations expenses, the Government therefore appealed to the people for loans. Direct loans were floated by the Government, others by a special bank, the Credit National, created for the purpose still others, by corporations formed to employ the organized credit of the devastated populations themselves.

"At first, the amount of paper money was also increased but the Government, considering that this inflation endangered public credit, put an end to the issue of notes by the Banque de France. In the two last years, not only has the printing of notes completely stopped but the outstanding circulation has been reduced, at the rate of about $2,000,000 francs a month, or a total of more than 2,000,000,000 francs.

EXPLAINS TREASURY BILLS.

"Instead of inflating the currency, as the Germans have done, France issued treasury bills. This policy needs explanation.

"Neither taxation nor the slow process of consolidated loans were equal to the immediate need of the devastated regions. The Government had therefore to devise means for mobilizing all the available funds of France.

"This was done by issuing treasury bills, and France has been reproached with the fact. However, thanks to these treasury bills, the 50,000,000,000 francs needed for pensions and reconstruction, which should have been paid by Germany but was not, have been successfully raised. Such a mobilization of credit is proof of the confidence the French people have in the country's financial power.

RESULTS OF POLICY.

"A policy can be judged by its results. These results are as follows:

"A large part of the work of reconstruction has been completed, a fact which will henceforth be of great help to the French treasury.

"The French people are hard at work in conditions of political and social peace. Since the war there have been strikes even in countries less hurt by the war than France; in France there are no strikes, there is no social unrest; everyone goes peacefully to his work. Of a population of 40,000,000, some 18,000 only are out of employment."

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 384) to require judges appointed under authority of the United States to devote their entire time to the duties of a judge was announced as first in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 214) to amend section 24 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 581) to repeal the act prohibiting increased pay under lump-sum appropriations to employees transferred within one year was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 582) to repeal section 5 of the act approved June 22, 1906, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

The bill (S. 1439) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended by the act of July 11, 1919, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who reported the bill, if he does not think it had better be put under Rule IX, so that it will not be necessary to state the bill every time the calendar is called, but it may be taken up for consideration and discussed under Rule IX, if that is desired at any time?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, when that bill was reported from the committee the bill which is known as the Sweet bill had not been passed. Some of the matters which are embraced in Senate bill 1439 are covered by the Sweet bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Most of them are covered by that bill, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I am under the impression that all the matters embraced in this bill are covered by the Sweet bill with possibly two exceptions. I am working on the matter now and trying to straighten it out. I shall offer an amendment to this bill or else let it go under Rule IX; but for the present I should like the bill merely to be passed over, retaining its place on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ELIZABETH WHITE.

The bill (S. 1467) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of Elizabeth White, administratrix of the estate of Samuel N. White, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that that bill has been objected to heretofore a number of times; but the beneficiary under it is an old lady, eighty-odd years of age, and if we are ever going to give her the relief contemplated by the bill we shall have to do it very soon or she will certainly get no benefit from it. Similar bills have heretofore passed both Houses of Congress, and on one occasion a like bill passed both the Senate and the other House, but through a clerical error failed to be signed by the President. The bill is certainly very meritorious, and I hope the Senator from Utah will not insist on his objection.

Mr. SMOOT. We can not, of course, discuss the bill under the five-minute rule. It embraces a claim for sugar and molasses.

Mr. RANSDELL. I beg the Senator's pardon; it is a claim for a boat.

Mr. SMOOT. A part of the claim is for a boat, but if the Senator will permit me I will state precisely what the claim is for. The amount of $4,700 is claimed for sugar and molasses, and for the use of the steamboat Red Chief for 825 days there is a claim for $23,100.

Mr. President, we have not of late passed such bills as this, and I think there ought to be some better understanding than we have here from the report which has been made on the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President and Senators, this bill, as I have stated, has been before Congress for a very long time. It has passed both Houses of Congress, not once but two or three times, passing first one House in a Congress and then the other House in a succeeding Congress. The claim has been recognized by the Court of Claims as certainly a valid claim against the Government, so far as the Court of Claims could recognize it as a valid claim.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us see if the Court of Claims did recognize the claim as a valid claim. I read from the report of the Committee on Claims as follows:

Samuel N. White (Elizabeth White, administratrix). (S. D. 258–55–2.) Tucker Act. This claim originally presented to Southern Claims Commission; referred to court first February 12, 1887, under Bowman Act; decedent found loyal in 1892, under that reference, but court in 1893 found adversely to claimant on merits.

I am objecting to the bill upon its merits, just as the court found that there was no merit in the claim. That finding was made in 1893. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1807) to aid in stabilizing the coal industry was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1016) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States" was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1375) to prohibit and punish certain seditious acts against the Government of the United States and to prohibit the use of the mails for the purpose of promoting such acts was announced as next in order.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The resolution (S. Res. 67) authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to hold hearings here or elsewhere and to employ a stenographer to report the same was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 63) for the relief of Lester A. Rockwell was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 491) to provide, without expenditure of Federal funds, the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] yesterday said he desired to see the Secretary of the Interior in regard to certain phases of this measure, and I desire also to see him. I suggest that the bill go over for to-day.

Mr. MCNARY. Yes; I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2051) to amend section 3142 of the Revised Statutes, to permit an increase in the number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue and in the number of collectors of internal revenue from 64 to 74, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

PUNISHMENT OF FEMALE OFFENDERS.

The bill (S. 1010) to amend sections 5549 and 5550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the bill has heretofore been considered as in Committee of the Whole and certain of the amendments reported by the committee have been agreed to.

Mr. KING. I think this is a measure in which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] is interested, and I call his attention to it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, are we proceeding by unanimous consent or under Rule VIII?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar is being considered under Rule VIII.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1010) to amend sections 5549 and 5550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment reported by the committee, which has not been agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 11, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 5550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and it hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5550. The Attorney General shall contract with the managers or persons having control of such houses of refuge for the imprisonment, subsistence, and proper employment of all such juvenile or female offenders, and shall give the several courts of the United States and of the District of Columbia notice of the places so provided for the confinement of such offenders; and they shall be sentenced to confinement in the house of refuge nearest the place of conviction so designated by the Attorney General."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it has been some time since this matter was before the Senate, and I have had no opportunity to refresh my memory concerning it. Furthermore, I have been engaged in a committee room for some time, and have lost to some extent the run of the business of the Senate for the last few weeks. I will be very glad if the Senator from Montana will permit the bill to go over to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will be very glad to accede to the request of the Senator if he will agree that at the next call of the calendar the bill may be taken up.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I thank the Senator, and I agree to that suggestion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the further consideration of the bill may be postponed and that the bill may resume its place on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 62) for the relief of Charles K. Bond, alias Kimball W. Rollins, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—CONSIDERATION OF NOMINATIONS.

The resolution (S. Res. 73) amending Rules XXXVII and XXXVIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, so as to provide for the consideration of nominations and treaties in open executive session unless otherwise ordered, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the resolution may be placed on the calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think any Senator will object to the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and Senate resolution 73 is transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1829) for the relief of Walter Runke was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2022) promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation in New Mexico was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, that bill will probably involve some discussion, and I ask to have it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 7) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia," approved February 4, 1913, was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that bill relates to the subject of increasing the rate of interest which may be charged by pawnbrokers in the District of Columbia. I think the rate which they are allowed to charge now is 1 per cent a month, or 12 per cent a year, and the bill seeks to do the Christian act of permitting some of these fellows to charge 2 per cent a month. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

GEORGE A. ROBERTSON.

The bill (S. 496) for the relief of George A. Robertson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the provisions of the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States receiving injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," are hereby extended to George A. Robertson for the loss of his right eye while employed by the Department of the Interior in Glacier National Park in the year 1913, and that he be paid such sums as would properly be due him within the provisions of section 4 of the said act of September 7, 1916. The United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized and directed to make payments in compliance with the terms of the said act of September 7, 1916, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of said commission. Any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated is hereby appropriated for the purpose of this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the senior Senator from Montana just what this amendment will grant George A. Robertson. The original bill proposed to make a direct appropriation of $5,000.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think that question may be answered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], who made the report. He is a member of the committee and made the report, and I ask him to answer the question. I think he can do it better than I.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, it has been some time since this report was made, and I confess that I am not entirely clear in regard to it now; but this I remember, I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Utah:

Robertson was a guard in the Park Service and in pursuance of his duty and in obedience to a direct order he went with a party to a certain place where they made a fire at a Government shack. Through the negligence of the Government employees who had previously occupied that shack, a cartridge had been left in such a place that when these men kindled the fire the cartridge exploded and destroyed the sight of this man's eye.

Instead of giving Robertson a lump sum of $5,000, the committee recommended that the provisions of the Federal compensation act be made to apply to his case, the accident having occurred before that law took effect. The sum is very much less than the $5,000 originally asked for, but I can not tell just how much it is.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill go over to-day.

Mr. MYERS. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the amendment would not give the man $5,000, or anything like it. It would give him a very moderate sum of money.

Mr. SMOOT. In the past claimants have been paid, for such an injury as this, one year's salary.

Mr. MYERS. Whatever is allowed would go to him. I think it would be something like that. It would be a very moderate sum.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I want to find out. I shall have no objection to it if it does not exceed that amount.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Utah what difference it makes what the amount is? It is exactly the amount that other Government employees suffering a like injury would get.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are a great many persons who suffered just the same as this man did before the passage of the law, and we have paid hundreds of claims, and we have paid them under then existing law. This is taking one of those claims and putting the claimant under another law, when the injury happened at a time when a law was in existence under which we know just what would have been paid him. All I want to know is just exactly how far this goes and what it involves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 985) to amend the provisions of an act relating to certain railway corporations owning or operating street railways in the District of Columbia, approved June 5, 1920, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1771) to authorize the United States, through the United States Shipping Board, to acquire a site on Hazzell Island, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, for a fuel and fuel-oil station and fresh-water reservoir for Shipping Board and other merchant vessels, as well as United States naval vessels, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is interested in that bill. When the bill was under consideration before some question arose as to the necessity of it. It went over then, as I understood, for further information. I do not see the Senator from Washington here, and I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1063) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Charlotte W. Miller was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over, because I think it is violative of the principle which heretofore has governed in these cases. I have no objection to the bill being referred to the Court of Claims for the purpose of ascertaining the facts and letting the court make findings, and then Congress can determine what course shall be taken. I think that has been the course usually pursued. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 48) authorizing retirement as warrant officers of certain Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1281) for the relief of Capt. Edward T. Hartmann, United States Army, and others, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2040) to provide for compulsory school attendance of children, to provide for the taking of a school census, to create the department of school attendance and work permits for the administration of this act and the act to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, within the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 32) for the relief of contractors, subcontractors, and material men who have suffered loss by reason of Government orders, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2170) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 150) to provide longevity pay for reserve officers and National Guard officers serving under orders of the War Department was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether that bill was not under consideration before?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it was.

Mr. KING. I thought we passed it.

Mr. SMOOT. An objection was raised by the Senator from Wisconsin just as we were going to pass the bill. It has been read.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1565) making eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided for officers of the Regular Army all officers of the United States Army during the World War who have incurred physical disability in line of duty was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1976) to amend the first paragraph of section 2 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1790) to place national guardsmen who entered the World War otherwise than through the draft on equal basis as to longevity and continuous-service pay with national guardsmen who were drafted was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1075) giving permanent rank to district superintendents of the Coast Guard on the retired list was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 115) directing an investigation of the administration of the Federal reserve system and the office of the Comptroller of the Currency was announced as next in order.

Mr. McLEAN. Let that go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I was just going to ask the chairman of the committee if he felt that this was an important matter now.

Mr. McLEAN. I have just suggested that the resolution go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This bill, being the unfinished business, will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize associations of producers of agricultural products was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

IMPORTATION OF SUGAR FROM ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to have the joint resolution disposed of at the present time, if possible. I ask that it be taken up.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I was going to suggest to the Senator making the objection that I hope he will withdraw it. A similar bill was passed here several days ago, where the payment of a claim almost identical with this was provided for. It seems to me that it is a terrible hardship on these parties that they can not get this money. I do not believe that the Senator opposing the measure would do so if he knew the facts of the case.

The joint resolution certainly ought to be disposed of. It is a tremendous hardship on a very patriotic firm, which acted in the best of faith for the benefit of this Government. I am sure—and I say this as a Louisianian tremendously interested in sugar—that the price of sugar for all the consumers of sugar in this Nation was materially reduced by the action of this firm in cooperating with the Department of Justice and bringing in a lot of sugar from the Argentine Republic. It actually reduced the price of sugar to the extent of millions of dollars to the consumers of America, but the result of this action was almost the ruin of the people who did it for the benefit of the Nation on the suggestion of the Attorney General. It is a terrible hardship.

It does not concern me at all. These are people up in New Jersey and New York; but I happen to have been on the committee which made a careful investigation of the claim, and I know the merits of it; and I appeal to Senators not to make an objection at this time, but to let the joint resolution be acted upon.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Was there objection?

Mr. KING. There was objection. I made the objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator withdraw it?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to take up the joint resolution, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over from the corporation P. de Ronde & Co. (Inc.) a certain transaction entered into and carried on by said corporation at the request and under the direction of the Department of Justice, which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic, between the 15th day of June, 1920, and the 22d day of June, 1920, of 5,000 tons of sugar, the importation thereof into the United States and the distribution of a portion of the same within the United States, and to require the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to dispense of any of said sugar so imported remaining undisposed of and to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction, paying to the corporation aforesaid such sum as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by them in said transaction, and for this purpose the President is authorized to vote or use the stock of the corporation held by him, or otherwise exercise or use his control over the said United States Sugar Equalization Board and its directors, and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that it is stated in the report that the importation of sugar into the United States at the time designated was handled by two firms at the request of the Attorney General. This has reference to a purchase of 5,000 tons of sugar in the Argentine. There were some 800,000 tons of sugar imported into the United States. That sugar was imported at the time Cuba was holding her sugar at a price which was not justified and at a time when the beet-sugar manufacturers were held down to a certain selling price for their sugar. That 800,000 tons came into the United States, and the result of that has been that to-day we find 1,200,000 tons of Cuban sugar of last year's crop undisposed of, with another crop of Cuban sugar now being manufactured that will produce at least 3,500,000 tons.

The sugar situation in the United States is just about as bad as it can be, and if the sugar industry is to revive, or I could go further and say if the sugar industry of the United States is to live, and if one concern in the United States is to pass through this year without absolute failure, if the 1,200,000 tons of sugar lying in Cuba now are thrown upon the market as the result originally of the importation of 800,000 tons of sugar, the losses on which have been made good to the importers by the Government, something must be done to protect those industries in this country.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how it was that Cuba, having all that excess of sugar on hand, was able to hold the price up above 26 cents?

Mr. SMOOT. A sugar commission was appointed, and no sugar could be shipped out of Cuba unless the commission gave permission, at the price the commission stated.

Mr. FLETCHER. That was a Cuban commission?

Mr. SMOOT. It was a Cuban sugar commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. Was it financed at all by American importers?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the commission was not financed by American importers, but American money was loaned upon the sugar.

Mr. FLETCHER. There was no way of avoiding getting the sugar from Cuba. The Government had to get sugar from somewhere else or pay the Cuban price.

Mr. SMOOT. Unless it let the American beet-sugar people sell their sugar.

Mr. FLETCHER. Was there any objection to the beet-sugar people selling their sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. The price was held down to 10½ cents, when the Government of the United States compelled them to pay $10 a ton for beets, at the very time when this sugar was imported.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why did not the Government take the beet sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. They wanted that for the Western States. Those people were held down to a certain price. The situation is horrible. At that very time the beet-sugar producers had to make a contract for the purchase of beets from the farmers, and with sugar at the price then obtaining, the lowest rate the farmers would contract for was $12 a ton minimum price for beets, and $1 for every dollar obtained in excess of $12 a bag.

At the time those contracts were made sugar was selling at a high price, but before the beets were harvested and made into sugar, refined sugar had fallen to almost 6 cents a pound; not Cuban sugar but refined sugar. To-day sugar is selling for $4.70 a hundred in New York, with 2 per cent off for cash, and Cuban raw sugars are selling for less than 2 cents a pound.

I shall not object to the passage of this joint resolution, as it is stated here that the importations were made at the request of the Attorney General. That is the only reason why it should be considered at all. But I want to say to the Senate that when the price of sugar was absolutely controlled by the Attorney General, as far as the western producers of sugar were concerned, the western sugar producers were not losing merely a few cents a hundred, as these people did upon this shipment, but they lost four or five dollars a hundred on every bag of sugar sold, and not only has all their working capital gone, not only has all their reserve gone, but I say to Senators that they are in such a condition now that stock which was selling for over $20 will not bring $2, and unless there is a change very shortly in the sugar conditions which have been brought about by sugar coming from Java and from countries that never furnished this market with sugar before to speak of, the sugar industry in this country will be ruined.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the Senator from Utah to say that he is not opposing the joint resolution because he understands that this action was taken at the request of the Attorney General. What authority has the Senator for that statement?

Mr. SMOOT. The report of the committee is my authority. This is what the report says:

> The necessity for this resolution arises out of the efforts of the Department of Justice to reduce the high price of sugar existing during the first half of the year 1920, when this commodity was selling throughout the United States in excess of 26 cents per pound retail.

The report says "throughout the United States." That is wrong. I think that was true as to the Eastern States.

The report further states:

> Under the food control act the Department of Justice took action toward breaking the price of sugar, which at the time was believed to be unwarranted. One of the steps taken was to increase the importation of sugar. This was undertaken by two firms at the request of the Attorney General.

Mr. WILLIS. What two firms?

Mr. SMOOT. One of the firms was P. de Ronde & Co. (Inc.), for whom relief is sought by the pending joint resolution, and the other firm is the one for whose relief we passed a joint resolution a short time ago.

Mr. WILLIS. Can the Senator cite any statement that was made by the Attorney General which gave authority for this shipment? The Senator is reading from the report. I do not so read the testimony.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think he will find that the Attorney General wrote a letter to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES].

Mr. SMOOT. I saw that letter.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In that letter he stated that he felt it was the duty of the Government to take over the transaction and relieve P. de Ronde & Co. (Inc.) for the loss they had sustained. Furthermore, there is also a letter signed by one of the agents of the Department of Justice, who undertook to enter into this agreement with P. de Ronde & Co.

Mr. WILLIS. What is the name of that agent?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Armin W. Riley.

Mr. WILLIS. As soon as the Senator from Utah finishes, I will read the testimony of Mr. Riley on that point.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Attorney General appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and, in response to questions, said he thought that while the Government was not legally bound, under the circumstances it was morally bound.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not question that that was the opinion of the Attorney General. What I am saying is that I have been unable to find anywhere any documentary evidence whatever of any action by the Department of Justice to initiate this matter, and I think I can show that the initiation came in another way.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator from Utah will permit, I will show by reading from the record that what I have stated is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say just one more word, and then the Senator can take the floor. I desire to state to the Senator from Ohio that I am not enamored of this legislation, and if a similar resolution had not passed the Senate I would not say that I have no objection to this measure.

Mr. RANSDELL addressed the Senate. After having spoken for a few minutes,

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the unanimous-consent agreement entered into on the calendar day of November 23, 1921, becomes effective. Under that unanimous-consent agreement the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution which will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Senate resolution 172, submitted by Mr. SPENCER, November 15, 1921, as follows:

> Resolved, (1) That the contest of Henry Ford against Truman H. Newberry be, and it is hereby, dismissed.
> (2) That Truman H. Newberry is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1919.

(3) That his qualification for a seat in the Senate of the United States, to which he has been elected, has been conclusively established, and the charges made against him in this proceeding, both as to his election and qualification, are not sustained.

To which a substitute was offered by Mr. WALSH of Montana, and which is pending, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," in line 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That Henry Ford, contesting the election of Truman H. Newberry as United States Senator from the State of Michigan for the term commencing March 4, 1919, not having received a majority of the votes cast at the election, is not entitled to a seat in this body.

"Resolved further, That on account of acts in gross and flagrant violation of the law of the State of Michigan on the part of the said Truman H. Newberry, his agents and supporters, intended to encompass his election, he is not entitled to a seat in this body."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to conclude the explanation I began; I shall be very brief about it, and I hope we may have unanimous consent to continue the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I understand the unanimous-consent agreement provides that such other business may be considered as the Senate may, by unanimous consent, agree upon. I think at this point it will be necessary to obtain unanimous consent in order to continue the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. RANSDELL. I agree with the Senator. It will take me a vew few moments to conclude. I hope we may have consent to dispose of the joint resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate continue the consideration of Senate joint resolution 79, which has been under consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am advised that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] intends to address the Senate on the Newberry resolution this afternoon. I am indisposed to object to the further consideration of the joint resolution, although I do not wish to say anything about it myself. If the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] could assure us that it will not occupy the time of the Senate more than half an hour or an hour at the furthest I should be indisposed to object.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If it extends beyond that time, most certainly I shall ask that it go over.

Ms. WALSH of Montana. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey that the Senate continue the consideration of Senate joint resolution 79? The Chair hears none.

IMPORTATION OF SUGAR FROM ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

Mr. RANSDELL resumed and concluded his speech, which is entire as follows:

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, in response to the query of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], I ask him to look on page 6 of the report of the committee. On that page there appears a letter from Mr. Armin W. Riley, who was an Assistant Attorney General. It is a letter addressed to P. de Ronde & Co., and explains this matter. Near the bottom of that page the Senator will find these words:

On or about May 22, 1920, the Argentine Government granted permission to export the sugar, but there was some delay in the effectuation of this permit. The permit to export the sugar continued until August 1, 1920. In the discharge of my official duties as representative of the Department of Justice I was greatly interested in the importation of this sugar from the Argentine in order to relieve the shortage and break the high prices of that commodity in the United States.

I wish to say that the purpose was to get sugar from the Argentine, to bring it in from an unusual source in order to break the existing high prices. This writer goes on to say:

But in addition to actually getting sugar here, I was further and especially interested and engaged in supervising prices and regulating the method of distribution of the sugar after it arrived, so as to prevent the sugar reaching the hands of speculators and to insure its distribution to householders, canners, preservers, and essential industries.

To effectuate a reduction in price and an increase in quantity of sugar in the United States I requested representatives of the importers to meet me at my office in New York—

Bear in mind that Mr. Riley was the representative of the Department of Justice, being authorized and empowered to act in this matter, as set out by Mr. Palmer, the Attorney General—

This meeting was held, and at that time I urged them to make every effort to import sugar. I appealed to them as a patriotic duty to do everything to increase the supply of sugar. Immediately thereafter (early in June, 1920) Mr. Philip P. de Ronde, president of P. de Ronde & Co. (Inc.), of 39 Broadway, New York City, with whom I had been acquainted—and in whom I had every confidence, having known him to have been an officer in the United States Navy during the war, had a conference with me. I informed Mr. de Ronde of the critical necessity of increasing the available supply of sugar and discussed with him the limited lifting of the Argentine embargo. Mr. de Ronde was not in the sugar business, but was a controlling factor in steamship companies, and one of his boats was at this time in the Argentine.

The party who would be the beneficiary under the pending joint resolution—

Because of our arrangements hereinafter mentioned, I had personal knowledge of the importation by P. de Ronde & Co. (Inc.) of 5,000 tons of this sugar made available for export by the Argentine Government, and I was informed that American Trading Corporation imported about 14,000 tons.

I read just a few words more now from page 7 of the report. Mr. Riley continues:

I then specified these conditions, and informed Mr. de Ronde that the Department of Justice would greatly desire his company to import this lot of sugar, provided his company would agree not to sell at a price deemed excessive by the Department of Justice, and to distribute the sugar to housekeepers, canners, preservers, and essential users, who would be approved by the Department of Justice, and provided he would refrain from selling to brokers or traders or allowing the sugar to reach the hands of speculators or others whom the Department of Justice would not approve, and provided he would accept generally the supervision, and obey the directions, of the Department of Justice in the distribution of the sugar upon arrival. Mr. de Ronde suggested that the compensation be limited to a profit of not exceeding 5 per cent, which was a little less than 1 cent per pound, and I told Mr. de Ronde that this was quite acceptable to me. Mr. de Ronde then agreed to enter into this arrangement with the Department of Justice and to purchase and bring into the United States the 5,000 tons of sugar from the Argentine upon the above terms, and to follow the directions of the Department of Justice concerning its sale price, channels of distribution, and such other terms as the Department of Justice might indicate. I told Mr. de Ronde that this arrangement between his company and me, representing the Department of Justice, was then confirmed, and that he should proceed to carry it out.

Now, just a word further. Mr. de Ronde's company in good faith, acting under that understanding with the Department of Justice, purchased the sugar, but when they were just about ready to start to the United States it was ascertained that, as a result of publicity given to the fact that sugar was going to come in, the price of sugar had dropped materially. They sought permission to unload their vessels and to sell the sugar. But the Department of Justice, acting through its officials, refused to give the permission and so the men went on in good faith, as patriotic citizens, brought the sugar here, and have suffered a very great loss, all of which was testified to by officers of the Department of Justice and confirmed by Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer himself.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator whether there is any part of this in writing? Is the request in writing?

Mr. RANSDELL. The request was not in writing, but it was testified to by the Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Riley, and confirmed by Mr. Palmer. It was not in writing, however.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Who is prosecuting this claim in behalf of the claimant?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. de Ronde, whose company acted as the agent of the Government in bringing the sugar in.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is Mr. Riley's business at the present time?

Mr. RANSDELL. He is, I think, an attorney at law in New York. He has no interest in it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He has not any interest in the claim?

Mr. RANSDELL. None in the world.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator advise the Senate how much sugar the United States ordinarily imports?

Mr. RANSDELL. We consume, I believe, about 4,000,000 tons, and we are supposed to make, I think, something pretty close to one-half of that quantity in the beet-sugar section, in Louisiana, in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and our various insular possessions. We produce, I think, about 2,000,000 tons and we import about 2,000,000 tons.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think the importation of 5,000 tons would affect the market?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is so claimed, I will state to the Senator. The trading conditions were such that the price of sugar was abnormally high at that time. Everybody was getting a very big price for it. Normally we do not bring in sugar from Argentina. The attempt was to bring a limited amount, I think possibly 20,000 or 25,000 tons, from the Argentine, and great publicity was given to that fact by the Department of Justice.

I will say to the Senator that the Department of Justice was doing everything it could to bring down the price of sugar, against my wishes, personally, for I represent Louisiana in part, and the Louisiana people did not want to see the price of sugar come down. But that was the action of the Department of Justice, and it is testified to us that as a result of the bringing in of that sugar the price did go down. Whether that caused it or not, I do not know, but it went down, and this agent of the Government lost very heavily.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Did not the Government have an agent in the organization known as the Sugar Equalization Board?

Mr. RANSDELL. It had.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That board was functioning?

Mr. RANSDELL. It was.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It had the power to import sugar?

Mr. RANSDELL. It had.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why was not that agency used?

Mr. RANSDELL. I think that agency was doing everything it could. It should be remembered that those were war times, and that agency was doing everything it could. Everything was abnormal at that time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But this was two years after the war was over.

Mr. RANSDELL. Nevertheless, we have not even yet got back to normal, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that the Sugar Equalization Board officers testified that they did not know about this transaction until the whole thing was over.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not say they did.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator stated that the board was doing all that it could. It had nothing whatever to do with this transaction.

Mr. RANSDELL. And I repeat what I said, that the Sugar Equalization Board was doing all it could to get cheap sugar——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the Senator——

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me conclude, please. They were doing all they could to get cheap sugar for the American people. Their officers did say that they had nothing to do with this transaction and knew nothing about it.

Please do not put words in my mouth that I do not utter. I did not say, and do not say now, that the Sugar Equalization Board claimed to know anything about it; but I did say, and I repeat, that they were an agency created to give us cheap sugar, and they did the best they could to give us cheap sugar. This was another agency used by the Attorney General to give us cheap sugar, and, in my judgment, it had an effect in reducing the price of sugar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I hope the Senator will acquit me of any disposition or desire to question any statement made by him.

Mr. RANSDELL. Oh, certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He is entirely accurate in making the statement. He was asked by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] why this agency, created for the express purpose of dealing with the sugar problem, was not consulted and intrusted with the importation of this sugar from Argentina. The Senator from Louisiana answered that the Equalization Board was doing all that it could to relieve the situation, of course the inference being that the Sugar Equalization Board was acting in conjunction with the Attorney General and was consulted with reference to the matter.

I simply rose for the purpose of saying that so far as this transaction is concerned the Sugar Equalization Board had absolutely nothing on earth to do with it and did not know anything about it.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is to say, a studious effort was made to find some other agency, because the Sugar Equalization Board would not have anything to do with it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. WILLIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield first to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to offer the suggestion that the authority which the Attorney General assumed was derived from the Lever Act. He was acting, I believe, under the direction of the President in an effort to reduce the price of sugar. So the authority at least rested with the Attorney General to do everything in his power to procure sugar to break the market.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to correct that statement. The Attorney General had no authority whatever, as I showed and as was admitted by the advocates of the B. H. Howell measure. The Attorney General was expressly denied authority to import sugar into the United States. Let that be perfectly understood.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Was he not directed by the President?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He was; he had all the powers that were vested in the food controller, Mr. Hoover; but the power to import sugar was expressly denied by the Lever Act; that is to say, he was empowered to import certain commodities, not including sugar.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator question the obligation on the part of the Government toward the De Ronde Co. under the authority which the Attorney General assumed he had in directing this importation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do; for I can not admit because a department officer assumes to exercise an authority which Congress never granted to him that therefore the country is under any kind of obligation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Even if he does so under the direction of the President?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Even if he does so under the direction of the President; but, of course, the President never directed anything of the kind. The President vested the Attorney General with all the power with which he was vested under the Lever Act, but even the President was not vested with any such power as is contended in this case.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. If I still have the floor, I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana, who is a member of the committee, does he recall how many members of the committee were present when the joint resolution was reported?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not remember. I do not think I myself was personally present when the joint resolution was reported, but we had very full hearings on the joint resolution and there was a decided majority of the committee present when the hearings were held.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Louisiana has concluded his remarks, I desire to make some observations.

Mr. RANSDELL. I merely wish to say one word further in response to what the Senator from Montana has just stated. The Attorney General did not contend that the United States was under a legal obligation to pay this amount, and I do not contend that the United States was under a legal obligation to pay this amount; but, Senators, this is the situation: Sugar was bringing an abnormal price in this country; the Attorney General was doing his utmost not only to reduce the price of sugar but to reduce the price of other commodities. He was commissioned to do that by the law, and he was acting in good faith. His agent, who, he says, was fully authorized to act for him, called a meeting in the city of New York, and Mr. de Ronde attended that meeting. Mr. de Ronde is not an attorney general or any kind of an attorney; he is merely a good, ordinary, plain American citizen. He attended that meeting, which was called by the representative of the Department of Justice, and in good faith, by request of that department, discharged a portion of the cargo which had been placed in a ship of his then in the city of Buenos Aires and loaded it with 5,000 tons of sugar to bring in here in order to reduce the general price of sugar to the American people. He was to sell it at a price fixed by the Department of Justice, on terms fixed by the Department of Justice, and to the people named by the Department of Justice. He was to receive for his services 5 per cent on the amount of the sale, a very small sum. He acted in the best of faith and he acted with the duly accredited agent and representative of the Department of Justice. Under those circumstances, it seems to me, if there ever was a moral obligation, Mr. de Ronde has that moral obligation in his favor.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, in this case I do not think there exists any legal obligation, nor do I think that there is any moral obligation on the part of the Government. Senators will not have failed to notice that all of the reading which has been done here from documents has been from documents which had their initiation after this question came up. There is neither in the Treasury Department nor in the State Department one single iota of evidence in reference to the matter. I now read from the committee hearings on page 12 a portion of the letter from the Secretary of State, which was written by the Secretary of State to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the chairman of the committee. The last paragraph of that letter reads as follows:

> You state in your letter that another American company, the Oriental Steamship Co., has put forth a claim that it also purchased sugar in the Argentine as the agent of the United States Government, and suffered losses similar to those suffered by the American Trading Co.

There is nothing in the files of the department which would indicate that the Oriental Steamship Co. had been designated as the agent of the United States Government in any capacity.

So that, let it be understood at the beginning, there is no documentary evidence whatever of this transaction. Therefore we are, of course, forced to rely upon parole evidence. So the testimony of Mr. Riley, from whom the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has read at considerable length, becomes quite interesting. Incidentally, the Senator from Louisiana did not read all of the letter of Mr. Riley. A paragraph of that letter is, in part, as follows, as appearing in the committee hearings at page 27:

Certain importers approached the Department of Justice at that time, requesting governmental assistance through it and the Department of State, in securing permission of the Argentine Government for the exportation of some of this sugar, and agreed if they were thus enabled to bring the sugar to this country by the lifting of the Argentine embargo against export, to cooperate with the Department of Justice in the distribution of the sugar at prices and to consumers approved by the Department of Justice.

The first sentence is significant—

Certain importers approached the Department of Justice at that time.

Then I read further.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Has the Senator any evidence that P. de Ronde approached the Department of Justice?

Mr. WILLIS. I was completing the reading that was begun by the Senator from Louisiana. The Senator from Louisiana did not read all of the letter, and I was simply completing the reading.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Has the Senator any evidence that De Ronde applied to the Department of Justice to import sugar? As I understand it, the Department of State appealed to the De Ronde Co. and urged them to import sugar because they had a steamship in the Argentina.

Mr. WILLIS. The best answer to that question is found in the hearings. When Mr. Riley was writing the letter he had it all his own way, but when he was before the committee some matters were brought out that are not discussed in the letter. I read from page 39 of the hearings, where the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] asked some questions which are illuminating. I quote the following:

Senator MCNARY. * * * Did you ever tell him at any time to acquire that sugar and bring it into this country?
Mr. RILEY. Did I direct him to do it?
Senator MCNARY. Yes.
Mr. RILEY. No, sir.

He did not direct him to do it.

Then, further on, Mr. Riley says:

I tried to get him to bring the sugar into this country.

Then the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] asked the following question:

Senator CARAWAY. You finally reached the point about sugar. Did you direct him to bring it in?
Mr. RILEY. I asked him if he couldn't bring it in. I did everything I could to make it easy for him.

Further down the page Mr. Riley testifies:

I told him if he would bring that in I had arranged to have the different sugar refineries and others to supply sugar to the canners and preservers and other essential users, and if he would bring that sugar in I would allot his sugar to that committee which is representing this people and they would take all his sugar.
Senator MCNARY. Did you tell him he could receive a certain price?
Mr. RILEY. Not a price; a certain margin.
Senator MCNARY. Did you tell him he would be exempted from liability of loss if he would follow your desires?
Mr. RILEY. No, sir; I did not.
Senator MCNARY. Did he bring it in on his own hook or his own volition?
Mr. RILEY. Yes, sir.
Senator MCNARY. And he did it on his own responsibility?
Mr. RILEY. Yes, sir; he did.
Senator CARAWAY. He did it on your request?
Mr. RILEY. Yes, sir. I didn't attempt to relieve him from reliability.

Evidently he intended to say "liability."

Senator MCNARY. And he brought that in on his own ship, by his permission, of his own volition?
Mr. RILEY. Yes, sir; that is true.

That is the statement of Mr. Riley, whose testimony is relied upon to buttress this case. That makes it perfectly clear that the De Ronde Co. was an importer. I have no quarrel with this company; I do not know the gentlemen, and I have no doubt that all the Senator from Louisiana says about them is true, that they are honorable men, but we have got to look at the facts from the standpoint of the Government. Here was a company that entered into an oral arrangement with a representative of the Attorney General's office. That representative was put upon the stand and says that he gave them no guaranty at all; it was simply a business proposition. Suppose there had been profit attached to this transaction, would the Government then have come in for a share of the profit? Not at all. But since there was a loss, the Government is asked to bear it. This was a commercial transaction, and this company was in no sense acting as the agent of the Government of the United States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator says that Mr. Riley testified that he did not direct P. de Ronde & Co. to import this sugar, but he tried to get them to do it. I refer to his letter, which is a signed letter, and, as will be recalled, he was a special agent of the Department of Justice.

Mr. WILLIS. When was that letter written? Was it not written after the transaction?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Oh, yes; it was written after the transaction, but it relates the facts in the case. Mr. Riley says:

I appealed to them as a patriotic duty to do everything to increase the supply of sugar. * * * I then specified these conditions. * * * I told Mr. de Ronde that this was quite acceptable to me.

I submit that any lawyer who reads the terms of that letter and the facts as presented by Mr. Marvin, the special assistant appointed by the Attorney General, would say there was a commitment to procure the sugar.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will say further to the learned Senator from Ohio that a moral obligation is involved. P. de Ronde & Co. were not international traders, such as B. H. Howell, Son & Co., who were relieved from loss the other day. They were shipping men, and the agent of the Department of Justice went to them and asked them to import the sugar; in fact, he appealed to them to do so. Has the Senator any evidence of B. H. Howell, Son & Co. or the American Trading Co. being directed to import the sugar by the Attorney General?

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, well, Mr. President, we are not discussing that case now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We are discussing it.

Mr. WILLIS. I am not discussing it; the Senator may discuss it, if he desires, in his own time, but that case has been passed upon. However, to answer his question categorically I will say to him that there is abundant documentary evidence in that case which was produced here, and that is one of the differences between these two cases. In the case now under consideration there was simply an oral agreement; some gentlemen met somewhere in a room and had some sort of an understanding. Now my friend from New Jersey reads a letter that was written concerning this case; but the letter was written some time after the transaction took place. If there had been such a letter written before the transaction, it would have been vastly different, but written as it was it is simply an expression of opinion by the gentleman who wrote it. That expression is entitled to full weight——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. But, if I may be permitted to finish the statement, it is not entitled to so much weight as the statement by the same gentleman when he was cross-examined by the Senator from Oregon, on page 39 of the hearings, from which I have read, where he specifically says that there was no understanding that would relieve these people from liability.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He also stated, "I tried to get them to do it."

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, just that; but the Senate will not fail to note a tremendous difference between the effect of the letter that Mr. Riley wrote in the case when he had it all his own way, and the testimony that he gave under the able proddings of the Senator from Oregon.

Now, there is another significant fact in connection with this case. The Senator from Nebraska, I think, made some inquiries about the Sugar Equalization Board. That is all cleared up in the hearings. Senator MCNARY there asked the question, at page 21:

Was there any effort made to take the matter up with the Sugar Equalization Board, who had jurisdiction over this product, and who had control of it?
Mr. HALL. Not that I know of.
Senator MCNARY. When the sugar got here, do you know what the difference in the price was between the price at the time it was purchased and the price at the time when it landed in New York?
Mr. HALL. No; probably Mr. De Ronde here does. At any rate he knows the dates of the sales and the prices we got.
Senator MCNARY. Was there any effort made by you to take this matter up before the Sugar Equalization Board?
Mr. HALL. Not so far as I know.
Senator MCNARY. And ask them to recoup you for your losses?
Mr. HALL. Not so far as I know, sir.

In other words, the board—the authority to which appeal would naturally have been made—was ignored in this matter; and it was not until another measure was introduced, relating to another case, quite different from this one but bearing upon the question of sugar, that anything was said about this matter at all. These gentlemen apparently understood up to that time that it was merely a commercial transaction into which they had voluntarily entered, and expected to shoulder their losses; but now it is proposed that the Government of the United States shall intervene in this private transaction, and save these gentlemen from a loss growing out of that transaction into which they voluntarily entered.

It may further be said, touching the attitude of the Sugar Equalization Board, that farther down on page 21 of the hearings Mr. Hall says:

> No, sir. I have had this matter up for discussion with Mr. Zabriskie—

Who, as I recall, was an official of that board, perhaps the president of it—> and Mr. Zabriskie took the position, I am perfectly frank to say, that there was a difference between the American Trading Co. case and our case. As I understood him, the Sugar Equalization Board was interested in doing justice, and whatever Congress directed them to do they would do, but they wanted to point out the distinctions between that case and ours.

So that, shorn of all of its verbiage, this case amounts simply to this bald statement of facts:

Here were parties who entered into a commercial transaction voluntarily, without any guaranty even resting in parole, without a single scrap of documentary evidence anywhere in any department of the Government; but, gentlemen, write a letter and say that some men met somewhere in a room in New York and had an understanding and therefore the Government should be held to make up this profit which they might have made. I say, Mr. President, that this is unwise legislation and ought not to pass.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to say just a few words in regard to this matter.

I am unable to distinguish any difference in principle, at least, between this case and the case of B. H. Howell & Co. which was under consideration by the Senate a while ago, and to which claim the Senate gave its approval despite my opposition, which I made as forceful, and my arguments, which I made as clear as I could. I desire, however, to register my opposition to this joint resolution as well, and to challenge a few of the statements made in the report upon which the Senate is presumed to act.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I wish simply to propound one inquiry. Does the Senator from Montana say that he can see no difference between this case and the one over which the contest was had a few days ago?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. None in principle. I call attention, however, to a few of the statements made in the report upon which the Senate is called upon to act, the following among others:

> Under the food control act the Department of Justice took action toward breaking the price of sugar, which at the time was believed to be unwarranted.

I deny that the Department of Justice took action under the food control act. I deny that the Department of Justice had any power or authority under the food control act to take any such action. In connection with the B. H. Howell, Sons & Co.'s claim, the bill to take care of which was before the Senate, I invited attention to section 11 of the food control act, which tells just exactly the commodities which the President was authorized by the food control act to purchase. I read that again:

> SEC. 11. That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell for cash, at reasonable prices, wheat, flour, meal, beans, and potatoes.

So much power was given to the President of the United States. That power he transferred to the Food Administrator, a position first held by Mr. Hoover. Afterwards all powers granted to the President by this act were conferred upon the Attorney General; but it is perfectly plain that the Congress of the United States never empowered the President of the United States to purchase and sell sugar, and the President of the United States never undertook to confer any such power upon the Food Administrator or upon the Attorney General.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana further yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask the Senator from Montana whether it is not true that in August, 1919, the President transferred whatsoever powers the Food Administrator had under the Lever Act to the Department of Justice?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have so stated.

Mr. McNARY. And is it not true that the Attorney General, construing the law upon which that authority was based, thought he had sufficient authority to make these purchases and enter into these transactions?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rather think not. I rather think that the Attorney General never could have looked at the act and assumed that he had any such authority. I am perfectly satisfied that he proceeded without any kind of study of the law under which he was supposed to act. Of course, the Attorney General at that time was a very able man, judged from any standpoint, and I have no doubt a very able lawyer. I therefore assume that being a man of ordinary intelligence, and being a lawyer of some capacity, at least, he could not have read the statute and have assumed to act under it in this proceeding.

Mr. McNARY. But will not the distinguished Senator from Montana concede that the Attorney General did proceed upon the theory that there was ample authority granted under the Lever Act, in sections 2 and 10, to justify him in taking this action to meet the emergencies of the situation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have tried to answer that question. I regret to say that I can not believe that he had any reason to imagine that he had this authority.

Mr. McNARY. Then I want to propound another question. Assuming that he was acting in good faith, as President Wilson was acting in good faith when he transferred the authority from the Food Administration to the Department of Justice under the Lever Act, and assuming that these people in good faith entered into an agreement, believing that the law was ample, does it not place upon the Government a moral obligation to meet this transaction?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think so at all. The President of the United States undoubtedly acted in perfectly good faith in transferring all the power he had. I am willing to assume, for the purpose of the question addressed to me by the Senator from Oregon, that the Attorney General believed that he had this power; but, Mr. President, if the Congress of the United States is under a moral obligation to back up every act of a head of one of the departments done because he believed he had the power to do it, we are involved in irretrievable bankruptcy. I do not admit that there is any moral obligation at all in the premises. I do not admit that there is any moral obligation upon the Government of the United States to make good a contract which is executed by the head of one of the departments with no authority whatever in the law for the execution of that contract.

I trust I make myself perfectly clear to the Senator, and I am perfectly certain that the Senator agrees with me.

Mr. McNARY. I think we discussed that matter on a former occasion. Under a strict interpretation of the Lever Act, I am in accord with the Senator; but I say we must take a larger view, and I look at the bona fides of the transaction. We have done so in all sorts of legislation. Each case stands upon its own foundation and must be considered in that light. When the President of the United States did a thing under what he thought to be authority of law, and the Attorney General in interpreting the law differed from the distinguished Senator and able lawyer from Montana, and people who performed a public service suffered a great loss, I do not think the Senator from Montana would want his opinion to go against that of the President or the Department of Justice to the loss of some one who innocently had done an act for the benefit of his country. Those are the elements in this case which it seems to me must be considered in connection with a strict interpretation of the statute.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So far as the President of the United States is concerned, he may be left out of it. He conferred, of course, all the powers that he had on the Attorney General.

Mr. McNARY. I can not do that. My mind can not run that far with that of the distinguished Senator from Montana. The President was the source of all this activity. He created the Sugar Equalization Board. He executed the Lever Act. He appointed the Food Administrator. He issued an order directing the Department of Justice to take up the work laid down by Mr. Hoover; and he did all of this in an effort to decrease the price of sugar, which was exorbitantly high, as the Senator knows.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; and of course we are bound to assume that in conferring these powers upon the Attorney General he said to him: "I give you all the powers that I have. Execute all those powers, and do not do anything that I have not any power to do," and the Attorney General disregarded that implied obligation.

But, Mr. President, I want to say another word in relation to the question propounded to me by the Senator from Oregon. The Senator from Oregon asks me if an obligation would not arise if an act were done by one of the departments which, under a strict interpretation of the law, it had no right to do.

Mr. President, I am ready to admit that. If a law could reasonably have two separate interpretations, and an officer of the Government, in the exercise of his authority and with the most perfect good faith, gave to the law one interpretation and eventually it was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that his interpretation was not correct, I certainly agree that there would be a moral obligation on the part of the United States. So that if this law were capable of any two interpretations—one which would give the Attorney General the power to import sugar into the United States, and another which would not give him the power to import sugar into the United States—and in good faith he believed that by a proper interpretation of the act he had that power, I should say unquestionably that a moral obligation would arise upon the part of the United States. But, Mr. President, I can not admit the proposition that we are proceeding upon any strict interpretation of the statute. I submit, sir, that not a word can be found in the statute which will give color even to the contention that the Attorney General had the right to import sugar into the United States. I read again section 11:

That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell for cash at reasonable prices wheat, flour, meal, beans, and potatoes.

By what kind of an interpretation can that be held to signify that he may also purchase and sell sugar? It is not a question of two different interpretations of a statute of doubtful meaning; it is importing a power which clearly is withheld.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I think from the Senator's statement he must concede that there is a moral obligation, because there are clearly two interpretations—one by the Attorney General, who assumed, in his statement, that he had authority, if not under section 11, which the Senator has read, then under section 10 or under section 2, under which these agencies were created.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. The Senator must concede further—if I may finish my statement—that Judge Glasgow, one of the most distinguished lawyers in the whole eastern country, attorney for Mr. Hoover, later attorney for the Sugar Equalization Board, the man who organized that great instrumentality of the Government for taking care of the Cuban sugar crop, assumed that there was sufficient authority.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. I desire to show the different lines of thought in regard to this matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to inquire of the Senator when and where Mr. Glasgow said the Attorney General had the authority or that that interpretation could be given to the statute?

Mr. McNARY. I think that is in the hearings before the Senate committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I do not think it is.

Mr. McNARY. In the Howell case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Senator is in error. I am able to tell him just exactly what Mr. Glasgow said.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I think the Senator from Montana is in error, but I will concede the correctness of his memory. We have, then, Mr. Palmer, who thought that he had authority under section 2, section 10, or section 11 of the Lever Act. I am not conceding that he had technical, legal authority, but he thought he had. He gave it that interpretation. I assume that the President of the United States, when he issued the promulgation, thought there was ample authority. That is one state of mind. The only one who disputes that theory is the distinguished Senator from Montana. That makes a division of thought, a controversy, two interpretations, and therefore when one acts in good faith under a statute which the distinguished Senator says is susceptible of two interpretations a moral obligation is created.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not admit that at all. The Attorney General being interrogated said that he believed he had the authority. He did not undertake to say that he thought he had authority under section 11, or under section 2, or under section 10, or under section 12, or under any other section. He was not interrogated as to where he got the authority, and he did not undertake to say.

Mr. McNARY. I concede that, but I contend, although I have not the section before me, that if there was authority at all it was under section 2, section 10, or section 11, and doubtless he thought, when he made the statement, that the President of the United States could create agencies.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly, in order to carry out the functions of the act.

Mr. McNARY. The Lever Act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is to say, he could create an agency for the purpose of purchasing or of selling wheat, flour, meal, beans, and potatoes.

Mr. McNARY. I said to the Senator from Montana that I did not disagree with his construction of the Lever Act, but I am saying that the Attorney General placed a different construction on it. De Ronde & Co. followed the construction placed upon it by the Attorney General. The President of the United States placed a certain construction upon it. Therefore it is susceptible of two interpretations, and it brings about what I was trying to point out, a moral obligation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think it is a question of the interpretation of the statute at all. I shall undertake before long to show that the Attorney General proceeded in some matters without any regard whatever for the law, or for the Constitution, for that matter. That is the situation of affairs.

Just a few words more. Further in this report it is said:

The Government was apparently very successful in breaking the price of sugar. As its various activities became known, prices fell rapidly.

I deny that the Government was apparently very successful in breaking the price of sugar. The price of sugar did fall in the month of August, but I deny that it fell by reason of any activities of the Department of Justice. It fell just the same as the prices of all agricultural products fell at that time, by reason of the general conditions. The price of beef upon the hoof began falling just about the same time, when the usual shipments began to be made. The price of wool began dropping about the 1st of June of 1920, when wool began coming upon the market. The price of wheat began dropping just about the same time, when wheat began coming upon the market. So, Mr. President, the price of sugar dropped just the same as the prices of all other agricultural products dropped. They just synchronized.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that the decline in the price of wool was brought about or precipitated through the action of a Government agency. It was precipitated at the time the Government offered a very large amount of wool on the market in Boston. Within 24 hours of the Government's sale of wool the wool market declined, because they overburdened the market and the market collapsed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no doubt that the circumstance to which the Senator from Oregon has referred was a contributing factor in the decline of the price of wool, but it was only a contributing factor, because the same considerations were operative upon all kinds of agricultural commodities at that time, and they all suffered correspondingly.

This report further says:

This company was forbidden to resell same in the Argentine through fear of disturbing diplomatic relations with that country.

There is nothing in the record which discloses that these people were forbidden to resell in the Argentine, but suppose the Department of Justice did direct that they should not resell in the Argentine or anywhere else. The testimony all discloses that they say they wanted to sell the sugar, and they wanted the assistance of the Department of Justice to get it out of the country. It was their sugar; they were in no sense agents of the United States, and they were entitled to sell their sugar in the Argentine or anywhere else as they saw fit.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What law authorizes the Department of Justice to forbid a man to sell anything that is his own?

I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just asked the question I was about to propound.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Department of Justice acted in that matter just the same as they did in the other. It was a perfectly despotic, autocratic act upon the part of the Department of Justice, such as would be exercised by a monarch having unlimited power, whose acts were not regulated by statute or by a constitution. That is the way this thing proceeded.

On page 2 of the report it is said:

Thereupon P. de Ronde & Co. (Inc.) requested the Department of Justice to permit a resale in Argentina.

* * * * * * *

The Department of Justice, however, refused to permit the reshipment to Argentina through fear of disturbing diplomatic relations with that country, and directed P. de Ronde & Co. (Inc.) to dispose of the sugar which had been purchased and imported by it at such prices as could be obtained—

And so forth.

Where does the Department of Justice get any such power or authority as that? Of course, I appreciate that talk on this matter is wasted; but, at the same time, I feel that this is plain gift to P. de Ronde & Co.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	King	Robinson
Ball	France	Ladd	Sheppard
Borah	Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Shortridge
Broussard	Glass	McNary	Smoot
Bursum	Hale	Moses	Spencer
Calder	Harreld	Nelson	Stanfield
Cameron	Harris	New	Sterling
Capper	Harrison	Nicholson	Sutherland
Caraway	Heflin	Norbeck	Townsend
Colt	Hitchcock	Oddie	Trammell
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Wadsworth
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Kellogg	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Kenyon	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Ernst	Keyes	Ransdell	Willis

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, it seemed probable that we were not to have a record vote upon this important measure, and it was about to be passed with some four or five Senators in the Chamber. For that reason I suggested the absence of a quorum.

I am opposed to the measure, as I was to the other measure which was enacted for the purpose of reinstating certain sugar dealers on account of losses suffered by them during or immediately after the war on account of transactions at that time. I can see no more reason why the Government should undertake to reinstate these people than that they should thousands and thousands of others who lost money due to the decline in the prices of various commodities following the war and during the reconstruction period.

There are millions of farmers throughout the country who, on account of the importunities of the Government and Government agents, increased extensively their crop production and many of them lost heavily. Many of them had to sell their products at prices far below the cost of production. We did not attempt to adjust their losses, but here are two instances of traders and dealers who have lost money and, regardless of what they may have made in speculating in sugar and in other transactions, the Federal Government is now asked to take from the pockets of the taxpayers of the country the money that they lost and recoup these losses. I am opposed to the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. The hour of 2 o'clock having been reached, I inquire whether or not the pending joint resolution is not automatically laid aside so the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Utah that the Senate is acting under a unanimous-consent agreement whereby the Senate resolution relating to the Newberry case came automatically before the Senate at 1 o'clock; but that unanimous-consent agreement, the Senator will recall, is subject to the exception that unanimous consent may be granted for the consideration of other business. Unanimous consent was asked for and granted to continue the consideration of this measure.

Mr. KING. I was not aware of the fact that unanimous consent had been asked and granted for the further consideration of the measure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there having been quite a lengthy discussion of this measure, I hope we may now have a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CARAWAY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I shall have to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). In the absence of my general pair, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. Not being able to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIS (when his name was called). I am paired for the day with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have announced my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BALL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DU PONT] is absent on account of illness. Were he present he would vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] on account of illness.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG. I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Ball	Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck
Broussard	Elkins	Kellogg	Oddie
Bursum	Ernst	Keyes	Page
Calder	Fletcher	Ladd	Ransdell
Cameron	France	McNary	Shortridge

Fernald	McKellar	Shields	Weller
Gerry	McKinley	Simmons	Williams

So the joint resolution was passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over from the corporation P. de Ronde & Co. (Inc.) a certain transaction entered into and carried on by said corporation at the request and under the direction of the Department of Justice, which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic, between the 15th day of June, 1920, and the 22d day of June, 1920, of 5,000 tons of sugar, the importation thereof into the United States and the distribution of a portion of the same within the United States, and to require the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to dispense of any of said sugar so imported remaining undisposed of and to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction, paying to the corporation aforesaid such sum as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by them in said transaction, and for this purpose the President is authorized to vote or use the stock of the corporation held by him, or otherwise exercise or use his control over the said United States Sugar Equalization Board and its directors, and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this joint resolution.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 172, submitted by Mr. SPENCER November 15, 1921, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I shall discuss this afternoon a speech made some days ago in the Senate by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. Before I do that, however, I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] if I am within my rights in presuming that the interview which I hold in my hand is authentic. I do this because the Senator from Kansas said the other day, in discussing a purported newspaper interview, that nothing occurred in the Senate unless he knew of the accuracy of it. I have now in my hand what purports to be a statement made yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] touching the Newberry case. May I inquire of the Senator from Kansas if it is authentic?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator from Arkansas ask that question of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; the Senator from Missouri never was an authority upon but one thing, and that is that everything said against Mr. Newberry is not true. The Senator from Kansas is the one who is to tell us whether we can believe newspaper reports, and I wish to get his permission to use this.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Kansas said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CARAWAY. What did the Senator from Kansas say?

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Kansas said there was not a line of truth in, or any foundation for, the report that the administration was trying to influence the appointment of a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania in the interest of Mr. Newberry.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the Senator from Kansas gave as his authority for that statement that his position in the Senate enabled him to know what was transpiring.

Mr. CURTIS. I referred to the majority organization, and I think I do know as to that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, if the Senator from Kansas will read his statement, he will find that he is in error. But if the Senator from Kansas declines to inform me, I shall ask the Senator from Missouri if he was correctly reported in the interview published in this morning's Washington Post, in which he is quoted as speaking with authority respecting Senator Newberry's intention of making a speech in defense of his seat in the Senate.

Mr. SPENCER. I have not seen the interview.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me read it.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not know what the Senator from Arkansas has in mind. If the Senator will read the interview, I will be very glad to answer his question.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will read it. It is as follows:

Senator Newberry (Republican), Michigan, the title to whose seat is to be decided next week, returned to the Capital yesterday, and it is understood began preparations to defend himself against the charges made by Henry Ford, his Democratic opponent.

Of course, he waits a long time to commence his defense.

Mr. Newberry conferred with Senator SPENCER (Republican), Missouri, chairman of the Elections Committee which conducted the inquiry into the Michigan case. Senator SPENCER, however, declined to discuss the interview, but later when the Newberry case got into debate in the Senate, the Missouri Senator said that there was "quite a probability that the junior Senator from Michigan would come before the Senate to make a statement."

Mr. SPENCER. I said that, and I should like to repeat now, so that there may be ample notice given, that it is my understanding that the junior Senator from the State of Michigan insists upon appearing before the Senate to make a statement, and will do so.

Mr. CARAWAY. He "insists." Has anybody ever denied him the right that he must thus insist?

Mr. SPENCER. In so far as his rights in connection with the Senate are concerned, of course, as the Senator from Arkansas well knows, he had that right.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask, then, why the Senator from Missouri used the word "insists"?

Mr. SPENCER. I used the word "insists" because there were a great many of Mr. Newberry's relatives and friends who felt that the state of his health was such that he had no business to subject himself to an ordeal which no one can better understand than the Senator from Arkansas, who is now speaking, and yet in spite of that I understand that the junior Senator from Michigan insists—and I use the word advisedly—that he will make an address before the Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator another question? Did the junior Senator from Michigan so state to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SPENCER. Not in so many words, but what more does the Senator from Arkansas want when I tell him frankly and freely that what he has quoted as to my having said I did say, and that my understanding is that that is precisely the intention of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator from Missouri will restrain his feelings——

Mr. SPENCER. I have no feelings.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then I hope he will not make such a manifestation of them. There will be plenty of occasion for the Senator to become wrought up before the matter is determined, so that there is no need to anticipate. This is what I want to know: Is the statement correct that the Senator from Michigan had a conversation with reference to this case with the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SPENCER. Entirely so. I had a conversation with the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, I want to ask the Senator this question: The Senator from Missouri was appointed by the Senate as one of its agents to take testimony in this particular case and report this and the findings back to the Senate, was he not?

Mr. SPENCER. I was.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is not every Member of the Senate as much entitled to know what Mr. Newberry says about his case as is the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SPENCER. That is what I have just informed the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the Senator from Missouri refused to let the minority call Mr. Newberry when his presence was desired before the committee, did he not?

Mr. SPENCER. I did not refuse, but I felt that his attendance before the committee should not be demanded.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the Senator from Missouri not vote that the junior Senator from Michigan should not even be requested to appear before the committee?

Mr. SPENCER. That may have been the wording of the resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have as much right, and every other Senator in this Chamber has, to know what Senator Newberry says in his own defense as has the Senator from Missouri. Is that not correct?

Mr. SPENCER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, why did the Senator from Missouri deny all other Members of the Senate the right to know what Senator Newberry's defense is and have a private conversation with him and advise him as to what he should do in this matter?

Mr. SPENCER. I have not had a private conversation with him as to what he should do in this matter, except the same kind of a conversation that I have had with those representing the other side and with the counsel of Mr. Ford, who is now in the gallery listening to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is not true——

Mr. SPENCER. May I answer the Senator?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. There is always a freedom of intercourse and conversation in such matters before the Senate. In that respect the proceedings here are entirely different from those before a court. All that the junior Senator from Michigan will say will be said upon the floor of the Senate. I do not know what it will be, and evidently the Senator from Arkansas does not know what it will be.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I never had a chance to talk with the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SPENCER. We will both hear it at the same time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri has he never discussed this case with the junior Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SPENCER. That depends upon what the Senator from Arkansas means by "discussed."

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Missouri knows what the word "discussed" means.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator from Arkansas will allow me to answer a question before he interrupts we should get along very much better.

Mr. CARAWAY. And if the Senator would not try to "bawl me out," we should get along better.

Mr. SPENCER. My reply to the question of the Senator from Arkansas depends upon what he means by "discussed." I have talked this matter over with Senator Newberry, as I have with those upon the other side. I do not think I have ever talked with Senator Newberry about the matter more than three or four times. If that is what the Senator means by "discussed," I have discussed it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator from Missouri know what Senator Newberry will say about this matter?

Mr. SPENCER. I do not. Until the junior Senator from Michigan speaks I do not know any more about what he will say than does the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. It never has been discussed, then, between the junior Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Missouri as to what the defense of the junior Senator from Michigan is to be?

Mr. SPENCER. No.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the Senator from Missouri ever discuss the question with Senator Newberry before he denied the minority the right to hear the Senator's explanation?

Mr. SPENCER. I have just stated that I had never discussed that question, and that would include the Senator's present question.

Mr. CARAWAY. That includes all of it?

Mr. SPENCER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, why did the Senator from Missouri take it upon himself yesterday to object to having an extension of time granted to Senator Newberry, to enable him to make his speech, and why did the Senator from Missouri make the statement that the request for the extension did not come from Senator Newberry's friends?

Mr. SPENCER. The fact that it did not come from Senator Newberry's friends was obvious, and there was no need of an extension, for there is unlimited debate from now until Monday or Tuesday, and after that an hour's debate is allowed. The Senator knows well enough that the motive that prompted the suggestion was a motive of antipathy and antagonism; the Senator knows well enough that if the junior Senator from Michigan did not speak until after the limitation began, under the interpretation of that limitation the Senate would have given him any amount of time; and the purpose of asking for the extension did not seem to me to be in good faith.

Mr. CARAWAY. What does the Senator think the purpose was?

Mr. SPENCER. To create some kind of an embarrassment for the junior Senator from Michigan, who has been subjected upon the other side and at the hands of the Senator from Arkansas, who is now speaking, to an abuse and an attack and to a vilification that to my mind——

Mr. CARAWAY. I challenge the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. SPENCER. May I finish the sentence?

Mr. CARAWAY. Just a moment——

Mr. SPENCER. That to my mind is brutal in its atrocity.

Mr. CARAWAY. I challenge the Senator from Missouri to point to one word of vilification that I have ever uttered against the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SPENCER. I may simply answer by saying to the Senator from Arkansas that if he will read practically every speech that he has made upon this subject he will find the warrant for what I have been stating.

Mr. CARAWAY. I challenge that statement; and when the Senator has gone to the RECORD and looked it up, I am willing that he shall rise and make the explanation, which he will have to make with reference to the Newberry case, that he knew absolutely nothing of the matter about which he was talking.

Mr. SPENCER. Has the Senator obtained all the information from me that he desires?

Mr. CARAWAY. I have obtained all that I expected to get, which was absolutely nothing. [Laughter.]

By the way, may I ask the Senator from Missouri one other question? When is the speech he has made in defense of Senator Newberry to be published?

Mr. SPENCER. That is on a par with the Senator's other questions, if he refers to the speech delivered by me.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. The speech has been published and has been in the RECORD for weeks. Evidently the Senator from Arkansas has treated it as he has treated the record in the Newberry case—with absolute indifference.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will admit that I did not think it bore at all upon the facts in the case, but I had overlooked its being published.

Mr. SPENCER. Then why was the Senator so anxious to know when it was published?

Mr. CARAWAY. As a mere literary curiosity I wanted to read it.

Mr. SPENCER. I will be very glad to send the Senator a copy of it if the Senator is anxious to read it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I shall be very glad, indeed, to have it. May I now, without being offensive, ask the Senator from Missouri one other question?

Mr. SPENCER. I shall be glad to have the Senator ask any question he desires, although I seem to be unable to make myself understood by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think I understand the Senator perfectly.

Mr. SPENCER. But nevertheless the Senator's questions are delightful.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understand they are, and it is quite a pleasant performance for both of us. However, this is what I want to know: What does the Senator mean by saying that some suggestions come from the enemies of Senator Newberry and some from his friends? Does the Senator mean that certain Senators are going to vote for Senator Newberry because they are friendly to him, and others are going to vote against him because they are unfriendly to him?

Mr. SPENCER. I hope not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, what does the Senator mean?

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Missouri means that the impression which the attitude of the Senator from Arkansas has made upon him is one of bitter, vindictive hatred for the man. I class the Senator from Arkansas precisely as one of the leaders of those to whom I have referred as the enemies of Senator Newberry. I do not mean that the statement made by me applies to all Members of the Senate upon the other side; I know that there are Senators upon the other side who will vote against Senator Newberry from the highest motives and from convictions of judgment, and yet what I have said about those who are enemies of Senator Newberry must stand as I have said it.

Mr. CARAWAY. That means that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and myself are going to vote against Senator Newberry because we are enemies of his.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not say why the Senator from Arkansas will vote against him; I do not know how the Senator will vote; but I say with perfect frankness, because the Senator has asked me, that the impression made upon my mind by the attitude and the speeches of the Senator from Arkansas is one of vindictive hatred toward the Senator from Michigan. Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; just as nearly as the Senator from Missouri ever answered any question. It so happens that I have never made any speech against Senator Newberry at all. I am going to make one for the enlightenment of the Senator from Missouri; but since the Senator from Missouri wants to be complimentary and says that I am bitterly and vindictively opposed to Senator Newberry—I think I spoke to him on one occasion—the Senator from Missouri has impressed the Senator from Arkansas with the fact that he was indeed a friend of Senator Newberry's and that the record in this case really did not affect that friendship at all. However, I do not think the Senator has any information he intends to give out.

Mr. SPENCER. I trust the Senator will allow me to send him a copy of my speech.

Mr. CARAWAY. That will contain no information, as I remember it.

I have said so much merely as a preliminary. I want to discuss—and I use the word "discuss" now in the same sense the Senator from Missouri used it so that he will not be misled—the speech delivered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], which was alleged to have been in defense of Senator Newberry, but which in fact was a threat against certain Members of the Senate from the Southern States.

I hope the Senator from New Hampshire has not left the Chamber. I told him I wanted to discuss his speech, although

I do not know that I blame him for going away. However, the Senator from New Hampshire made a charge against the former administration, which, if believed by the Senator himself, should have compelled at his hands an investigation. The Senator from New Hampshire said that the administration that has just gone out of power during the war swelled the returns from Republican States and shrank them from Democratic States in order to compel a larger number of Republicans to serve in the Army in proportion to their real number than those from the Democratic States; in other words, that the administration used the machinery in its hands to put boys into the service and send them across the sea to fight and die for the flag because they were Republicans and kept Democratic young men at home and gave them exemption by falsifying the census returns.

I want to say that I challenge that statement, and I want to say, sir, that if I believed that any officer of this Government had been guilty of an offense of that kind, and I had been a Member of this body, I would have risen in my seat and demanded that an investigation be had. If the President of these United States had been guilty of an offense of that kind, I would have demanded that the other branch of Congress should prefer charges against him, and eventually that he should be brought to trial before the bar of the Senate and impeached and driven out of office. So help me, Almighty God, I would not sit here and let any man, because he held an official position, use that power to send men unjustly to their death simply because they voted the Republican ticket; and I say now that if the Senator from New Hampshire had any evidence of the truthfulness of that charge, he ought to have demanded that the men who were guilty of that offense should have been brought to justice, tried, and punished.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that I did not happen to be a Member of the Senate in 1917.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator evidently had this information, if he ever had it, when he did become a Member of the Senate; and I should like to know why he did not then demand some kind of an inquiry to develop the facts and have those punished who were guilty of such an infamous offense.

Then the Senator complained of his own embarrassment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator from New Hampshire has been a Member of this body, though, for some years, and was a Member for some time prior to the termination of the Democratic administration. Did he make any effort, prior to the conclusion of the Democratic administration, to have anybody punished and have the matter investigated then?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am absolutely certain that he did not.

The Senator from New Hampshire then calls attention to the embarrassment under which he labored when he came into this body. He said that the administration was trying to keep Republicans from being seated, and I want to call to the attention of the Senate the only thing against which he loudly cried out. I am reading from his speech. He says:

> I hope to speak without feeling, Mr. President, but I can not forget the embarrassment of my first hour upon this floor—> an embarrassment which arose wholly, as Senators will readily understand, because I had to remain silent.

Now, mark you—

Somebody would not let him talk, and that was the sole source of his embarrassment—that he had to be silent! Since that time he certainly has labored under no kind of embarrassment.

There is one other thing to which I want to call attention, because it is going to be interesting.

The Senator went out of his way to attack the South. Well, God bless his soul, if it affords him any pleasure the South does not object at all.

The attack, however, was coupled with a threat. First, he expressed his astonishment that Democrats from the South should assail Newberry's right to sit in this body, and then he asserted that the people of the South were suppressing votes and that the South was ruled by an oligarchy of 30 per cent of its white voters. He further said that when the reapportionment bill came up he intended to have pressed a resolution to reduce the representation of those States which denied the franchise to other classes. In other words, if his statement meant anything at all, it meant that unless we of the South were willing for them of the North to sell seats in this body to their rich political followers we should be punished by having our representation in the Congress reduced. That is all it means, or it meant absolutely nothing.

So far as I am concerned—and I think I speak for every man from the South—we do not sell our votes and we do not yield to threats or coercion. That has been tried for 50 years in my section of the country, and it has produced no results yet; and therefore it is not going to deter any man on this side of the Chamber, any man from my section of the country, from denouncing the sale and barter of seats in this body, to threaten to take away our representation unless we modify our course in this particular case.

Now I want to read the Senator's statement. It is a little long, but I hope you will bear with me. I may say, first, that attention is directed to the number of votes cast and the number of people who were entitled to vote in certain Southern States, including my own and Alabama and Florida and Georgia and Louisiana and Mississippi and North Carolina and Oklahoma and South Carolina and Tennessee and Texas and Virginia. Then a comparison is made with the votes cast in certain Northern States, showing that New Hampshire, with 460,000 people, cast more votes than the whole State of Alabama, with over 2,000,000 people. It concludes with this statement:

> I am prepared to be told, Mr. President, that all this has no connection with the election of a Senator in Michigan. I am equally prepared, sir, to resist that assertion. The adage of law is that he who seeks equity shall do equity; and it is equally aphoristic that those who declaim about the purity and integrity of the Senate should have equivalent consideration for the purity and integrity of the entire legislative establishment. The money changers were scourged not only from the porch of the temple but from the entire sacred precinct; and if elections are to be inquired into, inquiry should not hold in a few isolated States of the North, but should proceed with diligence over the whole extent of the Union. According to the figures which I have above quoted, Mr. President, no less than 37 Members of Congress and an equal number of members of the Electoral College exercise their functions on the basis of a counted, though submerged, population in contravention of the language and the intent of the Federal Constitution.
> It will be urged that States alone may regulate the qualifications of their voters. It will be urged, too, that under this authority many States, including my own, have cast restrictions about the exercise of the franchise. This is true, Mr. President, and so far as I am concerned I am entirely willing that my State shall pay the price which the Constitution exacts from those communities which, having for any reason abridged suffrage, shall have their representation reduced in the proportion of that abridgment. It certainly can not be claimed, sir, that New Hampshire, with a total population of 460,000, yet casting a total vote of 156,000, has abridged suffrage in any like proportion with the State of Alabama, whose population is 2,138,000, yet casts a total vote of only 232,000.
> Mr. President, I can not state with accuracy the reasons which the Southern States advance for their repressive election laws. I can not say whether they are necessary for preservation of law and order, for the maintenance of economical government, or even, if you please, for the upholding of white supremacy. But this I do know, that in the Southern States which I have hitherto enumerated there were in the census of 1910 more than 4,000,000 white males of voting age out of a total qualified electorate of 5,761,000, yet those States cast only 1,251,000 votes, which, even had they been exclusively white, would indicate that the oligarchy of 30 per cent is ruling both white and black in that section of the country. The privilege thus obtained is high and valuable. Why is it not worth paying for? Where is the boasted chivalry of the South?
> I speak of this now, Mr. President, because during the Sixty-sixth Congress I deemed it my duty to present a resolution calling for such inquiry. I asked that it might be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which had been so diligent in pursuing the Michigan investigation, but the Vice President referred it to the Committee on the Judiciary, where it slept painlessly.
> The Vice President vouchsafed no reasons for refusing my request. Later, in several southern newspapers, I read—and I now quote from the Birmingham Age-Herald:
> "There are southerners on the Judiciary Committee, and the resolution in all probability will die a-bornin'."
> Mr. President, I had and have no desire to legislate exclusively for one section of the country or against another. My desire solely is that we shall be a nation and not a group of sections; that our laws shall be fair and equitable; that the Constitution shall operate equally in every community, and that the purity and integrity not only of the Senate but of all our institutions shall be maintained. To those on the other side of the Chamber who have so vigorously opposed the resolution which we are now considering I can only say: "Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye but not the beam in thine own?"

Now I want to call this to your attention:

> Mr. President, the day is not far distant when the Senate will pass finally upon the contested election in Michigan. I shall vote for Senator Newberry, and I shall vote for him because I believe him innocent. The vengeance of Henry Ford has already been invoked upon the Senate.

Then, going back, I want to read this paragraph:

> Lip service was freely rendered to him—

That is, the President—

> by representative men of the Southland. It is too much to hope, Mr. President, that words may now be translated into deeds and that in view of the approaching reapportionment made necessary by the recent census we may have an inquiry, widespread and searching, so that the purity and integrity of American representative institutions shall be maintained everywhere?

I took that then, and I take it yet, to be a threat that if we do not seat Senator Newberry our representation shall be cut down; but, anyway, it was a plea for the Negro to vote.

Now, I want to read you what was testified to by the Senator from New Hampshire, who himself was the manager of a campaign in 1920; and, by the way, strange as it may seem, he was the manager for the Southern States. He dealt with this Negro population, this "submerged" Negro population, for whose rights he here pleads, and I will read what he testified, for this reason: It shows why he should indorse the seating of Senator Newberry. It shows why he should condone every step that was taken, because his use of money in controlling the "southern delegates" to the Republican convention was exactly the same that Senator Newberry's friends used in controlling the primary election in Michigan—exactly. I could tear pages out of this book here that I hold in my hand, which is the sworn testimony of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], and insert them in the record of the hearings in the Newberry case, and there is not a man living, including the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], who could tell where one ceased and the other commenced.

Incidentally, I want to say that I sympathize with the conclusions reached by the Senator from New Hampshire, but I do not follow his desire, then, to extend further political rights to that particular class of people. He said, in effect, that when you got a vote for the Republican Party from the Negroes in the South you had to buy it, and that after you bought it you did not know whether you had it or not; that you had to take it up to the city where your convention was held, you had to furnish the vote a room, you had to feed it, you had to furnish it something to drink, and you had to watch it then to keep the enemy from slipping in and getting it after you had gone to all that expense and trouble. Yet, with that acknowledged difficulty in dealing with his own crowd—and he said he speaks with authority, because he has dealt with this particular crowd through three presidential elections—he wants to compel everybody in the South to submit to a domination of that character of people!

I want to read you his sworn testimony. It is interesting. It is very, very interesting. Incidentally, let me say that Senator MOSES was what was called the Washington representative of the Leonard Wood candidacy for the Presidency—a candidacy that failed because the methods of using money became so distasteful to the Republican Party that they refused to have anything to do with Wood's campaign—and after his friends had spent $1,500,000 in buying delegates they made him repudiate his own organization and practically retire from the race. I might say in passing that his friends have been suing each other ever since to know who was responsible for all this money that they expended, and the Lord only knows who promised to pay it. The courts never have been able to determine; but Senator MOSES had charge of $39,500 of money to buy Negroes with, and he admits that he never got his money's worth. He had a thousand dollars left when he got through, but he said he thought somebody in Maryland had a lien on that, and they would get that away from him.

He began thus—I shall omit all the preliminary questions, in which he showed his particular fitness to deal with this class of people in this particular manner, and I think it is conceded that he did.

He said he collected some money and sent it to the Chicago headquarters—$1,500 or less. Then he says:

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you receive from Chicago?
Senator MOSES. About $40,000; I think the exact amount is $39,500.
The CHAIRMAN. Whom was that sent to you by?
Senator MOSES. That was sent to me by the treasurer, Mr. Sprague, and from Gen. Burt. Two remittances came from Gen. Burt at the time when Mr. Sprague was not in Chicago.
The CHAIRMAN. Was he an assistant of some kind to Mr. Sprague?
Senator MOSES. Gen. Burt was connected with the Wood headquarters in Chicago in some way; in what capacity I do not know.

There is the same lack of definite information which runs through the Newberry case. Nobody knows his master and nobody knows his servant. It is a case of not letting the right hand know what the left hand does. Therefore you do not know who it is who sends you the money.

My acquaintance with him was wholly casual.
The CHAIRMAN. Was that all the money that you had?
Senator MOSES. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. How large a headquarters did you keep here?
Senator MOSES. The expenses of the headquarters were about $1,000 a week.
The CHAIRMAN. How long did you keep them going?
Senator MOSES. Substantially five months; I think it was 19 weeks, to be exact.
The CHAIRMAN. The literature that you sent out—I assume that you did—you received from Chicago?
Senator MOSES. Yes; some from New York; some from Mr. Frederick Moore, who was head of the publicity department, I think, of the Leonard Wood League, with headquarters in New York. Some came to me from Chicago. I think—

He says "I think." He does not know exactly.

I think the matter that came to me from Chicago, however, was wholly playing cards bearing Gen. Wood's picture.

I would like to have informed the Senator from New Hampshire that if he had gotten dice he would have obtained better results, because in my particular section of the country playing cards are used largely by the white population, and dice are the Negro's gambling implements. I continue reading:

And I had printed here some slips of an editorial from the New York Tribune, printed in such form that they were used as envelope fillers, and one of those was put in every letter sent out from headquarters here.

I skip all that preliminary matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you send money into these different Southern States?
Senator MOSES. I sent money into some of the States—not to all.
The CHAIRMAN. To which ones, and to whom, and how much?
Senator MOSES. I sent into West Virginia something less than $500 which was paid to a man named Emerson—who was a field agent; he went about through the State. I would get a list of men whom I wanted him to see, and he would sound them out, and after having made a visit to them he would come back and report to me what they said.

Listen to this—

He had only a part of West Virginia, a very small part of it, but he had a field agent, and Newberry had eight field agents, as I now recall. The Senator from Missouri will set me right if I am wrong. I continue reading:

If those men were found to be friendly, I would get into communication with them by letter and have them organize a Wood club in their town or county and generally try to get them to start the candidacies of delegates in their congressional districts who would favor the nomination of Gen. Wood.
I sent into the State of Maryland $1,000 to the Leonard Wood League.
The CHAIRMAN. Who was the party to whom it was sent?
Senator MOSES. I can not recall—

I do wish that somebody would be original and not copy the methods of the Newberry case through all its entirety. I continue:

I can not recall whether the check was made payable to Col. Hill or to Mr. Blanchard Randall, the president of the Leonard Wood League in Maryland.
The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you about West Virginia before you leave that. That $500 you did not send to Mr. Dorch?
Senator MOSES. No; I sent no money to him whatever.
The CHAIRMAN. That would not be included in the money that he told us of having received in West Virginia?
Senator MOSES. No; but all the sums I have been speaking of would be included in the sums that Col. Procter has spoken of as having been received in the general headquarters.

That reads exactly like Charley Floyd's testimony and King's testimony in the Newberry case, to the effect that they did not know whether $5,000 was a certain $5,000 or not, but it was always included in the final sum total reported. This goes on:

I still have some obligations in connection with the Maryland primaries, but no very great sum. I have already testified that I have something like $1,000 or $1,500 still remaining in my hands. That is the sum named in my estimates as conveyed to Gen. Procter, representing the money which I would spend in connection with the Maryland campaign, and I have not learned from either Col. Hill or Mr. Randall what the amount of that obligation is; but it is within the figure I have named.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hill had charge of the general Maryland campaign, did he?
Senator MOSES. Col. Hill was an officer of the Leonard Wood League. I think Col. Hill was the most active man in connection with the Leonard Wood campaign in Maryland.

He does not answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us go on to the other States.
Senator MOSES. I sent into Virginia at one time $1,000, which was used in the ninth congressional district.

I submit that if you sent the same into every congressional district, Virginia would be tolerably well taken care of by one candidate for the Presidency, since there were eight or nine running.

I do recall—and, with an apology to the Senator from Kansas, I quote a newspaper—that it was said that when the delegates met in the ninth congressional district in Virginia to instruct delegates for Wood it was charged upon the floor that they could hear the Wood gold rattling in the pockets of the delegates. I continue reading:

Mr. MOSES. I sent into Virginia at one time $1,000, which was used in the ninth congressional district, and I think a portion of it was also used in the seventh congressional district. That money was sent very early in the campaign over there and was used at the time the county mass conventions were held, and my understanding was that it was expended for the purpose of bringing the voters to the mass conventions.

How you brought them, the Lord only knows—whether you paid transportation for them or tolled them in—but it was used to pay for bringing the voters to the mass conventions. I continue:

The CHAIRMAN. How much was that?
Senator MOSES. That was $1,000.
The CHAIRMAN. To whom was that sent?
Senator MOSES. That was sent to Dr. Dougherty. I have forgotten the name of the town where he lives; he is a delegate from the ninth congressional district.

I gave—I think it was to State Senator Chase, my impression is—$300, which was spent in the field work of the nature which I have described in West Virginia.

That is, to go around and find out whether somebody was or was not and then come back and tell. I would like to read all this, but I skip some and call attention to what I now shall read:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you find evidence of expenditures by other candidates in Virginia?

Senator MOSES. Well, I heard rumors of expenditures in behalf of one other candidate, but they were so nebulous that I was not able to give much credence to them, and my impression as to Virginia is that it was not necessary to spend much money in behalf of the only opponent whom Gen. Wood met in the State, because the organization in the State was very strongly for that candidate.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, go on to the other States.

Senator MOSES. I sent $5,000 to Zeb B. Waltzer, of Lexington, N. C., which was used by him in the county mass conventions prior to the holding of their State convention.

How he used it the Lord only knows, but he got $5,000 for mass conventions in North Carolina. But that is not all. He was asked:

The CHAIRMAN. He was a colored man, was he?

Senator MOSES. No.

The CHAIRMAN. A white man?

Senator MOSES. He was a former attorney general of the State, and former speaker of the House of Representatives of North Carolina.

Senator POMERENE. What was his name?

Senator MOSES. Zeb B. Waltzer; his home is in Lexington, N. C. He is the president of the Leonard Wood League in that State.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all that you spent in that State?

Senator MOSES. No. When it became evident that we would have a contest in the North Carolina primary, which takes place on the 5th of June, it became necessary to supplement the work that had been done prior to the conventions, and I telegraphed Mr. Waltzer that he was at liberty to draw upon me here for $3,000 additional, which he did.

The CHAIRMAN. That is $8,000.

Senator MOSES. That is $8,000.

Senator POMERENE. Will you pardon a question there? You have said that this $5,000 was used in connection with the county conventions?

Senator MOSES. Yes.

Senator POMERENE. And now you indicate that the primary will be held on June 5?

Senator MOSES. Yes.

Senator POMERENE. What is the relation between the work of the conventions and that of the primary?

Senator MOSES. The conventions, Senator Pomerene, in North Carolina choose delegates to the national convention; and those conventions are generally held very early in the course of the campaign. The date of the primary is fixed by law, and in that primary they nominate their State ticket. In connection with that State primary they may also hold a preferential primary in the presidential years; and while that vote is not mandatory it is advisory upon the delegates; and the filing for that primary was much later than all the filings for the conventions, and it was only a few weeks ago that it became evident that we would have to supplement what had already been done in North Carolina by going into the preferential primary also.

He lost his first thousand dollars by betting it on the wrong horse. I read further:

The CHAIRMAN. What other Southern States did you go into?

Senator MOSES. In South Carolina I expended something like $600, which was expended in connection with the conventions in two districts only; and that money was paid to a Mr. Andrews, a colored man who was a delegate in his district.

That is one "nigger" who got what was coming to him.

Senator POMERENE. Was this money paid to him?

Senator MOSES. Yes; paid to him in connection with the work of organizing the mass conventions in the county prior to the district convention. I do not know if you are familiar with the method of conducting conventions in the Southern States, generally speaking, Senator Pomerene.

Senator POMERENE. No.

Now, here is your authority on organizing a "nigger" convention in South Carolina, and the Senators from South Carolina ought to recognize this:

Senator MOSES. They call a lot of mass conventions in the counties, in which all the members of the party come in, and there is no registration; there is no check list; there is nothing to safeguard the voting; and these mass conventions choose the delegates to the district conventions, representing their counties, and the district conventions elect delegates to the national convention, exactly as they do in States where the party is better organized.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all the money in that State?

Senator MOSES. That is all in South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the next?

Senator MOSES. In Alabama——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). What about Georgia?

Senator MOSES. In Georgia, I sent $5,000 to Roscoe Pickett, the chairman of the Republican State committee.

I would like to call attention a little later on to what one Mr. Lincoln Johnson, who is also a gentleman of color, said about Pickett's methods, because Johnson said he was trying to organize down there. Johnson is a "nigger" after my own heart. He does not believe in wasting what you have. He believes in collective bargaining. He wanted to send to Chicago a delegation uninstructed, and then offer it to the highest bidder; but Mr. Pickett, another colored gentleman, who had gotten—was it $5,000?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I dislike to correct the Senator with reference to matters going on in Southern States, but I will state that Mr. Pickett is a white man.

Mr. CARAWAY. He acted more like a "nigger" than any white man I ever knew. He had all the characteristics of one, and I will tell you what the other "niggers" said about him. They said he came into the convention at Atlanta with money sticking out of every pocket, and it was Senator MOSES's money, because he was the man who sent it to him. He wanted to know what the "niggers" wanted, and he was pretending to pay their railroad fare, and one "nigger" who had paid $7.40 for a roundtrip ticket got $50, of Leonard Wood's money, through the southern headquarters, of which my friend from New Hampshire, Senator MOSES, was the manager. I still think they imposed upon Senator MOSES. I do not think Pickett is white. He may be what we call a light-colored colored gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS. He is white.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator say he is white?

Mr. HARRIS. He is.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would not admit it. I continue reading:

Senator POMERENE. What State was that?

Senator MOSES. Georgia. I have since—very recently—paid a few hundred dollars for the printing of briefs in the contested cases in Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all the money you sent to Pickett?

Senator MOSES. That is all the money I sent to Mr. Pickett.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all the money you sent to Georgia?

Senator MOSES. All the money I recall sending to anybody in Georgia at all.

Oh, the beauty of a memory that fails!

Senator POMERENE. How much?

Senator MOSES. Five thousand dollars.

Senator POMERENE. I thought you said a few hundred dollars?

Senator MOSES. No; I paid a few hundred dollars for printing later.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been quite an active fight in Georgia for contested delegations, has there not?

Senator MOSES. I would say that "active" was a mild adjective to use in describing it.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I have a communication here from Mr. Henry Lincoln Johnson, who was to be here to-day, but was unable to come, and who has sent a man in his place. Do you know Mr. Henry Lincoln Johnson?

Senator MOSES. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. He is a pretty active man down there?

Mr. MOSES. He is, indeed.

It is funny that the commonest cornfield "nigger" in the world can always fleece the smartest white man. He can just take his money off of him so fast that he would catch cold. Senator MOSES said, "He was, indeed."

Senator POMERENE. When did you get acquainted with him?

Senator MOSES. I got acquainted with him in the course of the national campaign four years ago, when Mr. Henry Lincoln Johnson and I were both favoring the nomination of Senator WEEKS.

I hate to think that a man would turn against his confederates when they part company. I believe if you start out with a man, if the other fellow hires him away from you, at least be game and take your losses. That is the rule we follow down there.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Henry Lincoln Johnson says in this letter, which I will put in the record—but it may be interesting to discuss it a little first—that:

"Coincident with conferences held by Republicans who believe as I did, there came into the State"——

Senator POMERENE (interposing). How did he believe?

The CHAIRMAN. He was a Lowden man, was he not?

You know they said Lowden had a barrel, too.

Senator MOSES. He told me in December that he was committed to Gov. Lowden.

And evidently Senator MOSES did not believe it.

Senator MOSES. He told me in December that he was committed to Gov. Lowden.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emerson testified that he sent money to him. Mr. Johnson continues:

"There came into the State agents such as Mr. Bean, of Florida, in conjunction with Capt. Henry Blun, of Savannah, and grouped around themselves men in Georgia whom they said would make the fight for the control of Georgia's delegates by Mr. Frank H. Hitchcock."

I think he was Gen. Wood's manager, was he not? Of course, there is no use to ask. Nobody knows.

Who is Mr. Bean?

Senator MOSES. Mr. Bean is the Republican national committeeman from Florida.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he a sort of scout in that country?

Senator MOSES. After Mr. Hitchcock became more actively identified with the Wood movement, Mr. Bean visited two or three Southern States, with the view of bringing together the factions, as far as possible, for Gen. Wood.

We all know how they did it.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is Mr. Bean?

Senator MOSES. He is the national committeeman from Florida.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Mr. Bean had authority to spend money, of course?

Senator MOSES. Not from me.

The CHAIRMAN. No; he was not under you, was he?

Senator MOSES. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. And who else was with Mr. Bean through that country, do you know?
Senator MOSES. No; I do not.
The CHAIRMAN. He mentions Capt. Henry Blun, of Savannah; who was he?
Senator MOSES. Well, he lives in Georgia.

Of course, that is a full explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Mr. Bean was a sort of "flying squadron" man going all over the South?
Senator MOSES. My first contact with Mr. Bean came in connection with the contests which arose. Mr. Bean reported to me with reference to the contests, and he gathered the evidence in some of the contested cases; but he did not do it under my direction, nor was he reporting to me, except casually.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the expenditures of Mr. Bean?
Senator MOSES. No.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how long he was going through the Southern States?
Senator MOSES. No.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how many months he put in at it?
Senator MOSES. Well, I would say that Mr. Bean, under the circumstances, could not possibly have been engaged in that work in the South more than two months, up to now.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you know that he has been at that work for a couple of months?
Senator MOSES. Well, I know he has been doing a good many things in connection with the Wood campaign for about two months.
The CHAIRMAN. Henry Lincoln Johnson further says:
"To summarize: My side, coupled with men like J. H. Watson, of Albany; Walter S. Scott, of Savannah; E. L. Wheaton, of Macon; Col. C. P. Goree, Mr. M. H. Karnes, and Mr. J. W. Martin, of Atlanta, stood open in Georgia for uninstructed delegates, as above stated."
Do you know any of those gentlemen?
Senator MOSES. I know Mr. Goree by name, but I know none of the others.
The CHAIRMAN (reading):
"The other group, led generally by Roscoe Pickett"—

Here is where the trouble begins. These are the men whom "Col." Henry Lincoln Johnson had in mind, and coming upon the scene is Col. Pickett with $5,000 of money sent from Washington from the southern headquarters of the Wood campaign.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator goes further, may I ask him a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have heard him frequently refer to a Moses. Is that the Senator from New Hampshire or the original Hebrew law-giver?

Mr. CARAWAY. If they are not both one and the same, then the Senator from New Hampshire is the one I am talking about.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just wanted to know.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not blame the Senator for wanting to know accurately which one it is.

The chairman then asked:

He is the one you sent the $5,000 to?
Senator MOSES. Yes; he is chairman of the State committee.
The CHAIRMAN (reading):
"Clark Grier"—
Who is he?
Senator MOSES. He is very active in Georgia politics. I do not know him personally.
The CHAIRMAN (reading):
"D. C. Cole"—
Who is he?
Senator MOSES. D. C. Cole is a former business man at Marietta, Ga.
The CHAIRMAN. Then he goes on:
"and others, began honeycombing the State with agents in an endeavor to take charge of the Republican organization in this State and make a complete delivery of it to Mr. Frank H. Hitchcock. This set the stage and the fight was on."

That is what Henry Lincoln Johnson said, and I will tell you in a minute how they fought. You know ordinarily down with us a "nigger" fight means razors, but in this particular case it was not that kind of a "nigger" fight. The stage was set with $5,000 sent from Washington. Col. Pickett, of color, was the general in command, and he honeycombed the State and bought delegates, so Henry Lincoln Johnson said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I inquire who is Henry Lincoln Johnson? Does he occupy now a position under this administration?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; the administration tried to give him a position as register of deeds here in the District of Columbia, and the Senate refused to confirm him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I understand.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; that is who he is.

The chairman then asked:

Is that the way you understand the stage setting?
Senator MOSES. No; I understand that Henry Lincoln Johnson had the scenery all laid before we arrived.

That is the cry, you know, of the fellow who thinks he has got the raw edge of a deal.

The CHAIRMAN. Before you arrived—and pulled off the play?
Senator MOSES. Well, he had it advertised; and the prologue had been performed.
Senator POMERENE. Who is going to deliver the epilogue?
Senator MOSES. I think the national committee and the committee on credentials—

That is, at Chicago—

The CHAIRMAN. Further on he says—

Reading from Henry Lincoln Johnson's letter—

"The Hitchcock group began in open meetings on the 4th day of December, 1919, when Roscoe Pickett and Clark Grier called a meeting in Atlanta"——
Senator MOSES (interposing). Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt you from time to time?
The CHAIRMAN. I will be glad to have you do so.
Senator MOSES. So far as Mr. Hitchcock was concerned, at the time named Mr. Hitchcock was not identified with the Wood campaign in any sense.
The CHAIRMAN. In December, 1919?
Senator MOSES. Nor had Mr. Pickett communicated with me, nor had I ever seen him.

He is repudiating the authority of his agents, but just wait, we will read the letter:

The CHAIRMAN. At that time?
Senator MOSES. At that time. I never saw Mr. Pickett or knew anything about him until some time after the 8th of January.
The CHAIRMAN. About a month later?
Senator MOSES. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Further, he says:

Reading from Col. Henry Lincoln Johnson's letter again:

At that meeting, though the Republican State central committee had been called for the purpose of conference by Mr. Pickett, the only, sole, and exclusive business Mr. Pickett did was to call every man who had traveled from afar and ask him to state how much his expenses had been in coming to Atlanta and offered money to all, and a few did accept.

Yes; we know how many did accept—just as many as were present.

A few did accept. For instance, Mr. Harris, of Athens, Ga., accepted $50, although the railroad fare for the round trip is $7.40. This is not a sole case; this is a type of the cases.

That is what Henry says. Honestly and seriously, now, if a man wants to launch that sort of campaign among our "niggers" I do not blame him for voting to seat Senator Newberry, but I do blame him for wanting to extend the franchise to any more of them. They are too expensive. The rest of us could not engage in that sort of a campaign. When one "nigger" costs $5,000 we could not go far where we have such a large colored population.

The chairman then inquired:

Do you know anything about that?
Senator MOSES. No. But, Mr. Chairman, I will recall to your attention the fact that Mr. King testified that he had given some money to Mr. Pickett, and at the date of which Mr. Johnson there speaks, Mr. King was the active field marshal of the Wood forces.

So evidently Pickett got more than $5,000. He skinned King out, and then came along looking for another victim and saw the Senator from New Hampshire and got $5,000 more, and incidentally the delegation, after they got to Chicago, did not vote for Wood at all, I believe.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon, but does he mean to charge the colored race with a degree of disloyalty that amounts to saying that they had previously promised to vote for somebody by proxy through Moses, the Hebrew prophet, and had not done it?

Mr. CARAWAY. That seems to be the evidence—that they cleaned out King and then cleaned out Moses. It is a fine thing that David did not come along, because they would have got him also.

The CHAIRMAN. I had forgotten that. Do you remember what Mr. King sent down there?
Senator MOSES. No; I do not.
The CHAIRMAN. Then Mr. Johnson follows along:
"Clark Grier then comes upon the scene, traveling all over the State, and on every side he was trying to seduce friends of my side with the offer of money in the most profligate abundance."

Oh, that is a crying out of the righteous against the methods of Senator Moses, trying to seduce "my friends by the profligate use of money." I sincerely hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not tamper with our southern "niggers" again, because he did not get anything out of it at last but disappointment. He sent out money to "niggers" and somebody promised to deliver them, but here comes another "nigger" along with money from somebody else and bought his friends away from him. Oh, the outrageous perfidy of that!

The chairman then inquired:

Do you know anything about that?
Senator MOSES. No. I have already testified that I do not know Mr. Grier at all.
The CHAIRMAN. Then he goes on:
"All sides went to the meeting of the Republican national committee in Washington, December 10, 1919."
Senator MOSES. Yes. I saw Henry Lincoln Johnson here at that time.

And incidentally I suppose Henry Lincoln saw him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did either one of them get anything out of it?

Mr. CARAWAY. Both of them got glory—no; Senator MOSES got glory and the "nigger" got the money.

The CHAIRMAN. You had not at that time sent anything to Mr. Pickett, however?

Senator MOSES. No; that was prior to the opening of the Washington headquarters; the Washington headquarters were not opened until after Mr. King had withdrawn from the management of the Wood campaign, and it became necessary to make a different organization.

In other words, King had got cleaned out of all he had, and they kicked him out and got a new leader, a new Moses, who was raised up in the wilderness.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From New Hampshire?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and he took charge.

The CHAIRMAN. He further says—

Reading again from Henry Lincoln Johnson's letter—

The first public move in Georgia in 1920 was the calling of the State central committee February 28, 1920. Just prior to this meeting Gen. E. F. Glenn had come into Atlanta and actively taken part in the manipulation of Georgia matters.

I judge that Gen. E. F. Glenn is another gentleman of color, because you know they have more titles than anybody in the world.

Do you know anything about Gen. Glenn's activities through the South?

Senator MOSES. I do not know Gen. Glenn at all, except that I once saw him at the Wood headquarters in Chicago. I have had some letters from Gen. Glenn, and I do know that he went through the South, but that was under the direction of the Chicago headquarters; he did not report to me, and I do not know what his errand was.

The rest of us know. Henry Lincoln Johnson knew what it was, because he was on the ground.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is he now?

Senator MOSES. I think he is at his home in Ohio.

Senator POMERENE. He was commandant at the Chillicothe cantonment—Camp Sherman—and had charge of that camp ever since it was organized.

Senator SPENCER. Is he still in the service?

Senator POMERENE. No; I think he is on the retired list.

He is like King; he has quit.

The CHAIRMAN. He goes on.

The chairman then read further from Johnson's letter:

"Mr. Bean, of Florida, had made several antecedent visits there; Mr. Fox, from Oklahoma, had been in Atlanta."

Who is Mr. Fox, of Oklahoma?

Senator MOSES. Mr. Fox is a newspaper editor who came to Washington along in the early winter and sought me out—

Everybody that came hunted him up—and found him—and said he was going to Florida for a vacation; that he was interested in the Wood campaign, and that he would look the ground over and send me some information. After he left here he sent me some newspaper clippings containing interviews which he had given out in some of the cities which he had visited; but that is all the connection I have ever had with him or that I know about him. I have never seen him since.

The CHAIRMAN. There are other statements in this letter with regard to the use of money which I do not think we ought to use without verifying them by witnesses. There are witnesses here; I will take that up later. He says:

Reading again:

"For instance, I was personally present at Dublin, Ga., when the eleventh district held its convention and elected S. S. Incey, a friend of mine. The fight in that convention was for the delegate to go uninstructed."

Do you know anything about that convention?

Senator MOSES. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. He said:

"I made a fight for nobody."

Again reading from Johnson's letter:

Mr. Clark Grier spent money with a recklessness that you could scarcely believe. For instance, he gave $500 to the delegates from Emanuel County to vote for instructions.

That was a good year for the "niggers." I do not blame the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] for having a grievance against the South, but he ought not to take it out on us in trying to take our representation away; he ought to go down there and have it out with the "niggers" who got his money.

Do you know anything about that situation?

Senator MOSES. Not the slightest.

The CHAIRMAN. He says:

"He openly carried a wad of money in his pocket, called men in the hall, told them he wanted to pay their expenses and give them something, and did it."

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Arkansas will pardon me again, who was it who always carried a wad of money in his pocket?

Mr. CARAWAY. Clark Grier, Gen. Wood's representative, who wanted to get delegates for Wood.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He is the present Governor of the Philippine Islands, is he not?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; Gen. Wood is the Governor of the Philippine Islands. He is the man who tried to buy the Presidency, but did not get it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am just trying to identify these men as the Senator from Arkansas refers to them.

Mr. CARAWAY. He has been rewarded for losing his money. I repeat:

He openly carried a wad of money in his pocket, called men in the hall, told them he wanted to pay their expenses, and give them something, and did it.

Do you know anything about that?

Senator MOSES. I never saw Mr. Grier in my life.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does Mr. Grier live? What is his post-office address?

Senator MOSES. I think he lives in Atlanta, but that I do not know. My impression is that I never had any communication with Mr. Grier. I may have had a letter from him; I do not think so. He was not a man that I had any contact with in connection with the campaign.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, can the Senator from Arkansas account for the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] never heard of this man, but still knew his post-office address?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is as much information as anybody had in the Newberry case. Continuing the reading:

The CHAIRMAN. In any event, the money that you sent into Georgia, you do not mean to say covered all the money sent into Georgia in the Wood campaign?

Senator MOSES. I could not express any opinion on that, because I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you go down there yourself?

Senator MOSES. Never.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all I want to ask.

I have here the entire letter of Henry Lincoln Johnson. It is too long to read, but it is exceedingly interesting, and ought to be used as a textbook by the Republicans who are trying to buy southern Negroes, because it will give them some valuable information. With that idea in view I ask unanimous consent to print it in the RECORD in connection with my remarks. I think it will save a good deal of money to those who are interested in securing Republican delegates from Southern States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., May 28, 1920.

Hon. W. S. KENYON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY KIND SENATOR: It is a matter of extreme regret on my part that professional engagements as an attorney compel me to ask relief from appearance this week before the committee of the Senate investigating expenditures of candidates for the presidential nomination.

The campaign in Georgia for delegates to the national convention has been on practically for one year. Another feature entering into the campaign making it intensive was my own personal candidacy for election by the State convention as the Georgia member of the Republican national committee.

My group of friends and myself early determined upon the program in Georgia of having delegates elected to the national convention without any instructions—leaving them free agents at Chicago to do best for the party as they might see it.

Coincident with conference held by Republicans who believed, as I did, there came into the State agents such as Mr. Bean, of Florida, in conjunction with Capt. Henry Blun, of Savannah, and grouped themselves around men in Georgia whom they said would make the fight for the control of Georgia's delegates by Mr. Frank H. Hitchcock.

To summarize: My side, coupled with men like J. H. Watson, of Albany; Walter S. Scott, of Savannah; E. L. Wheaton, of Macon; Col. C. P. Goree, Mr. M. H. Karnes, and Mr. J. W. Martin, of Atlanta, stood open in Georgia for uninstructed delegates, as above stated.

The other group, led generally by Roscoe Pickett, Clark Grier, D. C. Cole, and others, began honey-combing the State with agents in an endeavor to take charge of the Republican organization in this State and make a complete delivery of it to Mr. Frank H. Hitchcock. This set the stage and the fight was on.

The Hitchcock group began in open meetings on the 4th day of December, 1919, when Roscoe Pickett and Clark Grier called a meeting in Atlanta. At that meeting, though the Republican State central committee had been called for the purpose of conference by Mr. Pickett, the only, sole, and exclusive business Mr. Pickett did was to call every man who had traveled from afar and asked him to state how much his expenses had been in coming to Atlanta and offered money to all, and a few did accept. For instance, Mr. Harris, of Athens, Ga., accepted $50, although the railroad fare for the round trip is but $7.40 and Mr. Harris was here for but a half day. This is not a sole case; this is a type of the cases.

Clark Grier then comes upon the scene, traveling all over the State and on every side he was trying to seduce friends of my side with the offer of money in the most profligate abundance. All sides went to the meeting of the Republican national committee in Washington December 10, 1919. Shortly afterwards Mr. Pickett returned to the State and on his return to Georgia he announced to various groups of men that he was going to make an open fight in the State for delegates instructed for Gen. Wood and proceeded with the campaign. About this time Mr. Pickett was not outspoken for delivery to Gen. Hitchcock.

The first public move in Georgia in 1920 was the calling of the State central committee February 28, 1920. Just prior to this meeting Gen. E. F. Glenn had come into Atlanta and actively taken part in the manipulation of Georgia matters. Mr. Karnes will hand you a copy of a letter showing the beginnings of Gen. Glenn's activities in this behalf. At the State central committee meeting there came Mr. Sidney Beeber from Washington, D. C.; Mr. Bean, of Florida, had made several antecedent visits here; Mr. Fox, from Oklahoma, had been in Atlanta; Clark Grier and D. C. Cole came on with shameless proffers of money only to people, and then Mr. Pickett declared that he, too, was for Mr. Frank H. Hitchcock's domination of Georgia matters, and the fight came to a clear-cut issue of Grier, Bean, Beeber, Blun, Gen. Glenn, all fighting to take charge of the Republican organization in Georgia for absolute delivery to the will of Gen. Hitchcock, and our group was fighting from being thus delivered to Mr. Hitchcock.

Without money we were lost. We needed it for the employment of men and automobiles to go into the 156 counties of the State, covering a territory over 300 miles long and 250 miles broad; printers' bills in publishing county calls, the hiring of public halls for public meetings, the employment of speakers. Clerk hire, stenographers, the maintenance of headquarters and advertising and circulating involved an elaborate outlay far greater than we had desired but to which we were absolutely driven in self-defense by the profligate expenditure of money by Clark Grier, who openly stated to me if he spent $100,000 he was going to get the delegates for Gen. Hitchcock.

The $9,000 received from Mr. Emmerson was used for the expenditures related in the paragraph above; but in all frankness, my dear Senator, I beg to assure you that was not all the money I used. I spent upward of $4,500 of my own personal property in addition, and other sums from friends throughout the State, like Mr. Joseph H. Watson, of Albany, who spent upward of $2,000 for the keeping of the control of the Georgia Republican organization in the hands of the Georgia Republicans. The aid I received from outside the State did not contain a stipulation other than a fight for uninstructed delegates to the national convention. In our group there are friends of Senator Harding, Senator JOHNSON; there are many friends of Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler; some friends for Gen. Wood, but most friends for Gov. Lowden, not by instruction but, if you will pardon the seeming egotism, because those friends know I am for Gov. Lowden.

It would weary the patience of your committee too much for me to go into the whole matter, but let me give some typical matters. For instance, I was personally present at Dublin, Ga., when the eleventh district held its convention and elected S. S. Mincey, a friend of mine. The fight in that convention was for the delegate to go uninstructed. I made a fight for nobody. Mr. Clark Grier spent money with a recklessness that you could scarce believe. For instance, he gave $500 to the delegates from Emanuel County to vote for instructions. He gave, so the man stated in his presence and with his approval, to McCray $200 just to make the motion to instruct. He openly carried a wad of money in his pocket, called men in the hall, told them he wanted to pay their expenses and give them something, and did it.

Now, the convention goes on when it had been bought by Mr. Grier. The motion was made to instruct by Mr. Grier's bought man, McCray. They gave me a chance to make an appeal for uninstructed delegate. McCray made the motion; it was seconded. Prof. H. A. Hunt, of Fort Valley, moved to lay the motion to instruct on the table; the motion was seconded, and by a vote of 31 out of 34 in all in the convention the motion to instruct was laid on the table. Thereupon, Mr. Grier ran around frantically to men in the convention and publicly exclaimed that I gave you money and you have got to give it back to me because you did not keep your promise—a public scandal and a public disgrace. My expenses on that trip on the line above outlined were $150; Mr. Grier, by his statement, spent $1,700. He failed to get an instructed delegate. I succeeded in having an uninstructed one. Now, Mr. Senator, this is but a type.

At the State convention on April 7, 1920, we had a convention of about 356 delegates. Three hundred and ten of these men, delegates by the admission of Mr. Pickett, in credentials received by him, stood in the open hall of that convention and made affidavit that they voted for Col. Goree and those that were with me, and it was the convention. The galleries were filled, and members of the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals of the State of Georgia were witnesses. The president of the Georgia State Senate was a spectator from the galleries. Now, when the convention adjourned, my office place, at the Odd Fellows' Building, was honeycombed with agents of Clark Grier and that crowd, and in my hearing and the hearing of others told men to come and get a hundred dollars, and in that way got perjured affidavits that they will carry to Chicago. Mr. Grier, Mr. Cole, and all that crowd openly boasted that they did not need to win in the convention; that all they had to do was to hatch up a contest; that Mr. Hitchcock had in his control two-thirds of the members of the Republican national committee, and all they needed to do was to take a scratch pad and pencil and bring contests to Chicago and everything would be well.

Mr. M. H. Karnes, a citizen of Atlanta, Ga., personally accompanied me on all my goings throughout the State in this campaign. He knows very near in the last detail of everything I know, and he will be pleased, without reservation whatsoever, to make unto your committee, sir, a statement of the real truth.

Thanking you for your kind indulgence, which relieves me from sacrificing clients and appearing this week, believe me to be,

Most sincerely, yours, HENRY LINCOLN JOHNSON.

Mr. CARAWAY. This testimony continues:

Senator REED. Did you have appeals or requests for money, Senator?
Senator MOSES. From Georgia?
Senator REED. From Georgia.
Senator MOSES. Without number.

He had requests until practically he could not remember how many there were.

Senator REED. What did you do with them? Did you reply that you would not send it, or did you refer them to Chicago or to the eastern headquarters?

Senator MOSES. I generally answered that Mr. Pickett and Mr. Ackermann and Mr. Tilson were looking after Gen. Wood's interests in Georgia, and that I hoped that all Georgia Republicans who were interested in Gen. Wood's cause would get in touch with those gentlemen and cooperate with them.

Senator POMERENE. You did that very diplomatically.

Senator MOSES. I tried to be diplomatic.

Senator REED. And did you forward the requests for money on, or did you just file them away in your office?

Senator MOSES. I filed them.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any communication with Mr. Stebbins about business or money down there?

Senator MOSES. Never.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Stebbins was the eastern treasurer?

Senator MOSES. Yes; but I never had any transactions with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell us where Mr. Stebbins is?

Senator MOSES. I have not the slightest idea.

The CHAIRMAN. He is the eastern treasurer?

Senator MOSES. He was so represented to me at the only time I ever saw him, which was at the time I was introduced to him at the New York headquarters.

There is much more of that as interesting, but I am going to omit it. I merely desire to read a little bit more and then I shall be through. I wish to read this further:

Senator MOSES. In Alabama I found an inheritance from Mr. King's management, and as a result of that I gave Mr. Joseph O. Thompson, of Birmingham, $3,000, a part of which—I think about $1,000—was to repay him for money of his own which he represented to me that he had expended; the balance of that money which I gave to him was to be used in the organization of a Leonard Wood League throughout the State of Alabama, or in those districts where it seemed most likely that we could elect a Wood delegate.

That is, where you could get the most for a thousand dollars. Look the field over and select the territory where a thousand dollars will get the best results.

Later, after Mr. Hitchcock came into the campaign, he asked me if I would send $1,000 to Col. Dallas B. Smith, of Opelika, Ala., and I did so. Mr. Hitchcock later asked me if I could send $1,500 more to Col. Smith, but unhappily——

Senator POMERENE (interposing). That is Dallas Smith again?

Senator MOSES. Yes; but unhappily, I was not in funds to do it; and those are the only instances in which Mr. Hitchcock had any exchange at all with reference to funds in the Southern States.

To Florida I sent no money whatever.

To Mississippi and Louisiana I sent no money whatever.

I sent $1,000 to Dr. S. H. Thompson, of Tennessee.

Senator POMERENE. How much?

Senator MOSES. $1,000.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the total amounts that you sent into Alabama?

Senator MOSES. $4,000. And to the best of my recollection that covered all the money that I sent into any of these States.

Senator REED. Did you cover South Carolina?

Senator MOSES. Yes.

Senator REED. I did not get that; how much did you spend?

Senator MOSES. Well, I sent into South Carolina less than $1,000. My present impression is that it was between $600 and $700. I sent, as I recall, two sums to this Mr. Andrews, who was elected as a delegate.

He got one delegate for $1,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Were all the people you sent money to afterwards elected as delegates?

Senator MOSES. Oh, no.

He said that with a sigh—oh, no.

Senator POMERENE. Let me clear up this matter: As I have your testimony before me, you said you sent to two districts $600.

Senator MOSES. In South Carolina?

Senator POMERENE. Yes.

Senator MOSES. Did I say two districts?

Senator POMERENE. That is as I have the memorandum, and that is as I have the recollection about it.

Senator MOSES. No; I think I testified before, as I have just repeated, that I sent two sums—that is, on two occasions—and I think I mentioned Mr. Andrews as the man to whom I sent it.

Senator POMERENE. Yes.

Senator MOSES. And I sent money to Mr. Andrews on two occasions.

Senator POMERENE. I had in mind $600, and now you say you sent less than $1,000.

Senator MOSES. Yes; $600 or $700.

Senator POMERENE. You intended that $1,000 to include the $600?

Senator MOSES. Yes; those were all the transactions that I had in South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. Any other States?

Senator MOSES. No; that covers all the States with which I had to do.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Bean was traveling through all of these States, was he?

Senator MOSES. Well, to my knowledge, Mr. Bean traveled only in South Carolina and Georgia. And my impression is that he went into the eighth district of Virginia, after the convention was held there, and when the contest arose.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was the man from Washington who traveled through there?

Senator MOSES. Mr. Bieber.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Bieber—who was he?

Senator MOSES. I think Mr. Bieber was once the national committeeman from the District of Columbia; I think he is in the real estate business here.

I guess he owns his own home now.

The CHAIRMAN. He was in the employ of Gen. Wood's campaign, was he?

Senator MOSES. Not under my charge. I gave him no money whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. But you know he was, do you not? He was traveling through the South with Mr. Bean?

Senator MOSES. No; I think Mr. Bieber was a friend of Mr. Hitchcock's; whatever he did was done in connection with Mr. Hitchcock.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether Mr. Hitchcock himself went into the Southern States?

Senator MOSES. I think not.

Now, just one more extract and then I shall conclude.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just one word before the Senator from Arkansas goes any further.

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the Senator MOSES to whom the Senator has been constantly referring in the reading the present Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes, sir. He is the Senator who recently made a speech and indorsed the methods of Senator Newberry in Michigan.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask, Can the Senator from Arkansas explain to me how it happens that a Senator from New Hampshire should be in charge of two or three Southern States?

Mr. CARAWAY. There is no question about that. He had $39,500; he had the qualifications.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What were his qualifications?

Mr. CARAWAY. He had $39,500 worth of qualifications.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from Arkansas know of any other qualifications that he had?

Mr. CARAWAY. The result was that he got no votes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was the only qualification he had, and when the niggers got that away from him he had no qualification. Did the Senator ever hear how he knew anything about the South or southern relations or its relationship to the Federal Government?

Mr. CARAWAY. In his jeremiad at the conclusion of his campaign he admits that he does not exactly understand the southern Negro.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes. After long experience——

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; after $39,500 worth of experience.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Can the Senator explain to me how it happened that the Republican national committee appointed him to take care of Georgia and a few other Southern States?

Mr. CARAWAY. I expect they have asked themselves that question a thousand times since.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand that the Senator's only explanation of that situation is the expenditure of $39,000?

Mr. CARAWAY. The amount was $39,500; it is better always to be exact.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am very fond of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CARAWAY. So am I.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I should dislike to believe that the only tie binding him to any locality, even Georgia, was $39,000. Can not the Senator account for it in some other way, just to please me?

Mr. CARAWAY. If I could, I would; but I am certain that is the only tie that binds in this instance.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], of course, lives in New Hampshire. I want to show in what school he qualified for this particular leadership.

Senator REED asked this question:

I only wanted to ask this: Senator MOSES, you have made a statement of the moneys sent by your committee into these various States. Do you know of other moneys that have been sent in that were not sent in by you personally or through your own committee?

Senator MOSES. Into these States that I have mentioned?

Senator REED. Yes; into any of these States.

Senator MOSES. Any State in the Union, do you mean?

Senator REED. Yes; but I will first say, in these particular States you have mentioned?

Senator MOSES. No; I know of no sums of money; I know in general that some money was sent from the New York headquarters to the State of Maryland; I do not know to whom, or in what sum.

Here is what I want to call particular attention to, for it shows the school in which he graduated—

The only other State that I know about is the State of New Hampshire, where, upon the appearance of the Hoover campaign in the primary there, some advertising was done, and the Wood men in New Hampshire appealed to me; but the State was not in my jurisdiction, and I appealed to the New York headquarters, and I think that $2,000 was spent in New Hampshire.

But that State was not under his jurisdiction.

If I may read a few more extracts, I shall conclude. Reference was made to contests, and in that connection I quote the following:

Senator REED. And if you could have a contesting delegation from that State—

That was from Virginia—

And if you could have a contesting delegation from that State, it might be advantageous to seat that delegation at some time, if it was necessary? That was the plan, was it not? Let me put it in plain language——

Senator MOSES (interposing). I understand you.

Senator REED. That was the plan, was it?

Senator MOSES. Yes; of course. But I declined to lend myself to any such movement of that character.

Senator REED. I understand you did as I would expect you to do. But this gentleman who made the suggestion did go on and there were some contests?

Senator MOSES. Oh, yes.

Senator REED. Do you know whether he was financed by anybody?

Senator MOSES. I do not know.

Senator REED. He was a white man?

Senator MOSES. Yes. But I think his purpose was to institute the contest on the basis of the colored Republican vote there.

Senator REED. Yes. That is to say, he wanted to get some colored delegates sent up to Chicago?

Senator MOSES. Yes.

Senator REED. And they might be very pliable, under certain conditions?

I want Senators to notice this: The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] suggests that "they might be very pliable under certain conditions," and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] replies:

Senator MOSES. I would think that a fair inference.

Senator REED. Yes. I suppose he told you that it had been done, and that you would be neglecting a valuable opportunity if you did not embrace this scheme?

Senator MOSES. He did not have to tell me that, Senator REED; I have been through two other national campaigns.

Senator REED. You knew that was done?

The CHAIRMAN. Is that why you were selected for southern manager?

Senator MOSES. No; I think I was selected for southern manager because of my prudence and thrift—because I feel like a "piker" here, in speaking of these small sums that I expended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because of what?

Mr. CARAWAY. Beeause of his thrift; because he could get more Negroes for a dollar than anybody else that he knew.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because of his thrift?

Mr. CARAWAY. His thrift; his economy. He could buy more niggers for a dollar than any other white man.

Mr. WILLIAMS. T-h-r-i-f-t?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, then, my friend from New Hampshire was put in charge of the nigger-acquisition movement because of his thrift?

Mr. CARAWAY. Because he could buy more niggers with the money than anybody else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I never understood it before.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it. He said:

Because I feel like a "piker" here, in speaking of these small sums that I expended.

Senator POMERENE. Senator REED did not mean to suggest by that question that there would be anybody in the Republican convention who would make use of the pliable character of these delegates.

Senator MOSES. I hope not.

Senator POMERENE. Oh, no.

Senator REED. Did you have any reports made to you as to the amounts of money that were being used on the other side in the Southern States?

Senator MOSES. Well, I had general statements made to me about the amount of money being used in Virginia and the amount being used in Georgia.

Senator REED. What was the amount that you were informed by your assistants and agents was being used there?

Here is where he shows a real knowledge of human nature.

Senator MOSES. No sum was mentioned, but it was reported to me with frequency from those two States that other candidates were apparently well supplied with money for the purpose of carrying on their campaigns in those States.

Senator REED. What other candidates were there?

Senator MOSES. In each State, Gov. Lowden.

Senator REED. Did you understand from the reports made to you that a pretty difficult situation had been created for Gen. Wood by these expenditures that you have related?

Here is where MOSES shows that he justifies his name:

Senator MOSES. Why, Senator REED, that is the natural course of events; a field agent, or a worker, always tries to set up a bad situation, to show his own value in straightening it out, or for the purpose of securing sums of money for use.

You know, they always learn if they fool with them long enough.

Senator REED. But you did find that there was an active opposition in these States, did you not?

Senator MOSES. I did, indeed.

Senator REED. And a good deal of it was being done through the colored brethren?

Senator MOSES. In Georgia, yes; outside of Georgia, I think not.

Senator REED. Well, in Virginia, the contesting delegations were largely colored, you said; were they for Gen. Wood, or were they for Gov. Lowden, or were they just for themselves?

Senator MOSES. Well, I do not know. I have a letter received this morning from two of the contesting delegates in Virginia, who represent to me that they are for Gen. Wood, and that the expenses of the trip to Chicago would be $300, and would I please send it to them.

Senator REED. They were colored gentlemen?

Senator MOSES. I assume so.

Senator REED. Have you had other requests from other individuals who were elected delegates, or contesting delegates, or from any other persons for money to transport gentlemen to Chicago and pay their expenses?

Senator MOSES. No.

Senator REED. Have you heard of any necessity of raising money, or using money for that purpose?

Senator MOSES. I do not think so. You see, I am a little confused about that—— because I am thinking about those two other campaigns with which I was connected. But I know of nothing that has come specifically to me in connection with the Wood campaign.

You know, he got dizzy—

Senator REED. I will put it this way: Do you not understand from the information that has come to you in this campaign that there is a sort of understanding that it is necessary to have some moneys to bear the expenses of patriots from the South who may want to attend this convention?

Senator MOSES. Oh, I think that has been the case in every campaign. I do not know specifically about that——

Well, if he ever attended one, he knows.

Senator REED (interposing). Do they generally pay the railroad fare and entertainment and hotel bills of this class of delegates that we have been discussing?

Senator MOSES. Oh, I think that has been very generally done in the past.

Senator REED. And does the gentleman who furnishes the entertainment and pays the expenses generally get the votes—if he is the last man to see the delegates?

Senator MOSES. I think the ultimate destination of the vote is always problematical.

Senator REED. Well, I can see how it would take something of a campaign fund to run a southern campaign under those circumstances.

Senator MOSES. It takes a great deal of money to carry on a campaign under present circumstances anywhere, Senator Reed, whether in the South or anywhere else.

Senator REED. Well, it is not generally true in the Republican Party that you pay the expenses of delegates from other parts of the country—from that part of the Nation lying north of Mason and Dixon's line, is it?

Senator MOSES. Well, my impression is that, in the campaign of 1908, with which I had something to do, the expenses of some of the delegates outside of the South were paid at Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not believe that poor men should be shut out of being delegates, do you?

Senator MOSES. Oh, I understand the primary is the thing for the poor man; it gives everybody a chance.

Senator REED. Well, coming back to the South, generally speaking, the southern gentleman, the gentleman from the South, does not expect to have his expenses paid, or his entertainment, does he?

Senator MOSES. Oh, no. As a matter of fact, there is a delegation from one of the Southern States which I think has more millionaires on it than were testified to this morning as being connected with Senator Johnson's finance committee.

Senator REED. You do not regard that as any reflection at all on your candidate, that there happened to be some men of means on his committee, do you?

Senator MOSES. Not the slightest. On the contrary, I am glad they are with him, and feel kindly enough disposed to him to contribute.

I merely wanted to read that, not as a reflection upon the Senator from New Hampshire, for whom I have a very high regard, but as an explanation of why it is that he is so impatient with anybody who wants to vote against Senator Newberry. You know, I have forgotten who it was—it may have been Shakespeare, it may have been somebody else—who said that "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery"; and I have said that you could put these pages that I have read into the Newberry hearings, and there is not a man on the other side of the Chamber who could tell where Newberry's witnesses stopped and where Senator MOSES commenced. The methods are exactly the same, and the only difference is that the results were different. In Michigan they used their money where money got results, and the results stayed. In Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina, and North Carolina, and other places they put their money on a class of citizens who have thought for 50 years that the North owed them a living, and they collect off of them every time there is an opportunity.

The $39,500, I presume, was only a bagatelle of what was spent. All of us who have dealt with that class of citizens know that they are willing to take money from all sides, and are fertile in excuses when they fail to perform what they agree to do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Arkansas mean to imply that the average "nigger" in the South will sell, but will not stay bought?

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that he and I know that when it comes to being skinned with your eyes open there is not any class of sharpers in the world that are equal to the cornfield nigger.

I want to take some of the conceit out of the Senator from New Hampshire. I hate to do it, because it is very largely his stock in trade, but if he thinks he can get his money's worth by buying southern Negroes, he went to school to very little purpose. He lost his $39,500, and he lost his faith in humanity, and any of us could have told him what the result would have been if he had just asked us. We have grown up with them; we know.

This is the only thing I want to say seriously about that: The Senator from New Hampshire threatens us—and I want you to read it if you think that statement is not true—that unless we condone, unless we indorse, unless we ratify that shameless bargain and sale of a senatorial seat in Michigan, they will retaliate in the North by cutting down our representation in the South. He insists, in other words, that we shall submit to the domination of that people with whom he had his transactions and against whom he uttered his bitter complaint that "after you have bought them they will not stay bought." God bless his soul, we are not going to do it, and he is not going to cut down the representation of the South. He might as well learn that now as to learn that he can not buy Negroes and keep them. These are two facts that are settled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the way, even if we sold out in order to seat Newberry, would we not have to sell out in every succeeding Congress to seat some other disreputable and corrupt scoundrel who had bought a seat somewhere in the North?

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will withdraw his epithets, because the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], while not present, will be pained when he reads them, and he will class the Senator from Mississippi among the enemies of the Senator from Michigan. I have already fallen under his displeasure because he says I am bitter against the Senator from Michigan.

I am going to discuss the Michigan case next week. I want to say that I have heard it said upon this floor that there was not any evidence that money was used to corrupt the general election, but that it was all used in the primary. I want to say that unless Michigan people are liars and perjured their souls that statement is not true. I will point out to the sworn testimony of a witness who said he was a supervisor of elections on the 5th day of November, 1918, and that his duty was to make out the votes of Indians who did not know how to make out their own votes. There were a hundred of them that voted there, and he testified that every one of them came up with a Newberry card in his pocket and said, "I want to vote for this man," and that he made out their tickets, and then a Newberry supporter gave him $10 for his job. He had been promised before he did it that they would pay him for it. The corruption runs not through the primary alone.

I heard the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] say that there was absolutely nothing in the record that touched the purity of the election in Michigan. I say that he does not know what the record shows, because the witnesses swore that they were offered money. They were supervisors of elections, and accepted money, and made out tickets, and Truman H. Newberry is a Senator from Michigan now. I say that the record is full of evidence of that kind. It would make any man who loves decency and honesty, who loves to think that the people of this country are their own masters, sick at heart to read down through the 2,000 pages of testimony in the Newberry case, every page of which starts out by saying, "'I met Paul King," or "I met Charlie Floyd," or "I met Emery, and I got $150," and "They sent me $200," and "They sent me $300," and "I got $1,500," or whatever the case may be, "and I spent $50, $75, or $80 in sending out literature, and I kept the rest of it for myself." Why, one man swore that he paid 15 men $5 apiece on election day, not knowing whether they were for Newberry or not; but he said, "I hoped very much that I would get their votes"; and I presume he did.

I want to discuss the record. I am going to do it without abusing Senator Newberry. I am going to call attention to the biggest lot of prize idiots that ever lived, because men there controlling millions and millions of dollars testify about their use of money in such a way that is absolutely astounding. They do not know to whom they paid it, nor why they paid it. Men who did not have anything to do with the campaign, who lived in New York City, sent $10,000 and $15,000 in checks, when they did not know to whom to send it, and did not know whether it was needed or not, but just had the feeling impressed upon them that there was a market for money in Michigan, and they sent it. If the Senate wants to set that sort of a precedent for seats in this body, why, you will have a chance to go on record. But if you seat Newberry you will empty your own seat.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before this phase of the matter is disposed of, I want to recall to the Senate the fact that one of the first acts of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] after his arrival here was the presentation of what is popularly known as a force bill, in connection with which he stated, either on the floor of the Senate or through the press, that it was not his purpose to press the bill for consideration by the Senate unless a disposition were evinced to press for consideration the contest of the seat of Senator Newberry.

One of the most eloquent extemporaneous speeches, in fact, I think, the most eloquent extemporaneous speech, delivered in this body since I became a Member, was a short speech delivered by the lamented Senator Hughes, of the State of New Jersey, on the 12th day of January, 1917, shortly before his death. I desire to read that speech in this connection. It is as follows:

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I can not sympathize very much with what my colleague has had to say in this debate. I do not know of any taxes that have borne more heavily upon the people of our State than upon the people of Georgia. I do not think my colleague knows of any, either. I do not think either of us would vote for the passage of a measure which had for its object and final effect the singling out of one community or one section of the country and compelling it to bear a greater burden than its due share of the taxes of the whole Nation.

I do not like the plane upon which this whole colloquy this morning has been conducted. I thought the Republican Party years ago came to the conclusion that there was not another election to be won by waving the bloody shirt. I thought that the issue of sectionalism had been forever buried. I believe that was the case up to the time the Republican candidate in the last campaign was convinced by somebody that the fires of sectionalism and hatred could once more be fanned into flame and capitalized into Republican votes. I do not think there was anything that did more to bring down upon his head the merited indignation of the American people than the very attitude he took in that matter.

The time has gone by when men from the South can be held up as bogy men, as having horns and hoofs. They go abroad as you and I do; they go into different parts of the country. The most effective speeches I have ever heard made, speeches that were received with more rapturous applause than any other speeches I have ever listened to, were made by these very men laying down the fundamental principles of Democracy to men in communities where there was no material gain to be derived because of their love of those principles.

We have kept the fires on the altars of Democracy lighted in the North and in the East and in the West in this country by means of the patriotic fervor and flame that has been furnished to us by these men from the South. Any student familiar with the early history of this country knows that. If he permits himself to think at all he knows that that section of the country has been oppressed by laws enacted by men from the other sections of the country. We know that for years and years they were compelled to purchase everything they purchased in the highest-taxed markets in the world, and the things which they produced and sold they sold in the free-trade markets of the world.

The Georgia farmer to-day sells his cotton in Liverpool at anywhere from 7 to 20 cents a pound, whatever the price may be, and buys his automobile in the 45 per cent taxed market of America. The figures the Senator from Michigan has laid before the Senate contain no account of that fact. In the price of every automobile that is purchased by a farmer from the South there is hidden the tariff rate that was laid years ago and has continued since to oppress the purchasers of every other section of the country.

There is one thing that comes with particularly bad grace from Senators from my section of the country. It is this continual casting in the teeth of men of another section of the country the fact that they are poorer than their critics. It may be true. John D. Rockefeller pays into the United States Treasury more money than I do. He receives a larger income than I do. But owing to that fact, is he to have a battleship placed at his disposal when his yacht floats the high seas? Is he to have a United States deputy marshal protect him? Is he to have rivers upon his private estates deepened at Government expense? Is he to have anything more done for him than is done for me? Are we to check up individuals or communities or States in accordance with the amount of money they pay? Are we to have that cheap and superficial standard? Everybody knows that the people of the State of New Jersey and the State of New York make what they make out of the people of Georgia, the people of the West and the South and the East and the North, and out of their profits they pay this money into the Federal Treasury.

We twit these men with the fact that they are living under a financial and fiscal system which does not permit them to profit to the extent that other and more favored gentlemen profit.

As far as I am concerned, I am an American citizen. I have not a single fiber in my body which entertains or could possibly entertain the slightest prejudice for any section of the country. I love the West, I love the East, the North, and the South. They are all alike. They were welded by a great fire into one Nation, and in spite of anything the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber can say, we are one Nation.

There are to be no more elections won by the bloody shirt. Sectionalism is dead and can never be revived; and the party that attempts it again will be treated as the party that last attempted it was treated. They will bring down upon their heads again the condemnation of the American people, and they should.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on yesterday I read to the Senate excerpts from papers published in Detroit, Mich., in 1904, which told about Senator Newberry's connection with a primary for the lower House of Congress. He was a candidate against the present Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Denby.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] said the papers I read from were Democratic papers. I replied that if they were Democratic papers there must have been some foundation for the stories they published to the effect that Mr. Newberry was running a boodle campaign. Those papers said that a barrel had been opened at both ends in the interest of Truman H. Newberry as a candidate for the Republican nomination in the congressional primary.

They stated that many changes had taken place from the ranks of Denby over to the ranks of Newberry, and that they expected many more changes by the following Monday. Some of them closed by saying, "Coin plenty." There were other headlines somewhat like that.

The Senator from Missouri said they were Democratic papers, and therefore manufactured the stories. I desire now to read, for the benefit of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and the Senate, some excerpts from Republican newspapers of Detroit.

The Detroit Free Press of October 18, 1904, had the following:

If workers count for anything Newberry will have a walkaway in the contest. All over the city yesterday Newberry badges were seen on coat lapels. It is said the plan of the Newberry people comprehended the hiring of two paid workers in every precinct in the city, their wages to be $5 a day. This means $30 for each of the hundred and nine precincts of the district, or over $3,000.

I am very glad to read that in the hearing of the distinguished Senator from Missouri, who has charge of the Newberry case in the Senate and who is chairman of the committee that made some sort of an investigation, but who failed to require Mr. Newberry to come before the committee and testify, or to even request him to testify, or to require his friends to produce the bank books, stubs, and checks used in the slush fund contributed in Michigan.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. As a Senator of the United States, I am very much interested in the answer to the question I am about to propound. Does the Senator from Alabama know whether or not the so-called Senator from Michigan, Mr. Newberry, is going to appear before the Senate in an honest, square way and make a speech to the Senate and tell the Senate why he thinks he ought to be seated? Does the Senator know whether he is going to do that or not?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I do not know, but if I should judge the future by the past I would say that he would not; but it is rumored that he will, and hoping that he will, I am making this speech this afternoon for the purpose of getting some things in the RECORD, so that he may see them, and I want him to pay particular attention to them when he comes here to make his statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am a very humble Member of this august body, and I do not want to waste my time; I have lots of things to do in my office, lots more things to do at home, lots of constituents to attend to, and I would like to ask the Senator from Alabama if he could tell me at what hour I should attend in order to hear the so-called Senator from Michigan, Mr. Newberry, defend his claim to his seat?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am unable to tell my good friend the Senator from Mississippi. I have had no private conversation with the Senator from Michigan, and I do not know that anyone else has except the chairman of the committee, the judge in the case, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER]. I think he admits that he has had some private conversations with him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, then if it be that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] is present, I would like to ask him, for my own satisfaction, to tell me at what hour, approximately, the so-called Senator from Michigan will address the Senate?

Mr. SPENCER. I can not tell the Senator from Mississippi at what hour he will hear the Senator from Michigan, but I am informed that on Monday of next week, as I announced to the Senate an hour or two ago, the junior Senator from Michigan intends to address the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whom does the Senator designate as the junior Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SPENCER. The junior Senator from Michigan is Senator TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY, whose home was in Detroit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought his right to a seat here was contested. I did not know he was yet the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SPENCER. Oh, yes; he was seated, and has for two years been performing his functions as a Senator in this body.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I remember now. I remember that when he first came——

Mr. SPENCER. I knew the Senator would remember when he turned his mind to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I remember that he did take his seat in order to make a Republican majority in this body, and that a great deal of history that has since passed out would not have passed in or out if it had not been for the fact of his fraudulent seating. But there is no quarrel between us. The Senator informs me that upon Monday the so-called Senator from Michigan will undertake to state to the Senate why he thinks he ought to be a sure-enough Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. That was not the information I gave.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that you have the votes, and nobody denies that you will cast them. At what hour on Monday is he to speak, because I am anxious to be present?

Mr. SPENCER. I told the Senator a moment ago, though perhaps he did not catch it, that the hour at which the junior Senator from the State of Michigan expected to address the Senate I did not know, but that my information was that he was to address the Senate on next Monday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At some time?

Mr. SPENCER. At some time on Monday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Between 12 o'clock and the hour of adjournment?

Mr. SPENCER. Between the opening of the Senate and its adjourning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I express the utmost pleasure at that reply, because I understand that is the utmost information the Senator from Missouri could give me.

Mr. SPENCER. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I never expected from any man, not even a Republican Senator, omniscience of any description. I shall make it a point to be present upon Monday next and to watch and to hear what—did the Senator call him the junior Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SPENCER. "The junior Senator from the State of Michigan" was my designation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the so-called junior Senator from Michigan shall say.

It will be peculiarly welcome to me if he can show even one reason out of one hundred why he should be seated. I have been very proud of his family. It is a good old family in Michigan. The Newberrys were honest people, straight and square and fair, made their money in a right way, represented a great many things that are honest and true amongst men. I was still more proud of his wife's family, representing the same things, if not more. I should be sorry indeed if the so-called junior Senator from Michigan could not give some reason why I could conclude that he had not disgraced two respectable families.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was reading for the edification of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], chairman of the subcommittee which investigated the Newberry case, what Republican newspapers had to say of Mr. Newberry in politics as early as 1904.

From the Detroit Free Press I read:

A worker in the first precinct of the seventh ward with a Newberry badge on said, "I personally like Denby, but I can't afford to work for my health. I am getting $30 for working in this precinct for Newberry and Carter, and if I carry the precinct for the combination I will get $20 more."

Mr. President, Denby was a poor man, but an honest and a very able man. He did not have money to go out and hire workers. I do not think he would have hired them if he had had the money.

Here we have a man who gives as his reason for supporting Mr. Newberry in 1904 the money that he was receiving. He was paid so much to work per day and then was promised to be paid more if the Newberry cause succeeded. That is certainly from a Republican newspaper in Detroit, I wish to say again to my friend from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], sponsor for Mr. Newberry.

From the Detroit Free Press of October 22 I read an editorial—this is a Republican paper:

With no other argument to advance for the election of Mr. Denby than was contained in his personal qualifications for the office, he made a canvass that was effective in the face of opposition credited with a bountiful supply of money and the disposition to use it. If money was used liberally in behalf of Mr. Newberry, as is commonly reported, the nomination of Denby is almost conclusive proof, when the choice is made by direct vote, that other arguments are more weighty than those of dollars and cents.

Here is a Republican newspaper saying that against Mr. Newberry immediately following the primary, when they knew that they were going into a contest against the Democrats, where Democrats had been elected, I am informed, to the House; and yet that Republican editor felt called upon, in this fashion, to condemn the methods employed by Newberry as far back as 1904, just 17 years ago.

Does that look like Mr. Newberry was new in politics in 1918? From the Detroit Journal of October 20 I read:

Truman H. Newberry will not be under nearly as great an expense if he loses in the congressional race as if he wins, according to stories about town.

Common rumor, talk everywhere. The air was full of it.

It is stated that many men who volunteered to work for Newberry were promised certain remuneration if they delivered the goods, while on the other hand they get nothing for their pains in case Newberry does not get the votes in their district.

So he had two sets of workers—some to be rewarded when they delivered the goods and others to be paid in part for their work by the day and, if he won, so much in addition to what they had already received.

This is the Truman H. Newberry whose title to a seat in this body is under consideration to-day. Some Senators on the other side of the Chamber would have us believe and have made the argument that he was a business man, that he knew nothing about politics, and that when he got into this senatorial race his friends just went on advertising him and maybe used too much money. The Republican majority of the committee say that he spent too much money, and yet they recommend that he be seated.

Now, in the light of these statements what are the facts? Some of them would have us believe that he was a stranger to politics. He entered politics 17 years ago. What was his idea of politics and his ideal in politics, if you please? Buying a seat in the lower House? He no doubt had in mind then that if he could buy a seat in the lower House and have it said that he had been elected to Congress he could more easily buy a seat in the Senate later on. But failing to beat Denby for the lower House, still determined to occupy a seat in the Congress of the United States, he goes out in 1918 and opens his barrel again, the same Truman H. Newberry, and he uses money lavishly, unlawfully. Why, Mr. President, that little campaign against Denby, where he spent several thousand dollars in the congressional district, was a mere May morning zephyr compared to a cyclone in comparison to the 1918 campaign that Mr. Newberry made.

As I said to Senators on the other side yesterday, I know that your program is to seat Newberry, but I do not know whether you are going to succeed or not. I said several Republican Senators have been looking into the Newberry testimony. They have been making some investigation, especially since the brilliant Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], a Republican, made an argument against Mr. Newberry the other day that can not be answered. Several Republican newspapers in the country are approving his speech and calling on Republican Senators to know where they stand in the Newberry case. They have been making some investigations over on your side.

Some people on the outside have suggested that it would be good politics for the Democrats if you were to seat Newberry. There is no doubt about that, because I believe that there are enough American people belonging to the two parties who will lash out of this Chamber any man who, in the face of the testimony, votes to seat Mr. Newberry. Where are those who voted to seat Senator Lorimer in this body? Gone; they are all gone but six.

Senators, the people will not permit you to tamper with the honor and integrity of this Chamber. If seats in this Chamber can be bought, this has truly become a House of Lords, where only wealth and the power of wealth can secure positions in the upper branch of Congress.

Mr. President, I desire to repeat what I said on yesterday or in a speech before that. If the money interests of America can buy 49 seats in this body, they will not care who is elected to the House, whether they be Democrats or Republicans. They will not care who are the other 47 Senators in this body. If they have 49, they will rest easy, because they know that no measure will find its way through this body unless it has the approval of sinister and predatory interests.

Senators, it seems that we are living in a strange time. There is a crisis on in this country, but a good many statesmen here do not seem to realize it. We are told that the Republican administration has brought influence to bear upon the governor of Pennsylvania to hurry a Senator here to vote for Mr. Newberry. We are told that a prominent leader on the other side of the aisle talked to the governor of Pennsylvania about that thing. We were told that they had assurances that that Senator would be here. There was another statement to the effect that the governor of Pennsylvania said he would not be coerced into appointing somebody without thorough consideration of the matter.

Mr. President, I have called to the attention of the Senate in the last 12 months the reprehensible conduct of the Federal Reserve Board. The President can ask for their resignations on a moment's notice. He asked for the resignation of a district attorney in Texas before his time was out. Why not ask for the resignation of those men who are squandering the people's money in Wall Street?

That is a pretty broad statement, but I wish to submit to the Senate my reasons for saying that. The Federal Reserve Board got an amendment to the Federal reserve act through a Republican Congress, permitting them to set aside a certain percentage of earnings to be used in providing buildings and establishments for use in the service. They accumulated $100,000,000 in a year. What do you suppose they did? Without asking Congress the Federal Reserve Board appropriated $26,000,000 or thereabout—to do what? To build a bank building in the city of New York, in Wall Street. They gave the architect $1,000,000, leaving about twenty-five millions to go into the building.

That is more money than the Capitol cost. It is more money than the House Office Building cost. It is more money than the Senate Office Building cost. It is more money than the State, War, and Navy Building cost. It is more money than all four of them cost. Think of that, Senators! I have the figures right here.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will state to my friend from Alabama that the newspapers of the State which I in part represent were publishing, as a thing to be proud of, the fact that one of the governmental agencies had loaned $3,000,000 to the farmers of that State. Those farmers will have to repay that money with interest on it.

Without referring to the enormous sum of $26,000,000 thrown away on this one building in New York, I will ask the Senator to duly emphasize the fact that here is an architect getting $1,000,000 which he is to keep—not to repay with interest, but to keep—and that is equal to one-third of all the money that all the farmers of one State in the South have obtained, money which they will have to repay with interest.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend from Georgia for that suggestion. Think of that, Senators! One man designing a marble temple for a banking institution in Wall Street is paid $1,000,000; while all the farmers of an agricultural State, farmers who are suffering severely and are selling their produce below the cost of production, are only allowed by the Federal Reserve Board just two millions more than one Wall Street architect receives.

Mr. President, the President of the United States can not erect a building without the consent of Congress; no Cabinet officer can have a building constructed without the consent of Congress. Why is it that these men have ordered that building erected in Wall Street? It is a strange thing to me, Senators.

Mr. KING. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Utah.

Mr. KING. A bill has been introduced to-day to prohibit the Federal Reserve Board or any subordinate of the Reserve Board from constructing any further buildings or repairing them, except in the case of necessary repairs, without the consent of Congress.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am heartily in favor of such a measure. My friend the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has offered an amendment to a bill which is now pending, and which will be disposed of some time around the 17th of this month, which proposes to prevent the Federal Reserve Board from doing that very thing. I understand to-day that the governor of the Federal Reserve Board has given out a statement that that board is going to order the erection of buildings to be stopped. Mr. President, they may order them stopped, but we are going to fix it so that they can not order them started again. A Federal Reserve Board that will order a building to be constructed costing $26,000,000 in Wall Street, when the people of the South and West are in dire distress, deserves to be condemned and kicked out of the service of the Federal Government.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I was informed by one of the newspaper reporters this morning that he was in possession of a circular issued by the Federal Reserve Board and sent to all the banks of the country in which the Federal Reserve Board most insolently state that the money is their money and that they have a right to do with it as they please; but, of course, it is the Government's money.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the time which came in the life of "Old Hickory," President Jackson, is here now. The money power defied the Federal Government in his day, and Thomas H. Benton and others fought them to the death; and I thank God there are a few here in our day who have the courage and disposition to fight. Little by little and bit by bit the money power of Wall Street is fastening its clutches upon the throat of the Nation. It is rumored now that Wall Street has demanded of the administration that Gov. W. P. G. Harding shall be kept as the head of the Federal Reserve Board. Mr. President, they could not get a man in that position who would be more satisfactory to Wall Street. W. P. G. Harding voted the Republican ticket in 1920, as I have said here before. Before Senator Warren G. Harding was elected President he—Gov. Harding—was bowing and smiling like a Democrat, and after Senator Harding was elected President he bowed and smiled like a Republican. He seemed to be willing to shape his creed for his cravings and swallow his convictions for a Federal Reserve Board job. So they immediately after the President was inaugurated announced that Gov. Harding would hold his job. This is mighty plain talk, Senators.

The time has come to call a spade a spade. The sum of $26,000,000 is ordered expended by Gov. Harding and the Federal Reserve Board upon one bank building in Wall Street, while the cattlemen of the West are asking for financial assistance to prevent the sacrifice of their breeding cattle; the grain producers of the West and the cotton farmers of the South are in dire distress, while the Federal Reserve Board, by the sanction of the Republican Party, is building a bankers' temple in Wall Street costing $26,000,000. Wall Street can do enough devilment to us with the buildings it already has. What will she do now with this marble temple, with bronze doors to it costing $25,000 each?

Senators on the other side, why do you not take a hand in denouncing this thing? You are trying to get a Senator from Pennsylvania hurried here, some of you, to vote to help make barter of seats in the Senate. Why not cry out in protest against a Federal Reserve Board that will take, without rhyme or reason, $26,000,000 and put it into one bank building in Wall Street?

Let me give Senators some figures with regard to the cost of construction of Government buildings. This Capitol, serving the needs of 110,000,000 people, cost only $2,433,000. The State, War, and Navy Building cost $10,038,000, improvements and all to date $2,000,000 additional, making but $12,038,000 in all. The Senate Office Building cost $3,732,000; the House Office Building cost $3,340,000. All of these buildings cost less than this board is said to have agreed to pay for the construction of one bank building in New York City. Senators may draw their own inference from what I will now read.

I am going to read to Senators a newspaper statement in reference to the municipal building of Philadelphia, Pa.:

> There was the municipal building that cost the people $25,000,000, and to-day stands as one of the most stupendous monuments to graft that the world has ever known.

Do you believe they are going to spend $26,000,000 on that bank building in Wall Street in New York City? If you do, you are more credulous than I am. If the truth about it could be known, there will be scandal connected with it; graft galore connected with it. What excuse, Senators, is there for erecting a bank building in Wall Street costing ten times more than this great Capitol of the United States?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to remind the Senator that the amount expended for the one building in New York to which he has referred is more than the Government has appropriated for post offices and all other public buildings in the entire United States during a period of several years. I should like to state further that I have requested information of the Federal Reserve Board as to how the contracts have been given and concerning other matters which I think will be of interest to the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend from Georgia for that interruption. The Wall Street banking building being erected in New York will cost more than has been distributed by the Federal Government for public-building purposes in the several States, 48 in number, for years and years. There are seven men on the Federal Reserve Board, and there they sit, with the approval of the President, and smiling blandly up into his face while they reach their arms up to the armpits into the earnings of the Federal reserve banking system and dish it out, $26,000,000 at one time, for a bank building in Wall Street.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, they are spending $71,000,000 to-day for bank buildings in this country.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator has reference to the Federal reserve banking system?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, this thing gets worse and worse. They ought to be indicted now by a Federal grand jury and investigated at once.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I beg to remind my friend, the Senator from Alabama, that the Federal Reserve Board has this money to spend because it has charged the people all the way from 20 per cent to 100 per cent on the money they have put out.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is a fact. I have called the attention of the Senate to the fact that they charged one bank in my State at the rate of 87½ per cent. They raised the rate of discount from 3 per cent to 7 per cent, and when the legal rate of interest in the State of my friend, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], was 6 per cent the banks of his State had to pay 7 per cent in order to get money to loan at 6 per cent.

The Federal Reserve Board took such action to prevent loans, and they did it. Wall Street demanded that that be done. Now, if Wall Street is not in the saddle, what interest is in the saddle?

Mr. President, my friend from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has added these figures for me: The Capitol Building, the House Office Building, the Senate Office Building, the State, War, and Navy Building, all cost $19,887,000; and yet $26,000,000 is being spent by order of President Harding's Federal Reserve Board for one bank building in Wall Street; $6,123,000 more for that one institution than it cost to erect the Capitol of the country, the Senate and House Office Buildings, and the State, War, and Navy Building in the city of Washington. Senators, do you suppose there is any graft in this thing? This money does not belong to the Federal Reserve Board. Why will the President keep that board in office?

I am going to propound that question to him many a time, because the American people have got rights in this matter. They have a right to be heard. Wall Street does not control this Nation long at any one time. The American people, if properly reached and aroused, will express themselves; they will be heard from. If one administration will not turn the rascals out and run the Government in the interest of the people, we will have to put in officers that will.

The Federal Reserve Board, with the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] pending, and a bill introduced to-day, as my friend from Utah [Mr. KING] says, to prevent the use of any such power, I understand, have given out a statement that they are going to stop this building business. I am not willing to rest with that; I want to do to them as the farmer in Æsop's Fables did to the lion. The lion was courting the farmer's daughter and finally asked the farmer for his girl, but the farmer said, "I am afraid you may scratch her with those long claws or bite her with those sharp teeth." The lion said, "No." "Well," said the farmer, "go and have your claws cut off and your teeth knocked out and come back and talk to me." So the lion went off smiling and had his claws cut off and his teeth knocked out. When he came back he was harmless, and the farmer killed him with a hand stick.

If the President wanted to make this Nation happy—I am talking about the masses of the people, Republicans and Democrats alike—if he should announce in the morning that he had removed every member of the Federal Reserve Board he would make the American people happy. But will he do it? It is rumored that Wall Street has said that W. P. G. Harding must be retained. Now, I want to tell you of another rumor, which is in the Washington Post this morning, I believe. It is rumored that the President had two very prominent Republican Senators from the other side up there last night. I believe the rumor has it that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], two of our good members of the agricultural bloc, were up there. We have been working together here to bring about some measure of relief to the farmers of the South and West, and they are trying to break that up; so the story is that the President said to them that he did not like the idea of having a law say that he must put a farmer on the Federal Reserve Board. The President sat here for five years and nine months as a Senator, right under the Federal reserve act that required that two bankers should be appointed by the President upon that board, and he never once complained about that, but I am told that he tells these Senators that he does not like to be instructed by an act to put a farmer on this board.

Mr. President, I am hoping and praying that we will pass that bill placing a farmer on that board. I think we will. I knew, when I opposed postponement of that measure before Christmas, that they were going to start a propaganda. They have done so. "Why, the idea of your trying to put a farmer on the board!" They have got the big banks in certain sections bringing all the influence they can to bear upon the President and upon Congress to defeat that bill. Are they going to be able to defeat it? Are they going to be able to furnish more proof to the effect that Wall Street is in the saddle? If that bill is defeated, what will the farmers of the West say? What will the farmers of the South say? What will the farmers of the northern sections say? Why, they can not say anything else but that some influence greater than they has controlled in the matter.

Mr. President, I can not get away from these figures without looking at them once more. A bank building in Wall Street, ordered to be constructed by the Federal Reserve Board of seven men, is to cost around $26,000,000—more money than it cost to build the Capitol, the House Office Building, the Senate Office Building, and the State, War, and Navy Building in the capital of the Nation! Four great institutions in the capital cost $6,000,000 less than this one bank costs. I repeat, before I leave the subject, that it seems to me to be surrounded by and covered over with the atmosphere of graft.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this $26,000,000 building in New York will accommodate only about 500 employees, while the State, War, and Navy Building, which cost one-third that amount, accommodates several thousand employees.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said a moment ago that the thing gets worse the more you look into it. Five hundred clerks and stenographers and coin carriers in Wall Street whose god is gold! This building will accommodate 500 people, as against buildings of less cost that accommodate thousands. Why, there are 435 Members in the House Office Building, with their secretaries. They have a clerk and a secretary each; and there are 96 Senators with their secretaries and two offices and big, fine committee rooms; and these buildings are built of marble. The Senate Office Building and the House Office Building and the State, War, and Navy Building of marble and granite, that accommodate thousands of employees, and the Capitol in which I stand—all of them cost less than this new building that is to go up in Wall Street!

That is a good point that my friend from Georgia made. I want to get the RECORD exactly right, because I think it will give the Federal Reserve Board a good deal of pleasure to peruse these lines; and if I were President, the places that know them now would soon know them no more forever. The President could not do a better thing than to put them out immediately.

We said that you had a program over there to seat Mr. Newberry. I believe the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said to me that he had no program. I did not say that any individual had a program. It has been rumored for weeks that you polled the Republican side to find out how many Republican Senators would vote for Mr. Newberry. Listen, Senators—and this polling of Republican Senators was before any one of you had read a line of the testimony or a line of the report. You will say, "You ought not to talk that way unless you have the proof." Well, I am going to give you proof.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] was called upon by his constituents. Your constituents are getting very wide-awake on this Newberry question. They do not think that a man should occupy a place here who secured his seat by the unlawful use of money. But the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], a Republican Senator, stated, according to an Oklahoma newspaper, that when the report was made in the Newberry case you polled Republican Senators to know how they would vote in the Newberry case. Senators, think of that—a man charged with the high crime of buying from his State a nomination to the Senate, that being the principal step in the matter of coming to the Senate and getting his seat, challenged by the people of that State, convicted in a court of that State, and saved from the penitentiary only by a technicality, comes here and the Republican majority of the committee reports favorably for him, after condemning the amount of money that he spent, and saying: "Yes; that was excessive; it was too much." Well, if it was too much, what ought you to say to him at the door? Why, you should say, "You can not come in. Your credentials are covered with dollar marks. We say ourselves that you spent too much, and if you spent too much you are not entitled to a seat in this body." They ought to have said that, but they did not. They reported favorably for him.

Now let us see what the Senator from Oklahoma said about that. Here is what he said:

> Soon after the report of the investigating committee was submitted to the Senate, and when a poll of Republican Senators was taken for the guidance of Senate leaders, I told Senators I would be inclined to vote in accordance with the majority report.

That is from the Oklahoma News, Oklahoma City, of Tuesday, December 20, 1921.

Senators, does that look as though there was any concerted action on the other side to seat this man? Does that look like an effort to take snap judgment upon the American people, who have a right to demand that every man who occupies a seat in this body shall have a clean, clear title? Was that the way to try a case of this kind—to go to the men who are to sit as jurors and ask them to pledge in advance that they will vote to seat him before they read the indictment or read the testimony—before they know what the facts are?

Here was the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], who says that he told them he "was inclined to vote in accordance with the majority report." He admits that he had just about halfway committed himself without ever reading the testimony. What do you think of that?

They tell us now that Mr. Newberry is coming here to talk. I hope he will. I suppose the pressure that we have brought to bear from time to time, in the name of the American people, is about to smoke him out. I hope so. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] said to-day that Mr. Newberry insists upon being heard.

Oh, what a noble spirit he is now about to display. When they read the indictment against him in the Federal court of Michigan he did not insist upon being heard. When they arraigned him before Federal jurors in his State he did not insist upon being heard. He sat only a few feet from the witness chair. He could have gone upon the stand at any time if he had thought it would have been to his interest to do so, but he did not do it. He was here in the Senate Office Building when this committee sat in judgment upon his case. He never once asked to be heard. The Republican majority of the committee never requested him to come before it. On the other hand, the majority of the committee refused when asked by the minority to request him to come before the committee. Does that look as though he would ever insist upon being heard? But the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] says that he insists upon being heard!

Well, I am glad that he is insisting now. I am very anxious to have an opportunity of hearing him and of propounding a few interrogatories to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my good friend from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator from Alabama mean to tell the Senate of the United States and tell the American people that the minority members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections asked and insisted that the majority members should order or summon or request Mr. Newberry to come before the committee and be examined and the majority members refused to permit him to come?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is the fact. They declined to extend to him an invitation or to require him to come and appear before them. I am not surprised that the able Senator from North Carolina should be astonished at that. It is astounding.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator what excuse the majority members then gave or what excuse the majority members or the chairman or any representatives of that committee now give for this very remarkable and amazing conduct?

Mr. HEFLIN. They just simply declined to request him to come. It is astounding. The more this case is gone into the worse it looks and the worse it smells.

Now, I understand that Mr. Newberry is to come here. He signed a statement just after the primary in which his money secured for him the nomination for the Senate from Michigan and it had this provision in it. I read a part of it yesterday and I am going to read the other part now:

> I have not received any money or thing of value, nor has anyone else received for me any money or thing of value, with my knowledge or consent, from any source, to aid or support my candidacy for election as United States Senator.

Mr. President, when I read that statement I recalled the testimony of Paul King, his manager, to the effect that when he asked Paul King how much it would cost him to make the race for the Senate, and Paul told him $50,000, he employed Paul to be his manager, knowing that it was going to cost at least $50,000.

Who was going to put up that money? Mr. Newberry is a millionaire many times over. He is a money king. Who was going to put that money up? Seventeen years ago, Democratic and Republican papers tell us, he opened a barrel to secure the nomination for the lower House of Congress against Denby in Michigan. A Republican paper states that it cost him over $3,000 to pay hired workers—not voluntary workers but hired workers. He did not have any scruples about that.

Mr. KING. That was in one city only.

Mr. HEFLIN. It was in one city only, my friend from Utah suggests. One of the papers said that while they were distributing this money, Newberry was in an automobile, going through the district, giving out cigars by the box. They must have been fine, luscious fellows, costing about 10, 15, or 25 cents apiece. He was passing them around. He has not denied that he took a pretty active financial interest in that campaign, but here he says, "I had nothing whatever to do with it. I expended no money in it. Nobody has expended any for me with my knowledge or consent."

When he comes here to make his statement, I want him to bear these things in mind:

> Mr. Newberry, is Mr. Joy your brother-in-law?
> Yes, sir.
> He gave you $25,000 for your campaign fund, did he not?
> Well, I am told that he did.
> He married your sister, did he not?
> Yes.
> The relation between you is pretty close and intimate, is it not?
> Yes.
> Is John Newberry your brother?
> Yes.
> Your attorneys all admit you spent over $200,000 in your race, do they not?
> Yes.
> We charged there were three or four hundred thousand more, and asked you to bring the stubs and checks and books of the bank, and your attorneys and witnesses said they had been destroyed, did they not?
> Yes.
> But they admit $200,000, do they not?
> Yes.
> Where did that money come from, Mr. Newberry?
> I do not know.
> You were a candidate for the Senate?
> Yes.
> You paid $3,000 for hired workers in the city of Detroit for one day against Denby 17 years ago, and you were not willing now to put up a dollar, and you did not put up a dollar, to satisfy your ambition to go to the United States Senate, Mr. Newberry?
> That is what I said in my statement.
> You signed that statement, did you not, Mr. Newberry?
> Yes.
> Mr. Newberry, you stated that you did not have anything to do with anybody contributing money, and did not know about it?
> Yes.
> John Newberry is your brother?
> Yes.
> He is pretty close to you, brother and brother?
> Yes.
> Not only brothers of the blood, but you are partners in business together, are you not.
> Yes.
> Is Fred Smith your confidential agent?
> Yes.
> Is he a trustworthy man?
> Yes.
> Is he the agent of your brother, John Newberry?
> Yes.
> You and John have business together?
> Yes.
> Did not Fred Smith swear that he drew checks on your money and John Newberry's money in one joint fund, and that that money was used in Michigan?
> Yes.
> And you say that confidential agent, to whom you gave power of attorney to check on your money, Fred Smith, is still your confidential agent?
> Yes.

Well, if he checked on your bank account to the extent of many thousands of dollars without authority from you to do so, why did you continue to keep him in such a position as your confidential agent? Explain that, Mr. Newberry, to the Senate and the country.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] propounded an inquiry to the Senator from Alabama a moment ago relative to the action of the committee, and with the kindness of the Senator, I would like to read, for the benefit of the Senator from North Carolina, the resolution offered by the minority Members and unanimously supported by them, as follows:

> Resolved by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, That the subcommittee be instructed to subpœna and take the testimony of Frederick P. Smith and such other witnesses as may be suggested by any member of the subcommittee to the end that there may be a full and complete hearing respecting the issues involved in the pending contest.
> Resolved by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, That the subcommittee be instructed to invite Senator Newberry to appear before it to give testimony concerning the charges pending against him involving his title to a seat in the United States Senate.

Let me say that there were three separate resolutions, and each was voted upon separately, as I recall, and every Democrat voted in the affirmative and every Republican voted in the negative. The third resolution was as follows:

> Resolved by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, That the attorneys representing the contestant and the contestee in the pending investigation be invited to appear before the full committee to submit oral arguments, on a date to be fixed by the chairman of the committee.

The Democratic members of the committee wanted to give Mr. Newberry full opportunity to appear before the committee and make an explanation. They desired, first, that he be subpœnaed. That was voted down. Then they submitted a resolution that he be invited to attend. That was voted down. Then they asked that oral argument before the full committee—because the full committee had not had the advantage of hearing the testimony adduced before the subcommittee—be submitted by the attorneys for the respective parties, and that was voted down. During the contest it seemed as if there was a determined effort to forbid the facts from being known, and in New York, when a grand jury investigation was in progress, every step possible was taken by Mr. Newberry and his friends to block the investigation, and the matter had to come to the Supreme Court, as I recall, before the validity of the proceedings was conceded.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I do not believe there is a fair-minded Senator in this body who would take that statement alone which the Senator from Utah has made and then vote to seat Mr. Newberry.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. With the consent of the Senator from Alabama, I would like to ask the Senator from Utah if the majority members of the committee, at the time they voted down the resolution to request Mr. Newberry to come before the committee in his own defense, and in explanation of the serious charges made against the validity of his seat in the Senate, gave any reason for that extraordinary and astounding action on their part?

Mr. KING. My memory is not quite clear in regard to it, but the only reason I recall now is that considerable testimony had been taken, and the committee was advised as to the facts, and no additional light could be thrown upon the subject matter under investigation. If I am in error, I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. SIMMONS. In other words, the only reason they gave is that they did not want Mr. Newberry to be subjected to cross-examination?

Mr. KING. That is the only conclusion which can be deduced from the action of the majority of the committee. My friend from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the ranking member of the committee on the Democratic side, perhaps, has a clearer recollection of that than I have.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Utah has given the substance of all that was said. It should be borne in mind that for a period of nearly two years everything was done to block these hearings, one obstacle after another being put in the way. During a part of this time it transpired that there was an indictment, and during the pendency of that indictment, and before the trial, the members of the committee, both majority and minority, felt that there should not be a public hearing here which might perhaps tend to prejudice the defendant in the eyes of the jury. That was the only part of the time in which the members of the committee agreed that there should be no action taken. There was no further reason.

A part of this testimony was taken while I was necessarily absent for a day or two, having made an engagement when I had no reason to anticipate that the committee would be in session. Senator Wolcott, who was a member of the subcommittee, now the chancellor of Delaware, asked that the final determination of the hearings should await my return. Meanwhile he was appointed and accepted the position of chancellor of Delaware. He was succeeded on the committee by the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. We then presented substantially the same motions to the subcommittee which afterwards were presented to the full committee and which have just been read by the Senator from Utah.

There is absolutely no question in the mind of any fair-minded man that there ought to have been the opportunity for further hearings and calling of further witnesses, and there is no question in my mind that if the majority members of that committee had been sitting as a court they would have heard further testimony, and to have refused to have done so would have been reversible error if the matter had been taken up in a court. About that there can be no question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator referred to a trial in the State of Michigan in which Mr. Newberry was a defendant.

Mr. POMERENE. I did.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was a trial growing out of the charges made with reference to his purchase of a seat in this body.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe that case went off upon a technicality?

Mr. POMERENE. It did.

Mr. SIMMONS. And he got out. I wish to ask the Senator if he ascertained in connection with the investigation, or is informed otherwise, whether Mr. Newberry himself appeared as a witness in his own defense in that case?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina is a lawyer, and an able lawyer. Mr. Newberry was present at the trial. He was jointly indicted with probably a hundred others.

Mr. KING. One hundred and twenty-five.

Mr. POMERENE. One hundred and twenty-five, the Senator from Utah advises me. Some of those codefendants were placed upon the stand by the defendant's attorneys and testified not only in their own behalf but in Mr. Newberry's behalf; but Mr. Newberry was not equally gallant. He did not testify either in his own behalf or in their behalf, and some of those men later came before our committee and testified under subpœna. Mr. Newberry did not testify, and the majority would not invite him to come before us, though the minority members repeatedly requested it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to get along and conclude my speech. What situation does this colloquy between my friend from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] disclose? Mr. Newberry was indicted with many others for violating a Federal statute which provided that he could spend only $10,000 in a senatorial primary, and who had spent, as could be shown, more than twenty times that amount.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to correct him?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. POMERENE. The statute provided only that there could be $10,000 expended excepting for certain items of expense. That was the general statute, but there was a further proviso to the effect that if there was an amount less than that prescribed by the statutes of any State, then the limitation in the State statute should apply. That amount in Michigan was limited to 50 per cent of one year's salary for both the primary and the general election.

Mr. HEFLIN. Thirty-seven hundred and fifty dollars—and I thank the Senator for the correction.

Mr. Newberry was indicted for this very grave offense—going out and literally improperly securing a nomination to this the greatest lawmaking body in the world, a body that has to do with shaping the destiny of the Nation, a body that has the power to tax the American people. He secured that nomination. No man can conscientiously deny that he obtained that nomination by the use of money. Then if he did secure it by the use of money, why is it necessary for us longer to discuss it? If he did obtain the nomination by the use of money, he is not entitled to a seat in this body. Get this point now, Senators, suggested to me by the statement of the Senator from Ohio: While Mr. Newberry was under sentence of two years to the penitentiary, I believe, the Democratic members of the committee agreed to stop the investigation here because he had already been convicted by a jury of his peers under a statute in his own State. How were they rewarded? Finally that law was declared unconstitutional upon a technicality, and he escaped punishment through the meshes of a technicality—not upon the facts, because a jury of his peers convicted him upon the facts. They convicted him of having bought the nomination to the Senate when they knew that he would have to go to the penitentiary.

Then what happened? The Democratic members of the committee agreed not to go on with the investigation because the people of Michigan were investigating the case in court. What was done while they were doing that? The bank books were being burned. The checks used in the campaign were being destroyed.

When the law was declared unconstitutional, then it was up to the Senate itself to investigate and say whether or not he should enter here. We said, "We want the bank books." They said, "We have not got them; they are destroyed."

"We would like to have the checks."

"They are destroyed, too."

"Well, give us the check stubs."

"They are destroyed."

"Get us the documents. You kept a list of the money paid out."

"All of that has been destroyed."

"All right; then let us summon Mr. Newberry. Go and ask him to come in. We were good enough to stop the investigation while he was under sentence. Now the sentence is out of the way on a technicality. We have to pass on the case here. We are each a judge in the case. We want you to invite him to come before us. We want to ask him certain questions. The Senator from Ohio has shown that the Republican members of the committee voted down that request; that each time every Republican voted against extending an invitation to him requesting him to come."

I wish to ask again, was it because of this man's wealth that you did not want to embarrass him or displease him? Was it because he contributed to your campaign fund thousands upon thousands of dollars that you dare not unseat him? What was it that prompted the majority of the committee to refuse the minority's request to bring these books and check stubs and checks? What was it that caused them to decline even to extend a courteous, mild-mannered invitation to Mr. Newberry to come before Senators from the sovereign States of this Union and explain how he obtained the nomination to the Senate.

Senators, is it not strange that you have done that? Then what did you do? Just as soon as you reported the case to the Senate you commenced to poll the Republicans to ask if they would vote to seat Mr. Newberry. They had not read the report, they had not read the testimony. They were jurors and judges in the case, and you were seeking to get them to pledge a verdict before they had read the facts. My God, Mr. President, we have fallen under Republican rule upon strange times in the Senate of the United States.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARREL] in his statement to the Oklahoma News said that you polled the Republicans just after you made the Newberry report. He said you polled Republican Senators for guidance to the Senate leaders on that side. If that is not administration business, what is it? Your leaders usually put through administration measures. Is the seating of Newberry a part of the party program?

Mr. President, Mr. Newberry is coming here to speak. I want him to explain what Paul King meant when he said:

I did whatever was necessary to be done for Mr. Newberry without regard to expense.

That means money, Senators. There was no limit put upon Paul King's boodle barrel. The barrel is open; go to it!

I want Mr. Newberry to explain what Paul King meant when he wrote:

I have already got over 200 newspapers for you and I am going out after the other 300.

Explain that, Mr. Newberry.

Explain what Paul King meant when he wrote to you: "The labor vote in a certain place is a little doubtful, but I am going over there to-morrow. It is looking a little more favorable. I am going to have a page paid advertisement in the labor paper, and I am looking for results," or words to that effect. Explain that, Mr. Newberry.

Explain the contributions made by your brother, who is also a partner in business. Explain how he came to expend money for you without your knowledge or consent. Mr. Newberry, do you tell the Senate and the country before God that you did not contribute any money to this campaign, that you did not know that your own brother was contributing money, that your brothers-in-law were contributing money, that you did not know that money was being expended lavishly for you?

"Mr. Newberry, did you not get a letter from the lieutenant-governor of Michigan, a Republican, who wrote you that they were expending in your behalf between $250,000 and $500,000?"

"Yes."

"You say you did not know anything about this money being expended? You did not deny that, did you, Mr. Newberry?"

"No."

"You say you had nothing to do with this campaign?"

"That is what I said in my statement."

"Did you not write Paul King constantly?"

"Yes; I wrote him letters."

"Did you not write about your campaign?"

"Yes."

"Did you not write and tell him that you knew Osborn's finances were about exhausted?"

"Yes."

"Was not that having something to do with your campaign? Did you not tell him not to let up but to keep the publicity going at full pressure?"

"Yes."

"Was not that having something to do with the campaign?"

"Mr. Newberry, did you not, over your signature, acknowledge that you were going to pay the publicity bill?"

Listen, Senators, you have not heard this before. I am repeating a good many things here; there is bound to be a repetition, because I am saying a good deal of this for the benefit of people who sit in the galleries from day to day to hear this case discussed, who have never known the facts, if they live in some State where subsidized newspapers hide them. I am reiterating some of the facts in order that they may know the truth.

Mr. President, on pages 651 and 652 of the bill of exceptions in the Newberry case there is a letter from Mr. Newberry, in which he said:

Neither Mr. Templeton, Mr. King, nor Mr. Oakman have ever or expect ever to receive one cent except actual travel and publicity from me.

Now, Mr. Newberry, explain that when you come upon this floor. In that letter he stated that he was expected to pay the publicity bill. How much was it? According to the facts that were gathered, in the absence of the destroyed check stubs and bank books, it was $140,000. He admits that they were to look to him for their traveling expenses. He admits that they were to look to him for the publicity costs. Paul King said, "I do whatever I think is necessary, without regard to expense." I would like very much to know the real truth about how much that publicity bill was. I am satisfied it was anywhere from $300,000 to $500,000, but they destroyed a lot of the evidence.

"Now, Mr. Newberry, you live in Michigan. You know Gov. Osborn, a distinguished Republican, able, clean man, not possessed of many of this world's goods, but a high-toned, honorable gentleman. He ran against you, did he not?"

"Yes."

"He was in the race against you for weeks before you ever thought of Henry Ford?"

"Yes."

"Henry Ford was never even mentioned during that time?"

"I never heard of it."

"You never mentioned him in your letters to Paul King, did you?"

"No."

"You said Osborn was the man, did you not, and you rejoiced in your letter when you said his finances were about exhausted—a race for dollars with an ex-governor of your own party in your own State?"

"Yes."

"When the race was on some of the newspapers of your State all during the race cried out against the lavish and unlawful use of money, did they not?"

"Yes."

"When the race was over, the lieutenant governor wrote you that the race was the most scandalous ever conducted in the State, and that the State could not recover from it for 25 years, did he not?"

"Yes."

"Did not Mr. Osborn write you a letter after he saw that you denied knowing anything about the contributions and expenditures of money in your campaign?"

"Yes."

"Did not he, a member of your own party, a man of rigid integrity, a man twice honored with the office of governor in your State, write you a letter in which he said, 'If you deny that you knew about these expenditures, and so forth, you are a liar and an ass?'"

"Explain all these things, Mr. Newberry, when you come to talk to this body, every Member of which took an oath, standing at the altar place here, that he would protect the Constitution against all enemies, both foreign and domestic. What are you, Mr. Newberry, if you corrupt the ballot of a Commonwealth by the purchase of a seat in this body? You are an enemy to free government in America. You ought not to be permitted to come in here."

Senators, let me again sound the warning. If the day comes when money bags control in the elections in this country, it will not be long before we shall have a revolution. The people will not submit in this Republic of the West to the domination of dollars in politics. In the old days, as I told you in another speech, the question was asked as to a candidate: "Is he honest? Is he capable? Is he trustworthy? Is he qualified? All right. Then elect him; he will be our servant." But another order of things is sought to be established. The money lords of the East now ask about the candidate: "Will he be our handy instrument? Will he do our bidding? If not, let him know that we will spend big money to beat him."

I have had men from certain sections of the country tell me, when I have asked, "Why do you not run for the Senate; you are an able, strong man?" "No," they have said, "I have not money enough."

Senators, it is creeping upon us in this country. The money power is determined to control this body, for there are only 96 Senators here, and if they can buy the seats of 49, they will control in this Nation of ours. Has the time come when a fat purse and not right principles, when money and not manhood, will win in our senatorial contests? God forbid!

So, Mr. Newberry, we want to ask you some questions: "Why did you not testify? Are you going to let us propound questions to you? Will you sit here and let us read a list of questions to you and discuss them in your presence? Will you not do that, Mr. Newberry?" If not, then we must conclude that you are afraid to be cross-examined.

Why is it that Senators have framed up this program to slip this man in here at the last hour, let him rise in his place, and read his piece and walk out? Is that the scheme. You would not let him come before the committee; he has not appeared here to make a statement; we have not a line from him in all the 2,000 pages of testimony when his title to a seat in this body is involved. Senators, I fear that some of you do not realize how serious this matter is.

I want to remind you of another thing touched upon briefly yesterday. An ex-mayor of one of the towns of Michigan was convicted. The case was appealed to the higher court. The Newberry managers went after him and said, "You said you would not be for Newberry?" He said, "No; I never will be for him." Listen, Senators. Money had already done its devilish work among thousands and tens of thousands, but here is where the power of the court was invoked under the corrupt régime that existed in certain localities. They said, "Well, you have a case against you appealed in the higher court, have you not?" "Yes." "It is to your interest to support Newberry. We stand in with the powers that be, and if you support him your case will be reversed. If you do not support him you will be convicted by the higher court. We are not going to tell you now what to do, but if you do support him we will know it; if this town goes for him we will know that you supported him; if this town goes against him we will know that you did not support him, and you will go to the penitentiary."

Senators, are you going to vote to seat this man and then undertake to face the American people with such testimony as that before you? There is an attempt to use the power of the courts to debauch the voter. A galvanized politician is bought up and sent out into the Commonwealth with Mr. Newberry's money, and when that will not work then the power of the courts is invoked, justice is tampered with, an unfortunate man's troubles are taken advantage of and he is browbeaten into voting for a man whom he said he was not for and would never be for. That is in the testimony. Every power imaginable, it seems, was employed to secure for Mr. Newberry the nomination to the Senate.

"Mr. Newberry, explain these things when you come to talk here."

One of the witnesses testified that he went into Paul King's office in Detroit, which was the Newberry headquarters, and he saw a table covered over with stacks of money, batches of bills, $10, $20, $50, to $100, I believe. That fellow's eyes just fairly glistened. They asked him how much it looked like it was. He said, "It looked to me like it was a million dollars." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, money was the dominating power in the Newberry campaign; money was the instrument that he invoked to beat Secretary Denby 17 years ago, when he ran for the House of Representatives in Michigan. The newspapers in Michigan, both Democratic and Republican, say that money was used lavishly in that campaign. A Republican newspaper said Newberry hired workers at $5 a day in one city, costing him $3,000, while the salary of a Representative at that time was only $5,000 a year. He paid those workers for that day's work within $2,000 of what the salary of a Representative was for a year.

They undertake to tell us here that Newberry was a stranger to politics; that he was merely a business man; that he got into the race, and that Ford was spending money and he had to spend it because of that. Right in that connection I want to read another statement from the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD]. He is writing this to his home people: They are getting after him, just as they are going to get after many Senators after they vote to seat Newberry. There will not be many days in the year when they will not wish they had voted against seating Newberry. If you were to select a man to guard your rights and you saw him betraying them, would you vote to put him back there again?

Listen to what the Senator from Oklahoma said. You are not going to be able to get away with any of the arguments which you have made, because there is not any foundation to them. Mr. HARRELD said:

> As long as Newberry's friends used their money to offset Ford's publicity, I can not see where any moral turpitude was involved.

I said yesterday and I repeat that Ford did not expend any money, and he would not let his friends expend any. The lawyers of Newberry withrew their charges to that effect. So that is removed, and my friend from Oklahoma has not a peg on which to hang his defense of Newberry's course. Ford did not use money; he would not permit his friends to use it. My friend from Oklahoma, if he was about to vote for Newberry upon the ground that he had to match dollars with Ford, will now find that his argument is gone.

Mr. Newberry's friends also stated that Mr. Newberry was a new man in politics; that he was not known; that he was just a business man. He did not know what it would take nor what they were doing. The Detroit papers in 1904, both Democratic and Republican, prove that that will not do, for they show that Mr. Newberry was in a race for Congress 17 years ago and that money was his long suit then. That is what he uses. Listen, Senators. One of these Republican papers said in effect editorially that Denby with ability qualifications won against a man with money, a man with a barrel open at both ends, 17 years ago. So that destroys the idea that Mr. Newberry was new in politics and does not know anything about it. He entered politics with a boodle barrel open at both ends.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does not the record in the present case disclose emphatically and unequivocally that the excessive expenditure of money began long before Mr. Ford's name was even mentioned as a candidate for the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. Absolutely.

Mr. TRAMMELL. So there is nothing in that excuse whatever?

Mr. HEFLIN. Nothing. Why, Mr. Newberry mentioned Osborn and Warner, two ex-governors of his State, for weeks and weeks before Ford was ever thought of, and he singled Osborn out as the man he would have to defeat and rejoiced when he learned that Osborn's money was about exhausted and that Osborn, as I said here before in a lengthy speech, was stricken upon the plain and his money was about all gone.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator has so repeatedly spoken about the exhaustion of Gov. Osborn's money and about the trampling upon the rights of the poor man by Mr. Newberry, the rich man, that I wonder if the Senator would be interested to know the fact that Gov. Osborn is and has been a multimillionaire, and, so far as money is concerned, could buy out Senator Newberry ten times over and have a colossal fortune left?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not agree to that statement.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will look into the matter he will find that to be the fact.

Mr. HEFLIN. I must look into it; I can not accept that statement. I wish, however, before he takes his seat to ask the Senator, who has such a vivid and active imagination, what did Newberry mean when he wrote Paul King that Osborn's finances were about exhausted?

Mr. SPENCER. Again, the Senator, if he wants the facts in the case, should realize that such a letter was never written stating that his finances were about exhausted. The Senator does not remember the letter. The letter said that there was some cause for congratulation that the ammunition—the Senator can look it up, if he cares to, in which event he will find it to be exactly as I am stating it—that the ammunition was exhausted. That referred to the ammunition of material; what he had to support his candidacy by way of argument. If the Senator wants the facts as to money, Gov. Osborn could discount over and over again anything that Senator Newberry ever had.

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield for the purpose of having a lot of strange fiction injected into my speech. To compare Osborn with Mr. Newberry in point of wealth is like comparing a little Indian mound in Missouri to Pikes Peak in Colorado.

Mr. OVERMAN. What does "ammunition" mean?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I believe that Mr. Newberry meant money; everybody else on this side believes it, including the Republicans who sit over here, and I think that every Republican on the other side, save about three, believes that Mr. Newberry meant money when he referred to Osborn's ammunition.

Oh, Mr. President, my friend from Missouri is a smooth artist, but he will never be able to convince any wide-awake, thoughtful Senator that when Mr. Newberry referred in his letter to Paul King, to Osborn's ammunition being exhausted, that he did not mean money.

I never saw a lawyer engaged in defending a client fight harder than the Senator from Missouri is fighting for Mr. Newberry. What does he now say? He comes here now after it has been shown that Newberry is rich, and stamped all over with dollar marks, and says that Osborn could buy out Newberry many times over. Mr. President, I can not characterize that situation properly in parliamentary language. They have tried every other argument, and at last, when Republicans on the other side are deserting the Newberry standard and are going to vote according to their conscience for their States, for the Nation, and for the honor and integrity of this body, the Senator from Missouri, hard pressed, comes in and pleads that Osborn was a rich man who could buy Newberry out over and over again. Now, I am going to turn this piece of fiction against the Senator from Missouri.

If that is true, if Osborn could buy Newberry over and over again, it shows that he had too much respect for the voters of Michigan and too high a conception of the proprieties and principles that should govern in a senatorial race to buy the nomination with money. The Senator from Missouri has presented here a dangerous argument for Mr. Newberry. If Osborn has the money that he says he has, then he was able to buy the nomination, and he would not do it. He must have said, "No; I have been governor of this Commonwealth. The people here have honored me with the highest office within their gift. I see a man coming here now with his moneybags, undertaking to debauch and buy the voters of Michigan. I have more money than he has, but I would not, if I could, do such a thing. I should like to go to the Senate to represent this people, but I am not going to corrupt the voters to do it."

Newberry writes to Paul King, "Go to it! Do not let up on publicity." Paul says, "I am doing whatever I see necessary to do, without regard to expense."

The lieutenant governor said: "They are spending from a quarter to a half million dollars of money in your race, Mr. Newberry."

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has fought a lone, hard battle for his friend, Truman Newberry. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] made a speech the other day in the Newberry case that will rise up to plague those who vote to seat Mr. Newberry. You never will be able to answer that speech, Senators. There is not any politics in that. You can not go home to your people, as you intended to do in the outset, some of you, and say, "Oh, this was nothing but a Democratic fight, and we just stood by our man. That is all there is to it," and just toss it to one side by a wave of the hand, but you can not do that now, Senators. Senator KENYON is an able and brave Republican, and he says Mr. Newberry is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States. Senators BORAH and NORRIS and other Republicans say the same thing. These Republican Senators have read the testimony, they have heard arguments for and against Mr. Newberry, and, acting under their oaths, they have declared that according to the printed testimony Mr. Newberry is not entitled to occupy a seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, does the Senator say that the people are going to read the testimony?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; they are going to read enough of it to convince them that Mr. Newberry bought his seat in the Senate. I want them to have this evidence in so many copies of the RECORD that it will not escape the people out in the States. I want us to have points that we can pick out here and yonder, and go to the people and fight to preserve the honor and integrity of this body, for that is what is involved here.

Why, Senators, you did not play politics when you voted to reject a Democrat from the State of Montana. You did right in turning him out. There was no talk of politics when you turned out a Republican Senator from Illinois. You did right then. There ought not to be any dividing line in this Chamber when it comes to a question like this. We ought to get together when a danger like this is presented, just like our boys did on the firing line in France, and forget Republican and Democratic politics and say, "We stand as one against all comers who undertake to buy seats in the Senate of the United States." That is the way the American people stand upon this question. You are going to learn that, many of you, when you get a chance to go before them again, or rather when they have a much-desired chance to get a lick at you.

Senators, I never have spoken in any case in Congress in a service of 17 years in the two Houses where I have received so many letters, I believe, as I have in the Newberry case. I have received them from nearly every State in the Union commending my course, and I have had them name Senators, and one of them especially said of a man whom I like personally very much:

> He has cooked his goose. You will never see him back there again.

I feel pretty deeply on this subject. I like personally some Senators who are going to vote for Newberry, and yet I should like to see them defeated if they vote to seat a man in the Senate who admits that more than $200,000 were spent in his race for his nomination to the Senate.

Senators, this is a serious thing. It strikes at the vital life of the Republic. I repeat, and it can not be said too often, if they can buy seats in this body and control it, they can control the business and the destinies of a hundred million people; and I am going to fight it as long as I have the strength to do it.

Now I want to remind you of what was said by Mr. Blair, Mr. Newberry's treasurer, who handled the funds of the Newberry campaign. Senators, I want you all to get this:

I regret that there are less than a dozen Republican Senators here listening to the arguments in a case that involves the honor and integrity of the Senate and the welfare of the American people. The average attendance of Republican Senators since we took up the Newberry case is less than 12.

Mr. Blair testified that he handled the money for the Newberry campaign committee.

> Mr. Blair, did you give out any checks for money that was used for corrupt purposes?
> No, sir; no, sir.

On cross-examination they said:

> Mr. Blair, did you know what the checks were paid out for?
> No, sir.
> You did not know, except by what the managers told you, who got the money, did you?

He said, "That is all," and yet he had sworn that none of it was used for corrupt purposes. I quote the substance of his statement to show you how willing and anxious he was to shield Mr. Newberry and to help him in every way possible. Mr. Newberry was his partner in business:

> Now, let me ask you another question, Mr. Blair. Did you not receive a check from the wife of Mr. Newberry, the candidate for the Senate?
> Yes, sir.
> How much was it for?
> Fifteen or twenty-five thousand dollars.
> Well, be as accurate as you can. What do you say it was?
> I will say it was $15,000.
> Who was that?
> That was Mrs. Truman H. Newberry.
> Is that the wife of the man who said he had nothing on earth to do with his campaign and knew nothing about any contributions being made by anybody to the campaign to which his brother-in-law was contributing, his brother was contributing, and his wife was contributing?
> Yes, sir; that is the man.
> What did you do with that $15,000?
> Well, we really did not take that.
> Why not?

Listen, Senators:

> Because the newspapers of Michigan were making such a fuss about money used in the Newberry campaign.

Did you get that, Senators? The campaign was so scandalous that the newspapers were giving broadside blows to it every day, and they tell us that Mr. Newberry did not know about it. He said:

> We did not accept it because we felt it would give the newspapers an opportunity to be more nasty than ever.

Do you get the full purport of that, Senators?

In effect he says, "We had no conscientious scruples about taking contributions from the candidate's wife. We did not care how much was used for the purpose of securing the nomination, but we were afraid"—that is the inference—"to use it, because it would give the newspapers an opportunity to be more nasty than ever."

Senators, do you believe that Mr. Newberry did not know what was going on in his primary in Michigan? My friend from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has kindly furnished me the letter written by Mr. Newberry to Paul King, in which he talks about Mr. Osborn's financial condition. He says:

> There is much more information about Osborn's present plight—

This is ex-Gov. Osborn, who was also a candidate—

> I will tell you when I see you. The statement that he is short of ammunition is an absolute fact. Whether or not this was a feeler I will leave to you to judge when I talk to you about it.

Senators, there is not a lawyer in the world who would put upon that the construction that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] puts upon it. What else did he mean?

> The statement that he is short of ammunition is an absolute fact.

He meant campaign funds, of course.

Why, here is this rich man, Newberry, in close touch with Wall Street. Two of New York's citizens were contributing largely to his campaign. He knew, through the banks, just what Osborn's financial condition was, and he rejoiced, just like a condor would rejoice when he saw an animal bleeding, growing weaker and weaker as he fell upon the ground, the prey of the greedy condor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption for just a second?

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Referring to ex-Gov. Osborn's being out of ammunition, does not this record disclose the fact that they were apprehensive and worried about his ability and his capacity as a campaigner and as an orator?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yet they claim that that is wherein he was short of ammunition, when that was what was worrying them!

Mr. HEFLIN. Why, the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri makes me laugh. He said that what Mr. Newberry meant by that was that he was out of argument. Why, there is no end to argument in a campaign. If a man has as vivid an imagination as my friend from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has, fictitious, fanciful, or manufactured arguments would last as long as the world stands.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, is there any end of argument in the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, this is one case that should be thoroughly discussed.

It is such a rare thing that I can get some of you Republicans in here to listen to the arguments in the Newberry case that I feel I should give you as many facts as possible when I do get you to listen. I like several of you personally, who seem to be very indifferent about this case, and I would like to see you face about and be saved before it is everlastingly too late.

Mr. President, there is another thing that I desire to mention just here. Some of these good people in the galleries, coming from all parts of the country, who may not come this way again, ought to have some facts to take away with them, because some of them doubtless live where the subsidized press will not permit the facts to reach them through the newspapers. I do not mean by that that all the press is subsidized.

There are a great many very fair and honest newspapers in the country, but some of them would just color the situation and give us the silent treatment; they would have us believe, like the Senator from Missouri would have us believe, that this man Newberry really needs to have a collection taken up for him.

Talk about Osborn being able to buy Newberry over many times! Why, they expended $30,000 in making up that moving-picture business of Newberry standing in a uniform on a fake battleship. Why, yes; he was out on the deck of a fake ship, a wooden ship, up in Union Square, I believe it was, in New York City, and he had it camouflaged so that it looked like a battleship at sea, and he was standing there with his glasses, peering out apparently at the enemy. A fake battleship, pure and simple. There was not any danger at all around him except the squirrels in the park, and they are exceedingly fond of nuts. [Laughter.] That expense, my friend from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] informs me, was not included in the sworn account, and it amounted to $30,000. Why, I could read you many such items in the list that is printed in the New York World. There were thousands of dollars that were never accounted for in a sworn return or the returns that we were able to get at in spite of the loss and destruction of the checks, bank books, and stubs.

Fellow Senators, I repeat what I said on yesterday—the slime of the boodle serpent is over this man Newberry's tracks from the time he entered politics in 1904, when he tried to buy a seat in the lower House of Congress; down to the time he bought a seat in this body. That is mighty plain talk.

Mr. Newberry said that none of the expense of his campaign was made with his knowledge or consent. Now, let us see. He certainly knew that somebody was going to spend big sums of money for him, for Paul King told him that it would cost him at least $50,000. He posed for moving pictures. His own witnesses swear that he did that. He was bound to know about the expense that was being incurred there. His letter that I read to you, a copy of which is in the brief or bill of exceptions in his case in Michigan, said that he was bound only for the traveling expenses and publicity costs. I have shown you that the publicity costs were $140,000, and adding the $30,000 for the moving-picture expense gives a total of $170,000. That comes within $30,000 of being what they admit they expended, and he is responsible for it.

They say he is coming here. The Senator from Missouri would have us believe that he is sick. I sympathize with him if he is sick. I saw him here a little while back. He is a lusty looking fellow. He looked to me like he is worth $100,000,000. The Senator from Missouri will undertake to arouse sympathy for him by saying his health is exceedingly bad, and he has added to that this evening that he is almost a pauper. Certain Senators must be very hard pressed for argument to sustain them in trying to seat this millionaire.

Under the evidence in this case the vote of the Senate should be unanimous in denying to Mr. Newberry a seat in the United States Senate.

This body was once occupied by the bravest and best men that the Republic ever produced in the heyday of its power and its glory. They guarded the threshold of this Chamber with intrepid vigilance; they stood there with flaming swords, and no man could cross it who had the touch and taint of money upon his credentials. Have we reached the point where we will permit a man accused or his friends to destroy the checks used in his campaign, the check stubs, the bank checks, and refuse to come and testify before the committee, so we could have an opportunity to rebut his testimony and cross-examine him, to have a seat in this body?

Have we reached that stage where, when the report of an accused Senator reaches this body, immediately they commence to poll the other side, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARREID] said, for the benefit of the Republican Senate leaders, to aid them in marshaling their forces to ram down the throats of the Senate and the people of the country a man who was convicted in his own State, and the evidence against him destroyed by his friends, who refused to testify, the majority members of the committee themselves refusing to request him to testify, and then polling the Senate before Senators have a chance to read the testimony and acquaint themselves with the facts? Senators, I ask again, have we reached the time when we will do that for a Democrat or a Republican? It is a dangerous day for the Republic if this thing goes through as scheduled by certain Republican leaders.

The Senator from Missouri interrupted my good friend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] when he was making one of the most brilliant and interesting speeches I have heard since I have been in this Chamber, in which he stung the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] like a yellow jacket. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] talked about the Senator from Arkansas being a bitter enemy of Mr. Newberry. I have never spoken to Mr. Newberry. I have seen him sitting over on the other side of the Chamber. I have even seen him preside over this body when an indictment was hanging over him for having bought a seat in the Senate.

What would you think if you should go to a courthouse where a man was being tried for a crime and the circuit judge should vacate his seat and let that man sit up there and preside while other matters were being transacted?

What is it about this man that causes Republican leaders to rush to his rescue, surround him with secrecy, keep him back from cross-examination, hide the facts in his case, which is about to go to a vote as to whether or not his seat in this body was bought?

I have not anything personal against Mr. Newberry. I would not permit my personal friendship or sympathy for any man to lead me to vote to clothe him with power in this body to pass upon questions that affect the destiny not only of the living but of the millions yet unborn in my country. I owe it to those living and to those yet to come to guard, as best I can, while I am here this sacred institution from the venal and corrupt use of money in politics.

There is nothing personal in it. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], like the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], like the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who is going to address this body against Mr. Newberry, like the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and other Senators whom I could name on the other side of the Chamber, is against him because he believes he bought his seat. He is against him because he is convinced by the testimony that he is not entitled to a seat here as a United States Senator—and he is not. Are you going to say by your vote that he is? Such a vote is not justified by the testimony. Do not you know that if he were entitled to a seat here, Senators KENYON, BORAH, NORRIS, and other Republican Senators now bitterly opposing him would be fighting for him to-day?

If certain Senators over there do not want to read my speech and the speeches of Senators POMERENE, WALSH of Montana, and MCKELLAR, I invite you to read the speech of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. I invite you to come here when the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] speaks.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] can not dodge this issue by insinuating that there are those on this side of the Chamber who do not like Newberry and are just his bitter enemies. It is not a question of personal feeling at all. It is a matter of conscience. It is a matter of conviction. It is a matter of doing our duty by the Senate and living up to the oath that we took when we came here. It is a matter of courage as much as anything else. I know that when you fight the big money interests, when you fight Wall Street, you are fighting a big interest in this country.

The boys knew, when they went abroad to fight, that they were fighting a dangerous foe. They were fighting the greatest war machinery that ever appeared upon this earth in all the tide of time, but that did not keep them back. They did what their forefathers have done from the North and the South, from the days when the ragged Continental Army followed Washington over the frozen ground at Valley Forge down to the Battle of the Marne and in the Argonne Forest and on all the other hard-fought battle fields of France. They lived up to their duty. They died fighting for the principles they believed in, fighting for the honor of their country, fighting for victory for the flag. They never faltered. There was no money influence in the world that could cause them to break rank and retreat in the hour of danger and death in France.

This is the Republic they fought to save. This is the Republic that thousands of them died to save. What are we going to do toward saving it? God help every Senator here to put his hand upon his heart and swear by all that is sacred that he will not betray his trust and vote to place seats in the Senate upon a bargain counter.

Mr. SPENCER obtained the floor.

Mr. NEW. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

CONFIRMATION OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY HOMER ELLIOTT.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement, under which we are operating, we can not have an executive session with closed doors. There is this condition relating to one nomination on the calendar, and that is for the office of United States district attorney at Indianapolis. The nomination has been unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. The present incumbent has resigned, his resignation to take effect January 7, and that resignation has been accepted. Unless the confirmation of his successor is had to-day, there will be a hiatus and the district will be without a district attorney.

Therefore, if there is no objection, upon that statement of fact I ask that the nomination of Mr. Homer Elliott to be United States district attorney for the district of Indiana be confirmed in open executive session.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as I understood a moment ago, in a conference with the Senator from Indiana on this subject, the term of the present United States district attorney has expired, and this is to fill a new term.

Mr. NEW. I will state the condition, and I make this statement in order that there may be no misunderstanding on that point. There have been three Democratic incumbents in the office. The first was Mr. Frank Z. Dailey, who was commissioned on the 7th day of January, eight years ago. He served for about three years of his term and resigned. Mr. L. Ert Slack was appointed to succeed him, and after having served about three years he resigned. Mr. Frederick Van Nuys was appointed to succeed Mr. Slack, and he has now served two years, so that on January 7 the three Democrats will have occupied that office for eight full years. We have not attempted to disturb them before the expiration of the full eight years.

The understanding between myself and the present district attorney is completely harmonious. There are no differences. It is not a forced resignation.

Mr. POMERENE. There is no objection on his part?

Mr. NEW. No; there is no objection on his part.

Mr. HEFLIN. This is not the district attorney for Michigan?

Mr. NEW. It is not; it is for the district of Indiana.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is the name of the candidate?

Mr. NEW. Homer Elliott.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection to his confirmation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate go into open executive session for the purpose of considering the nomination?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business in open executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the confirmation of Homer Elliott, of Indiana, to be United States district attorney for the district of Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate advises and consents to the nomination.

Mr. NEW. I ask that the President be notified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The President will be notified of the confirmation of Mr. Elliott; and the Senate resumes its legislatitve session.

LABOR CONDITIONS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, on the 22d of December, the day upon which the Senate adjourned for the Christmas holidays, the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], in the course of a speech which he made, quoted an article which had appeared the preceding day in the Washington Times, in which certain statements were made regarding the condition of about 2,000 people in a community in the State of West Virginia, saying among other things that they were actually starving.

The speech of the Senator from Arizona was not printed in the RECORD until January 4. So I had no opportunity to know just exactly what was said, but I heard that some such statement had been made.

During the holidays I wired to the governor of West Virginia asking him to cause a thorough investigation to be made of conditions there and to advise me of the actual conditions, for the information of the Senate and for the information of the country.

I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate a letter setting forth the results of the governor's investigation and a telegram upon the same subject. I will not ask that they be read, as the hour is late.

I will add that I am quite sure the distinguished and very able Senator from Arizona did not intentionally mean to give currency to reports about my State which were exaggerated. I am sure he was misled by the article which appeared in the paper, which apparently was not based upon facts.

I wish also to say in the same connection that there is considerable unemployment in portions of West Virginia, just as there is considerable unemployment in other portions of the country. The conditions to which the article referred were supposed to be current in the coal region. In and about the coal mines, which in many instances are isolated, when the mines shut down there are no other means of employment at hand, and, of course, sometimes distress occurs. However, I am informed by those who are in close touch with the situation that there has been no suffering which has not been taken care of by the relief agencies in the counties in which those conditions may have existed, and that the conditions themselves had been very greatly exaggerated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter and telegram will be printed in the RECORD:

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Charleston, December 13, 1921.

Hon. HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
Member United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SUTHERLAND: I acknowledge receipt of your wire of the 28th instant, requesting information concerning reports that men, women, and children in certain West Virginia mining communities were destitute and in a starving condition.

Frankly, let me say that these reports, in so far as I have been able to determine from investigations which I caused to be initiated, are grossly exaggerated and are, seemingly, the product of imaginative minds of interested propagandists who are desirous of distorting conditions that exist in mining communities as a result of a depression in the coal industry and differences arising from the maintenance of contracts between employers and employees.

Senator ASHURST undoubtedly is misinformed as to conditions in West Virginia, and I regret very much that in a public forum he should give credence, even by publicity, to reports which he did not investigate and which are designed to injure a State and reflect upon the character of her people. Certainly if he were acquainted with the people of West Virginia he would not harbor a thought or entertain a doubt for an instant that they would permit a single family to suffer from privation while there was plenty about them. No more charitable people inhabit any State than those who live in West Virginia. There have been many untruths told about West Virginia, but none has been calculated to do more harm than the one that our people have permitted communities to starve. It is an aspersion on their character that they rightfully resent.

While there has been a depression in the coal industry and in many other forms of industry continuing for several months, this depression has been of a general nature and is as true of other States where coal is mined in commercial quantities as of West Virginia.

During the depression that has existed throughout the country, West Virginia has been one of the most favored of States and her unemployment has been much less a serious problem here than in many of her sister States, because of the diversity of industries found here. The unemployment in the whole of West Virginia has been less than in some of the cities of the country.

It is true that scattering cases of poverty have been discovered, but the welfare agencies find these cases even in times of general prosperity. And it is equally true that there has been no suffering in this State during the present depression which the local authorities or the local welfare agencies have been unable to alleviate.

When reports of suffering in the mining communities in the New River district reached me I immediately dispatched the State labor commissioner, George F. Daugherty, to the communities where suffering was reported to exist. From Fayette County I secured a personal report from Dr. S. Price, chairman of the Fayette Chapter of the American Red Cross. Their reports were substantially the same—that the reports of distressing conditions were not of a serious nature, and that the county authorities and Red Cross were prepared to give aid in any case of distress or suffering.

At my instance Labor Commissioner Daugherty also visited Raleigh County in the New River district, from whence had come similar reports of suffering. A local committee, consisting of Sheriff P. L. Blankenship, A. H. Matheny, overseer of poor, and Ralph G. Hess, editor of the Raleigh Herald, visited a number of families reported to be destitute. This committee, in its report to the governor, says:

"In no instance did we find a family starving and in every case we found they had food, enough to last for several days. To be sure, Christmas was perhaps not as bright as it might have been had the men been working, but there was no dire necessity anywhere. Mr. Matheny is and has been overseer of the poor for the past 11 years and is familiar with conditions in and about Beckley. He reports that no condition exists but that can be well taken care of locally."

The Kiwanis Club of Beckley also appointed a committee, consisting of J. L. Lineweaver, W. H. Rardin, and H. F. Willfong, to cooperate with similar committees from churches and other organizations to investigate conditions and give relief to destitute families. This committee in its report to me says:

"The undersigned committee, acting in connection with committees from some of the churches of Beckley and the King's Daughters, made a careful investigation in Beckley and a number of mining towns near Beckley, including Raleigh, Mabscott, Wickham, Riley, and some others, and found a number of families that were without means to provide for their children for Christmas as they had been in the habit of doing, and this committee purchased and distributed candies and other things for Christmas to about 57 families, in which there were about a total of 281 individuals. Out of the families visited and investigated this committee only found about three or four families that would have been in destitute circumstances if they had not been given relief by their near neighbors. Among the families visited a number of them, where they had had sickness or for other reasons had needed help, had received help from the county, and a number of them had been helped regularly by their churches and the King's Daughters of Beckley.

"This committee wishes to further state that if at any time any person knows of any families in Raleigh County that are suffering for the necessities of life, if they will report to this committee, means will be provided for their relief. This committee further reports that, while money is not as plentiful in Raleigh County as it was when work was plentiful and wages high, we believe from our investigation that under present conditions all who are able and willing to work can have work and sufficient wages to support his family."

I believe these reports will be sufficient to dispel any belief that there has been wholesale destitution in West Virginia and that the people of this State are uncharitable.

Very truly, yours,

E. F. MORGAN, Governor.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., January 4, 1922.

HON. HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

My reference in letter of 31st instant to Fayette County is to Minden in particular. Investigations made there by labor commissioner, county authorities, and Red Cross chapter, who found reports of suffering grossly misrepresented.

E. F. MORGAN, Governor.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 7, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate January 6, 1922.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

Homer Elliott to be United States attorney, district of Indiana.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 6, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Spirit of God, our guide and guardian be. Make every path of duty plain, and quicken us with an ardent hope and strong desire to do Thy will. May our gratitude rise to Thee as the breath of holy incense off the altars of our hearts. O give us this day the rich blessing of Thy presence, and may this be pledge of Thy fatherhood and a token of Thy love in a world without end. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a brief article prepared by Hon. S. C. Padelford, of Fort Worth, Tex., on the unconstitutionality of the antilynching bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the article referred to:

WHAT OF THE PROPOSED FEDERAL LAW AGAINST LYNCHING?

[By Hon. S. C. Padelford, Fort Worth, Tex.]

From statements in the newspapers, there is now pending in Congress a bill which provides for the punishment of five or more parties who may have been engaged in a lynching, fixing the punishment of the parties engaged, and also assessing a penalty of $10,000 against the county in which such lynching occurred.

According to the Constitution of the United States as originally adopted, the States delegated to the Federal Government only that portion of sovereignty originally held by the States which affects interstate, national, and foreign affairs and matters, and all other sovereignty not so delegated was reserved unto the States. In order that this construction of the Constitution might not be doubtful, the tenth amendment was adopted, which provides "that the powers not granted to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people thereof."

Under the original Constitution and the tenth amendment thereof, all police powers not delegated to the Federal Government for the purposes mentioned above are expressly reserved unto the States or the people thereof. Since then, by amendment, especially the eighteenth, some of the States' police power which does not relate to national, interstate, or foreign matters, has been delegated to the Federal Government, and also under certain decisions of the courts the police powers which formerly were considered as belonging solely to the States have been assumed by the Federal Government.

All crimes not relating to interstate, national, or foreign matters were originally held to be reserved unto the States and each State had jurisdiction to punish all crimes, with the exception above, committed in a State until the adoption of the eighteenth and other amendments. Under the eighteenth amendment the Federal Government has jurisdiction to punish the illegal keeping or selling of intoxicating liquors, though committed within a locality situated altogether within a State and though having no connection whatsoever with interstate, national, or foreign affairs.

This proposed bill, in effect, punishes a local murder if committed by a combination of five individuals or more, and it levies a penalty of $10,000 against the county in which a lynching may occur.

In accordance with the doctrine as established by our Supreme Court for more than a century this bill, if correctly quoted, is directly in conflict with the Federal Constitution, and especially with the tenth amendment. In the Seventh Wallace, 700, Chief Justice Chase, speaking for the court, in giving the character of our dual government, states that "it is an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States."

If Congress can pass a criminal law punishing five or more persons who have combined and committed murder wholly within a State, then it can punish one party who commits murder wholly within a State and which has no connection whatsoever with interstate, national, or foreign affairs. If Congress can pass a law punishing murder, it can pass a law punishing every crime in the catalogue of State crimes, and thereby assume and take from the States all of their police power to punish local and State offenses or to exercise any other sovereign power. There has been for years past a tendency for the Federal Government to continually extend its powers and infringe upon the sovereignty of the States, but this proposed law is the most far-reaching, extreme, drastic, and dangerous exercise of power by Congress which has heretofore been attempted, and its effect, if exercised, would so extend the Federal jurisdiction as to assume and comprehend all sovereignty now exercised by the States, and thus destroy the States, and by thus destroying the States destroy the Union by forming a consolidated empire, without any limitation whatsoever upon its exercise of sovereignty.

If the States should resume all sovereignty which was originally delegated by the States to the Union, and thus acquire all sovereignty, each State would become an unlimited sovereign empire and we would have 48 independent sovereign governments and the Union would be dissolved and destroyed.

The power of the States thus to destroy the Union by resuming unto themselves all sovereignty has been settled by the arbitrament of arms adversely to the right of the States to exercise this unlimited power.

Early in the history of our Federal Government the Federal Supreme Court established the principle that the power to tax is a power to destroy. The States can not tax the Federal Government, its officers, or agencies, because such a power carries with it the power to destroy. Neither can the Federal Government tax the States or their officers or agencies, because such a power carries with it the power to destroy the States, and the State governments are just as indestructible as the Federal Government is indissoluble.

If the power to tax is a power to destroy, the power to levy a penalty against a State or an agency of the State is equally a power to destroy. If the Federal Government can assess a penalty against a county, which is an agency and part of the State government, it can levy such a penalty against the whole State itself. It has no more power to assess a penalty against a part of a State than upon the whole. If Congress can levy a penalty of $10,000 against a county, then it can levy a penalty of millions and billions of dollars against each and every State and thereby destroy the States, and by destroying the States dissolve and destroy the Union.

The principal excuse given for the passage of this law is that the States have failed to execute its laws punishing lynching and other crimes. This is the first time in the history of our Government where the failure of the States to properly exercise the exclusive sovereignty reserved by them is claimed to delegate to the Federal Government the sovereignty thus not effectively exercised by the States. If this be a ground of jurisdiction, then Congress can claim that because the States have failed to exercise and carry into effect any or all of the sovereignty reserved by them delegates and confers jurisdiction upon Congress and authorizes the Federal Government to assume this power and exercise it instead of the States.

The financial and money powers of this Government have gradually been and are now being mobilized and concentered in the Northeast and at present the Federal Government is under the control of this heartless power, and should all sovereignty, according to the principle of the bill proposed, be assumed by the Federal Government, then this moneyed power having control of the sovereignty of the greatest Nation upon earth will gradually reduce the great mass of the people to industrial slavery. If the moneyed power can concentrate and control the sovereignty of the whole people, then the welfare and the liberty of all is in jeopardy.

As long as the States retain this sovereignty it can not be mobilized and centered in the Northeast, or in the hands of any section or class, but will remain with and under the control of the people.

This principle of divided sovereignty, the larger portion of which is partitioned among the States, lies at the foundation of our social system and is that principle which has preserved our liberties and made us what we are and have been. The principle underlying this proposed law and its effect will be and is the concentration at Washington of all sovereignty, to destroy the States, dissolve the Union, and change the form of our government, under which the people of the United States have grown happier, greater, and stronger in a shorter space of time than any other people during the ages past.

If the States can not resume the sovereignty originally delegated to the Federal Government by them and thus destroy the Union, then it is as impossible for the Federal Government to assume all of the sovereignty thus reserved unto the States or the people, and likewise as certainly destroy the Union. If the States can not by the resumption of this power destroy the Union, and if such an attempt on the part of the States would be a political crime, then equally is the Federal Government powerless, by the assumption of all the sovereignty reserved by the States, to likewise destroy the Union. If one is a political crime, the other is equally as great a political crime.

It therefore behooves the people of Texas, and of every other State, to see to it that the State laws against murder and every other crime are surely, certainly, and promptly executed, so that no such excuse can or shall be claimed for such dangerous extension and exercise of the sovereign power by the Federal Government.

Lynching of a party by a mob composed of five or any other number is simply murder, and it is the bounden duty of this and every other State to exercise all of its sovereign power if necessary to preserve the lives, the liberty, and the property of each and every individual. There are two great enemies to our free institutions, the one is the mob and the other the monopoly. Both are equally the enemies of our liberties, our prosperity, and our happiness; they are the twin ogres which are threatening our system of independent dual governments, founded upon the principle of two separate representative democracies, acting independently of each other, but both comprising the exercise of all sovereignty necessary and proper to the true purposes of the greatest and freest Government upon earth. It is to be hoped that the Members of Congress, by enacting this proposed law, will not prostitute the welfare of our common country to the interest of party and place partisanship above patriotism.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by presenting an argument in support of a bill that I introduced on yesterday to regulate the procedure in the Supreme Court and regulate generally the matter of the aggression of the Federal power.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the argument referred to:

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct my remarks to the dangerous tendency of centralizing authority in Washington in the hands of the Federal Government. In order to check one method of centralization and one manifestation of the concentration of power I have introduced a bill requiring that at least seven of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States must concur in their opinion that an act of Congress or a statute of a State legislature is unconstitutional before the court can declare such act or statute to be void for unconstitutionality.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

The first question that must present itself is the constitutionality of this proposed act of Congress itself. Is it constitutionally proper for Congress to prescribe the vote in the Supreme Court as to its decisions or as to some of its decisions? I think the gentlemen will resolve this question in the affirmative when they recall it is always competent for the legislative authority to prescribe the rules of practice and procedure prevailing in courts of all degree. The Constitution of the United States merely provides that there shall be a Supreme Court, but does not prescribe the number of justices nor any of the procedure respecting same. Accordingly the Congress from the very first prescribed the mode and manner of taking appeals by either writs of error or certiorari from the inferior United States courts and from the highest courts of appeal within the several States. Furthermore, Congress has prescribed the terms of the court, and has prescribed what shall constitute a quorum of the court, and the proposed legislation merely seeks to prescribe the quorum of the courts as to decision on constitutional questions. In other words, Congress could prescribe that the Supreme Court should not have any session nor attend to any business unless all nine members of the court are present. So Congress can prescribe that at least seven members of the court must agree that an act of Congress or a statute of a State is in conflict with the fundamental law before it can be held void on that ground.

THE REASON FOR THE BILL.

The next question is as to the necessity and wisdom of the proposed legislation. I respectfully call the attention of Congress to the fact that many hundreds of State statutes and acts of Congress have been declared unconstitutional, and in nearly all of the cases the court has been almost evenly divided. Only quite recently, on December 19, 1921, the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of William Truax et al. against Michael Corrigan et al. held and declared to be void a statute of the State of Arizona by the usual ratio of five to four. In this connection I will call the attention of Congress later on to the history in the Supreme Court of the United States of the case of Pollock v. Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429), decided in 1894. In the last-named case the court had under consideration the constitutionality of an income tax law the same in principle as had been in existence from time to time since the year 1794. The decision of the court would have been in favor of the constitutionality, except for the fact that one of the judges changed his mind and tipped the balances by the narrow margin of five to four against the constitutionality of a long list of congressional acts.

LET THE COURTS RESPECT THEMSELVES.

We hear much said about lawlessness and about the lack of respect by the people for laws and for the courts, and the criticisms are justified. But I call the attention of Congress and of the country to the lack of respect by the majority of the court for the minority of the court. Courts approach the consideration of the constitutionality of a statute with the declared major premise that the act is presumed to be constitutional and must be found to be unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt in order to justify a court in frustrating the solemn deed of a coordinate branch of the Government. And yet in the face of this fundamental proposition we find five members of the court holding that State statutes and acts of Congress are unconstitutional, while four members of the same court file vigorous and logical dissenting opinions, arguing that these legislative acts are constitutional. We therefore have a right to ask why it is that the learned and laborious dissenting opinions do not raise a reasonable doubt in the minds of the majority. This five to four ratio is becoming a serious question in the minds of the thinking people in the country. The effect is that one man, the fifth member of the majority, is exercising the power to overthrow the will of Congress and the approval of the President, who voices the majority of more than 100,000,000 people. So it is fair to say that it is one man against at least 51,000,000 people. So in the case of appeals from the highest courts in the States. The average population of the 48 States is more than 2,000,000 people. When the Supreme Court of the United States by a five to four division holds the statutes of a State to be unconstitutional, then we have the case of one man tilting the balances and declaring null and void the solemn will of a clear majority of more than 2,000,000 people, and here again we have a ratio of one man against more than a million people.

DOES NOT DESTROY BUT PRESERVES THE COURT'S POWER.

I concede that partisan zeal and prejudice from various causes may result in acts of Congress and statutes of States that are unconstitutional, and in such case there should be power vested in the courts so to declare. But the principles of the Constitution and of constitutional interpretation have been thoroughly understood for more than 125 years. There is no excuse for a five to four decision. If the Constitution has been violated by an act of Congress or of a State legislature, that violation ought to be so manifest that at least seven judges out of nine can see it and declare it. In fact, it would not be so unreasonable to require a unanimous decision on the proper construction of a Constitution which has constantly been before the courts for more than 125 years, as it is to require the unanimous verdict by a jury which hears parole testimony from conflicting witnesses.

And yet we will not convict a bootlegger or a petty thief without a unanimous verdict, and at the same time we allow the Supreme Court of the United States by a five to four decision to declare the solemn will of the whole American people speaking through Congress, consisting of 533 men, at least 80 per cent of whom are lawyers and have taken a solemn oath to protect and defend the Constitution without mental reservation or equivocation, to be utterly null and void. At the same time by this five to four ratio the sovereign will of the people of a State with regard to matters of internal policy is set aside. It seems only necessary to call the attention of the country to this particular situation without enlarging upon its dangers or explaining how hostile it is to the ideals of democratic institutions.

The following extract, beginning at page 220 of "Federal Usurpation," by Franklin Pierce, published in 1908, is a very interesting comment upon the history of a very important line of decisions in the Supreme Court. The Wilson revenue bill having imposed a tax on all incomes of more than $4,000, the constitutionality of that tax was attacked:

The constitutionality of this act, so far as it imposed a duty upon incomes, was contested in the United States Supreme Court in a suit in equity by one Pollock against the Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429) to prevent a threatened breach of trust by the defendant in the misapplication or diversion of its funds by the illegal payment from its capital of the income tax on its profits. Pollock was a stockholder of the defendant, and he alleged that they threatened to pay the tax and thus impair his interest, and as the payment would result in a multiplicity of suits that he asked an injunction from the equity court enjoining the defendant from paying the tax. It was the claim of the plaintiff that the income tax was a direct tax, and therefore must be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, and could not be imposed as a duty, impost, or excise uniformly throughout the United States upon annual incomes.

By the act of June 5, 1794, Congress laid a tax upon carriages for the conveyance of persons, and the question whether this was a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution was decided at that time by the United States Supreme Court, Hilton v. United States (3 Dallas, 171). Mr. Justice Wilson, who was one of the most prominent members of the convention framing the Constitution, Mr. Justice Chase, one of the ablest jurists of his time, Mr. Justice Patterson, and Mr. Justice Iredell, sitting in that court at that time, each expressed the reasons for their conclusions holding that the tax was an indirect tax or duty. Mr. Justice Patterson, who read the principal opinion, said: "I never entertained a doubt that the principal, I will not say the only, objects that the framers of the Constitution contemplated as falling within the rule of apportionment, were a capitation tax and a tax on land." This case had been cited by every textbook writer on the Constitution from that time until the Pollock case as holding exclusively that a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution was only a poll or capitation tax, or a tax directly upon real estate, and that all other taxes were indirect taxes, duties, imposts, or excises. For over a hundred years the United States Government had thus construed the law.

Commencing with 1798 and extending down to 1816 five income taxes had been imposed, and in every one of those cases the Government had followed the decision in the Hilton case, the assumption being that that decision had settled the law for this country. From 1861 to 1870 eight different statutes imposing taxes on income arising from both real estate and personal property had been enacted. Literally hundreds of millions of dollars had been taken from the taxpayers through income taxes of the same nature as the provision in the Wilson bill. In Springer v. United States (102 U. S., 586), a case decided in 1884, the question of the validity of one of the Civil War income taxes was involved. Springer was assessed on his professional earnings and on the interest of United States bonds. He refused to pay, and, his real estate consequently being sold, the suit involved the validity of the tax as a basis for the sale. The United States Supreme Court held the tax valid.

Notwithstanding this hundred years of unbroken history in its courts and in all of the departments of the Government, recognizing that a direct tax meant only a poll tax or tax on real estate, the United States Supreme Court by a majority of five to four declared the provision of the Wilson bill unconstitutional. On April 8, 1895, a partial decision of the case was made, in which the court, consisting of eight members only, was evenly divided as to the constitutionality of the tax imposed upon an income from personal property, but a majority of the court determined that the tax was unconstitutional as to the provision on incomes from real estate and municipal bonds. A final decision on the constitutionality of the law as regards personalty was deferred owing to the absence from illness of Mr. Justice Jackson. A few weeks later the court rendered its decision, but in the meantime Mr. Justice Shiras, who on April 8 had been favorable to the constitutionality of the law as to personal property, had changed his opinion; so on May 20 the whole act was declared unconstitutional, Justices Harlan, Brown, Jackson, and White dissenting.

What do you call this but judicial juggling with supreme power? It smacks of the quality of historical romance of how Rome was saved by the cackling of geese, of how overeating caused Napoleon to lose the field of Waterloo, of how the stumbling of William the Conqueror, as he stepped on English soil, was symbolic of coming victory. Constitutional liberty can not permanently play such a game of hide and seek.

ONLY PART OF GENERAL TENDENCY.

But the tendency to have State legislation reviewed in the Supreme Court of the United States is but one tendency toward the accumulation of all governmental power into Federal hands. The minority in the various States, especially the extreme reactionary element, seems determined to bring every progressive piece of legislation under the review of the Supreme Court of the United States in the hope of having the same declared to be unconstitutional, on the ground that the same is charged with violating the fourteenth amendment with respect to due process of law and equality of laws. Now, what is due process and what is equality of laws? While many definitions have been made, they are all elastic, expansive, and variable, and some of them equivocal, so that with each case that comes before the Supreme Court of the United States where a State statute is attacked on these grounds there is no hard-and-fast rule, but it resolves itself into a question before each member of the court, "In your opinion does this statute afford due process of law, or does it deny equality of protection under the laws?" And the answer to this question can be so easily influenced by the subjective sympathy and mental predilection of the members of the court. It is so easy to say, "I do not like any such legislation. It is too radical. Its logical consequence might upset my personal vested interests in another State. My social intimates do not approve of such legislation. My whole practice at the bar was in opposition to such legislation. My view of economic solidarity is in conflict with such legislation. My ethical conceptions are violated by such legislation. Therefore, while there is no hard and fast constitutional rule binding me, I vote to declare the statute of the State unconstitutional."

SEVEN TO TWO IS REASONABLE—FIVE TO FOUR IS NOT.

It is not unreasonable that seven justices of the court should be required to agree before they can set aside the sovereign will either of the Nation or of the State. To allow a dissent of two justices is more than ample to take care of the personal equation and individual idiosyncrasies. It is hard to get all men to agree upon any one proposition, but it ought not to be difficult for seven out of nine men learned in the law, who have been familiar with the Constitution of the United States and its correct interpretation anywhere from 25 years to 50 years each, to agree that the statute of the legislative body which directly expresses the will of the people is in violation of the fundamental principles of the Government as expressed in the Constitution. The spirit of the Constitution is the Constitution. The validity of statutes solemnly enacted by the legislative bodies should not be destroyed by verbal quibbling and sophistical dialectics.

ANOTHER DANGEROUS FEDERAL AGGRESSION.

In this connection I further call the attention of the Congress and the country to the vast powers now centralized in the Executive branch of the Federal Government. We find from the latest report of the Civil Service Commission that there are nearly 600,000 civilian employees on the pay rolls of the Federal Government, and every one of these persons is dependent directly or indirectly, legally or practically, upon the political sympathy of the Chief Executive. The President has the appointment under the law of about 15,000 public officials. Such power is stupendous and is full of danger. Remember that 150,000 members of the Army and 100,000 members of the Navy are also under the direct control of the President, so that you have three-fourths of a million persons under the Constitution as it exists to-day who may be influenced very powerfully by the will of the President. Our country has been blessed with good and patriotic men to guide her as President, but we must not ignore the lessons of history. Remember the history of France and the history of Germany as it has manifested itself within the memory of men now living. The Republic of France, 60 years after the great revolution, was overthrown by Napoleon III while he was President of that Republic, and yet the "Little Napoleon" did not have within his hands the same relative power that the President of the United States enjoys. And so in Germany, before the iron hand of Bismarck had molded the several German States into a consolidated empire, there was liberty, there was a spirit of democracy, there was a spirit of progress, but when this accumulated power came into the hands of a vigorous and ambitious man such as William II we find militarism and imperialism lording it over the rights and liberties of civilians, and having made all Germany an armed camp and being filled with the pride of power and drunk with ambition we find the whole nation following the "Kaiser" in a mad dash to conquer the world. Who can say but that in time to come a powerful and ambitious man may become President of this great Republic, and if such ever is the case it would be too great a temptation for him to find in his hands such enormous power. While camouflaging his ambitious schemes behind a pretended crusade for the strengthening and enriching of a Nation he could perfect his plans and by an opportune coup d'état perpetuate himself in power and make puppets of the people who hitherto have been independent and patriotic.

ALL MONEY IN CIRCULATION REQUIRED TO PAY TAXES.

The effect of aggression of power in Federal hands is nowhere better illustrated than by the increase in the national budget. It seems but a few years since the country was shocked by the announcement that the annual budget was $1,000,000,000. And yet to-day, in peace times, the annual budget is more than four and a half billion dollars, and if we deduct the interest on the debt incurred by the World War the annual budget will still be nearly $4,000,000,000. This multiplication by four of the expenditures of the National Government illustrates how swiftly the activities of the National Government have multiplied and enlarged. By way of comparison, we find that the revenues to support the State governments of all the 48 States and all the township governments within the States and all the municipalities within the States and all the school districts within the States aggregate less than one-half of the total expenses of the National Government, and in this connection it is interesting to note that taxation by both the National Government and the State governments, directly and through their various subdivisions, is becoming so voluminous, so huge, that even if every dollar of money in circulation amongst the people in all the country were to pass through the tax collector's hands once a year it would not be sufficient to pay the expenses of our dual system of government. It takes more than $6,000,000,000 a year to pay for the National Government and the State governments and their various subdivisions, and yet there is less than $6,000,000,000 in circulation, including specie, Treasury notes, greenbacks, gold certificates, silver certificates, Federal reserve notes, and every other form of money. The result is that if all the hundred million people had every dollar pass through their hands to pay the same over once a year to the taxgatherer, still the tax demands would not be satisfied.

AS NATIONAL POWER RISES STATE POWER FALLS.

My opposition to the concentration of so much power in the administrative bureaus in Washington grows out of the fact that it spells a corresponding diminution of power in the States. The enlargement of one means the shrinking of the other. My views are not based upon tradition or sectional prejudice or historic schisms. My views are based upon grounds of public policy. They grow out of a conception of government, and are developed in the light of our historic experience. Those who framed our system of government were not inspired, but they were truly wise men. It was no accident that their work provoked that great encomium spoken by William E. Gladstone. They had had experience through the trying years of the Revolution. They had helped to establish republican institutions in the 13 several States, and had erected governments therein founded upon written constitutions. They had studied the science of government as taught by Locke and Montesquieu. They had studied the history of the great republics, ancient and modern, and they came together with the deliberate purpose of establishing a more perfect union, to insure domestic tranquillity, to provide for the common defense, and to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity. How well they have accomplished those aims is manifested by the marvelous development of this country since that day in every direction. Our territory has been multiplied many times; our population has grown with our territory; and our institutions have expanded to the changing circumstances of science and civilization. Though it took more than half a century of debate and discussion and four years of civil war to settle forever in the minds of all the people the proper constitutional status of the States within the Union, yet that status is established and has solemnly been declared time and time again to be "an indestructible union of indestructible States."

THE STATES INSURE LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Now, the existence of 48 States, with the power reserved to them under the Federal Constitution to legislate upon the mass of domestic concerns, is the chief guaranty to the people of this Union of the right of local self-government. Local self-government is the inheritance of all Anglo-Saxon people; it is the nursery of Anglo-Saxon liberty; it is the school of Anglo-Saxon citizenship; it is the source of our American strength. There is danger in solidifying government: The minority, which might consist of more than 50,000,000 people, would be too large and too well organized to submit freely and easily to the domination of a majority. But when this minority of 50,000,000 people is broken up into 48 different fractions, and where the people in the 48 different States are divided perhaps upon 48 different questions, cooperation amongst these minorities will be practically impossible, and the general submission to the will of the majority is accomplished. Furthermore, with a consolidated Republic seeking to legislate upon myriads of matters relating to life, liberty, and property, it would be impossible to frame general legislation so as to take care of the diverse rights, the multifarious interests, and the varying feelings of the people in all parts of the country. We must remember that people are more concerned about laws and their administration as they relate to the intimate domestic relations and business concerns than they are about national affairs. Therefore the people might easily become aroused and angered and enraged beyond the point of control by nation-wide legislation affecting the status of marriage, or the relation of parent and child, or of master and servant, or of employer and employee. But where these matters are legislated upon in 48 different States, this feeling is broken up into 48 different fractions and the ship of State goes on without feeling the slightest tremor of excitement. Rome recognized the necessity of letting her colonial Provinces and her subject peoples live under their traditional laws. Great Britain, with her far-flung Empire, recognizes the same principle. We see her to-day voluntarily voting autonomy for a part of the United Kingdom, and giving to the Irish people the chance to be governed by their own representatives. There is much diversity in this Nation between the cavalier of Virginia and the frontiersman of those great new empire States of the West. There is a great difference between the modern New England puritan and the Latin peoples of Louisiana and other Southwestern States. There is a difference between the all-white population of the Northern and Northwestern States and the biracial populations of the Southern States. There is a difference between the population of the East with the large percentage of foreigners and the native-born American population of the South. Nation-wide legislation can not properly regulate such a diverse people if it applies to the matters that come home to the breasts and bosoms of men, to the domestic and business affairs of the people.

THE STATES AS "INSULATED CHAMBERS" OF EXPERIMENT.

The 48 States pursue their several ways in the development of government, constituting a great experiment station for each other. One State enacts novel and so-called radical legislation, and if the same is a failure the other 47 States are unhurt; but if the same proves wise and progressive, the other 47 States may profit by the example. In this connection I quote an extract from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in the case already referred to of Truax against Corrigan, decided on December 19, 1921, as follows:

I must add one general consideration. There is nothing that I more deprecate than the use of the fourteenth amendment beyond the absolute compulsion of its words to prevent the making of social experiments that an important part of the community desires, in the insulated chambers afforded by the several States, even though the experiments may seem futile or even noxious to me and to those whose judgment I most respect.

THE STATES AND NATION AS MUTUAL CHECKS.

The checks and balances established by the Federal Constitution within the Federal Government itself have often been commended as the agencies for restraining the radical and revolutionary spirit that seems to rise periodically in the breasts of the people. But the establishment of the Federal system whereby the National Government is restrained within the sphere marked out by the Federal Constitution and all the rest of sovereign power confined to the several States is a masterpiece in the way of creating checks and balances. It is entirely within the bounds of our history to say that the Federal Government at times comes under the domination and control of ultraradical sentiment and at other times under ultrareactionary control and domination. For illustration: It usually happens that while the Federal Government is under control of some dominant passion about one-half of the State governments remain dominated by contrary ideas and governmental policy. Under such conditions assume there be no restraint and boundary to the powers that Congress may exercise and that the other branches of Government may exercise in the administration of congressional legislation, then you will find legislation of ultraradical and idealistic policies enacted by Congress, and through the breach now proposed to be made in the defenses of State rights such congressional legislation will be driven into the States themselves, and the States (which are still the citadels of conservatism) will by Federal power be forced into the line and ranks of the radicals.

Gentlemen who advocate such legislation as this, which breaks down the barriers of State rights, should take a second thought and contemplate a change of conditions, and must remember that if this antilynching bill passes and is sustained, it will be recorded for precedent "and many an error by the same example will rush into the State." Each State has always cherished, and I believe still cherishes, the right and power to control such internal matters as domestic relations—husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, employer and employees, landlord and tenant, and the thousands of intricate relations growing out of these. Once make an opening into the walls of defense that for more than 125 years have preserved to the States their individuality, their integrity, and their right of local self-government, and you may soon expect an invasion into the domain of State control for other reasons and upon other pretexts. It will be complained, for example, that some State is too conservative in the matters of master and servant and congressional legislation will be invoked to force that State into conformity with the social and economic ideals of a majority in Congress.

HOW THE STATES AND THE NATION MUTUALLY ACT AND REACT.

But, on the other hand, preserve to the States their constitutional power and even if the Federal Government does for a time fall into the hands of the ultraradical or the ultraconservative, still about one-half of the States will continue to be the strongholds of the contrary ideas, and from these strongholds may sally forth the champions of their cause and by reason thereof in a few years a majority of the people of the whole Nation may be convinced that a change of administration in the National Government is desirable. By reason of this condition, we may fairly expect slow but continuous progress in our republican institutions. It was Aristotle who said that a monarchy is a swift sailboat that outruns all the other barks upon the seas, but if perchance it goes upon the breakers, it is a complete wreck. On the contrary, a democracy is a raft where all the people may ride safely, though slowly, and with their feet constantly in the water. Our forefathers wisely adopted the idea of a raft as the pattern for our ship of state. We will progress slowly but surely, if we keep to the standards of our fathers. Let it be our aim, as it was the aim of "our old mother beyond the seas," from whom we brought the ideals and traditions of Anglo-Saxon liberty, to be "a land of settled government, of just and old renown, where freedom broadens slowly down from precedent to precedent."

CITIZENSHIP OF STATES AND NATION THE SAME.

And then let us in all fairness ask ourselves, "How can it be that ultimately and permanently Federal administration of law may be more efficient and effective in preventing crime than State administration of law? Are not the Federal judges and the jurors of the Federal court the same sort of men, of the same blood and bone, of the same teachings, the same traditions, as are the State judges and the State jurors? In fact, are not the people of the United States at one and the same time the people of all of the several States? Can it be that a man as a citizen of the United States is nobler and stronger and more law-abiding than that same man is in his capacity as a citizen of his mother State?" No government can rise above its source, which is the people. There is no magic, nor majesty, nor imperial virtue merely in Federal laws or Federal officials. Distance may have lent enchantment to some people in remote sections and they may think that Federal lawmakers and Federal judges are supermen, but we who have a close-up vision of these same mortals know that they are all human, subject to the same human frailties, human fancies, and human feelings.

THE PEOPLE WILL DEFEND THE RIGHTS OF THE STATES.

I am persuaded that the people of each one of the 48 States love their respective States. I am persuaded that if the people were made to understand how such legislation tends to overreach the proper constitutional limits of Federal power and to invade the province of State power, they would rise in protest and would condemn those who suggest such course of conduct and would drive them from power. I remember how the people of nearly all the States—42 States in all—irrespective of section, were shocked and outraged by the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission that the railroads engaged in strictly and exclusively intrastate business must charge the same rates as railroads engaged in interstate business. The people proposed to fight this unwarranted assumption of Federal power, and they are fighting to-day in the Supreme Court of the United States, and if that court should sustain the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission it is almost sure to be made an issue in the next nation-wide campaign. The people of the States will say that they chartered the railroads, that they built their railroads, and that they demand the right to control their railroads, and if under existing law the Interstate Commerce Commission is held to have the power to fix one uniform schedule of rates and fares all over the Nation for every railroad, both intrastate and interstate, then the people will demand the repeal of any such legislation, and, if necessary, will demand the enactment of a constitutional amendment.

THE COMPLETE DEGRADATION OF THE STATES.

If such centralizing legislation as this antilynching bill continues to be enacted by Congress, and if the same is approved by the President and sustained by the Supreme Court, then we may wipe off the flag of our country every star that represents a State, since such stars will no longer signify statehood. The States will be mere geographical subdivisions, mere dependent Provinces. To be a governor of a State will no longer be a coveted honor but will be an empty mockery. Able men will refuse to accept positions as State legislators, State judges, and State executives. Being no longer places of power, they will become positions of peril. Any governor or any judge or any legislator will be liable at any moment to be snatched from his official station and brought before a Federal court to be indicted and tried as a criminal merely because he was seeking to discharge his duty as a State official. If Congress can punish a sheriff for the manner in which he discharges his duties as sheriff, so it can punish a governor, and if it can punish a governor it can punish all the members of the State legislature, and in like manner it can punish all the members of the Supreme Court and all the State judges, merely because the legislature may have passed a law and the governor and the sheriff may have sought to enforce a law and the judges of the Supreme Court may have construed and sustained a law which was subsequently held in a Federal court to violate due process of law and to deny equal protection of the law.

LYNCHING IS THE CULMINATION OF CRIME AND LAWLESSNESS.

I decline to be understood as defending in any way and upon any grounds the crime of lynching. There are thousands of murders being committed in every part of the country and hundreds of thousands of lesser crimes. I am sure that no one in this House defends crime or lawlessness in any form. Lynching is one form of lawlessness provoked by another form of lawlessness. Other crimes are self-originated. It can not be said that one murder provokes another murder nor that one killing provokes another killing, but it is always some crime either unspeakably heinous or less flagrant that provokes on the part of the people of a community, sometimes including the most law-abiding and God-fearing men in a community, to rush with a sort of involuntary movement to avenge some outrage. This spirit may be psychologically related to the spirit of revolution. It is not always a protest against the delay and uncertainty of the law; it is more frequently the outburst of a sort of righteous indignation against a brutal crime. I know that in the process of civilization "regulators" and self-constituted executives and a sort of rude code of justice have preceded the settled and orderly administration of law. And under certain circumstances when the veneer of civilization is scratched men may in an instant revert to primeval instincts and work a hasty and extralegal justice. I know that in the interests of civilization we must repress this tendency and, most important of all, we must repress the tendency to commit any crime of any degree by any person of any race. We need to wage in every State in the Nation a campaign against lawlessness, which has its root in sin. No State is free from lawlessness, and all should join us in a State-wide and Nation-wide campaign and propaganda to repress crime by building up a healthy sentiment and by upholding the hands of all officers of the law.

SEEKING TO DO RIGHT IN THE WRONG WAY.

But there is a right way and a wrong way in which to do a good and desirable thing. There are hundreds of economic and sociological questions waiting for solution in the several States and by the several States, but it will not do for Congress to step in, in defiance of the Constitution, and seek to solve those questions over the heads of the people of the State. Unless a people of a section be themselves self-controlled and genuinely in sympathy with the enforcement of a law that law can not be enforced, it makes no difference whether it be enacted by the Congress of the United States or the State legislature and whether it is to be enforced in a Federal court or a State court and whether the consequences of violation be confinement in a Federal penitentiary or in a State penitentiary. Criminals do not always count the consequences, and if they find that the sentiment even of the most law-abiding people in the community in which they live does not approve of the law and of the manner of its enactment and of the agency for this enforcement the criminal will become unbridled.

And again, imagine a case which would be sure to arise at an early date where the people of a community involuntarily, impulsively, with a feeling of justification, rushed to avenge some unmentionable crime, and with hundreds in pursuit the United States marshal appears on the ground with his deputies to defend the fleeing criminal, and, finding himself outnumbered, he calls on the President by telegram, and the President sends a company or a battalion of United States soldiers from the nearest Army post, and the civilians, feeling as civilians have always felt, an attitude of bitterest hostility toward the military enforcement of law in times of peace, resist the militia, and both sides begin to shoot, and good men, God-fearing men, officers in local churches, men who have offered their lives to their country in time of war, are shot down by the militia and the militia is shot down by the civilians. What will be the result? The civilian population in the surrounding territory becomes terribly incensed. The feud will be taken up by them. They will avenge the death of these civilians by murdering others of the class or race charged with responsibility for the original crime. And then will result a sort of internecine war. Bloodshed will spread from community to community and from State to State until an almost nation-wide riot will begin. The militia of the States and the whole Army will be utterly powerless to stem the onrushing tides of outraged civilians, and then we will experience something in comparison with which the East St. Louis race riot will pale into insignificance. And who will be responsible for such a result? It can not be other than those who, blinded by partisanship or bound by political promises, failed to take into account the common-sense human-nature element involved in the problem. Human government deals with human nature. Human traditions, human passions, human prejudices, whether justifiable, logical, or ethical, are factors that no wise legislator dare ignore. That great Englishman, David Lloyd-George, is wise enough to know that the prejudices and passions of hundreds of years of English misrule in Ireland can not be assuaged by soft words nor eradicated by logical arguments but must be dealt with as actual forces. It would be destructive of the morale of the people of this Nation for it to come to pass that the people of any State should look upon Federal officers brought into the State from other States as intruders, to be regarded just as the Irish people did the English police. There is danger of just this very thing. Personally, I remember the bitterest feeling of resentment among many of our best people when one white man, then a Federal officer, as a deputy United States marshal, killed another white man, and, having been indicted in the State court, removed his case out of the State court into the United States court upon a petition alleging that the act of killing was in the discharge of his duty as a United States marshal. Upon a proper motion the Federal judge remanded the case to the State court for trial. But the people were aroused, because they felt it to be a sort of insult to themselves, an imputation that the local government would not execute justice.

The people of the several States feel that if a man comes into a State, or lives in a State, and commits a crime against the laws of that State, then he should be brought to trial in the courts of that State. They recognize that persons who violate Federal laws must be tried in Federal courts, but for more than 125 years the people have known the line of distinction between Federal jurisdiction and State jurisdiction, and they resent undue and unconstitutional interference by Federal authority.

STATE OFFICERS IN ALL SECTIONS DO THEIR DUTY.

For the Federal Government to prescribe a criminal code and to try its violators in the Federal courts is certain to produce resentment and a revulsion of feeling in any State in the Union, whether it be amongst the liberty-loving people of Massachusetts or the brave and bold people of Texas. The people will ask, "Why is it that the Federal Government thinks that its moral conceptions are higher than those of the State; and why is it that Congress must become the schoolmaster of the States; and why is it that Federal judges, appointed and not elected for a whole lifetime, and not for a limited period, are better and more learned than State judges; and why are United States marshals and their deputies appointed and not elected, but chosen for political loyalty and activity, better than the State sheriffs and State deputy sheriffs, who are elected by the people and are responsible to the will of the people, and if the people demand that the laws be enforced, so surely will the sheriffs obey the popular will?" I resent the imputation that sheriffs, as a class, in the Southern States have been disloyal to their duty and have weakly submitted to the will of the mob. I recall the case of Sheriff John M. Nicholls, of Spartanburg, S. C., the uncle of former Congressman Samuel J. Nicholls, when he faced an angry mob and told them that his prisoner was to him a sacred trust and that he could be taken from the jail only over the dead body of the sheriff. But the sheriff before himself being killed would lay low with a bullet some of his assailants. The men in that mob knew that the sheriff's mettle had been tried in the fiery ordeal of battle, and they knew that his nerve was steady and his aim was true, and they recoiled before his resolute stand, and thus the prisoner was saved and the law was safe and a lynching was averted. And what was true there has been true many a time all over our country—in the East, in the West, in the North, and in the South.

FEDERAL FAILURE IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

It little behooves Congress to claim that its power will prove a panacea in preventing crime. For months the newspapers of the city of Washington have been filled with the recitals of hundreds of horrible crimes, and we have been told that the statistics show that in proportion to the population there is more crime and lawlessness in the city of Washington than in any other city on the American Continent, and yet, remember, that this less than 10 miles square constituting the District of Columbia is the only territory on the face of the globe where Congress has and exercises exclusive jurisdiction. Here in this District Congress can legislate as to the minutest details of domestic life. Congress can prescribe a curfew when all shall be in bed and a reveille when all must arise. Congress can prescribe a régime of life and of diet for every citizen in the District. Congress has created a commission to regulate the rents charged within the District, and there is no limit under the Constitution to the power that Congress can exercise in this District of Columbia. And yet, here where the towering Dome that symbolizes national greatness can be seen from every square foot of the District, here where the President and all the members of his Cabinet reside, here where the Congress of 533 Members and their families reside, here where the Attorney General and his vast entourage of assistants, examiners, and secret-service men, and detectives reside, here in the face of and under the wing of the imperial and majestic power of the Congress of the United States, we have more lawlessness and more crime than in any other place in the country. It is little consolation to the advocates for the aggression of Federal power to contemplate the dismal failure that Congress has made in Washington.

THE PROPOSED ANTILYNCHING LAW—THE DESTRUCTION OF THE FEDERAL SYSTEM.

Does the fourteenth amendment confer power on Congress to enact laws providing for the punishment of municipal subdivisions of the States or State officers? When the first section of the fourteenth amendment says that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall any State deny to any person the equal protection of the law, does this authorize Congress to pass affirmative legislation purporting to protect the life, liberty, and property of all persons in all the States and seeking to establish everywhere equality of all persons before the law? In other words, can Congress anticipate that the States and State officers will deny due process of law and the equal protection of the law, and in order to prevent from happening this anticipated failure, can Congress forestall State action, and take from the hands of the States and State officers the making and administration of the whole body of laws relating to life, liberty, and property?

In order to answer this question correctly we must understand what was in the minds of those who framed and ratified the fourteenth amendment. When we consider remedial legislation, such as the fourteenth amendment is, we must first understand the existing law. All must admit that if the antilynching bill ever passes and is sustained in the courts it will establish the complete subordination and subjection of the States in all the multitude of internal matters relating to life, liberty, and property to the National Government. So our question really becomes, Did the people when they adopted the fourteenth amendment intend to work such a radical and revolutionary change in the relation of the States to the Federal Government?

To find out what was in the minds of the people in 1868 when they adopted the fourteenth amendment and therefore in order to understand their language in said amendment we must ascertain what was the then existing understanding among all the people, North, South, East, and West, as to the relations of the several States to the National Government.

THE VIEWS OF THE FOUNDERS AND FATHERS.

Undoubtedly when the people established the Federal Government under the Constitution in 1789 they understood that the States were to continue independent and therefore supreme in all things except those powers conferred on the National Government by the written Constitution, or by it expressly denied to the States. The strongest friend of the idea of centralizing governmental power was Alexander Hamilton, and the following extracts from his pen contained in the Federalist, edited by HENRY CABOT LODGE, establish conclusively his admission that the States within their reserved powers were to continue sovereign and supreme. At page 50:

> The proposed Constitution, so far from implying an abolition of the State governments, makes them constituent parts of the national sovereignty by allowing them a direct representation in the Senate and leaves in their possession certain exclusive and very important portions of sovereign powers.

At page 186:

> An entire consolidation of the States into one complete national sovereignty would imply an entire subordination of the parts; and whatever powers might remain in them would be altogether dependent on the general will. But as the plan of the convention aims only at a partial union or consolidation, the State governments would clearly retain all the rights of sovereignty which they had before and which were not by that act exclusively delegated to the United States.

At page 386:

> In this spirit it may be remarked that the equal vote allowed to each State (in the Senate) is at once a constitutional recognition of the portion of sovereignty remaining in the individual States and an instrument for preserving that residuary sovereignty. So far the equality ought to be no less acceptable to the large than to the small States, since they are not less solicitous to guard by every possible expedient against an improper consolidation of the States into one simple Republic.

That the Constitution did not establish a consolidated Republic and that the States continued sovereign as to internal affairs not granted to the National Government is evidenced by the sentiment expressed by Timothy Pickering on the purchase of Louisiana in 1803, and again by Josiah Quincy when Louisiana was admitted as a State, and by the Hartford convention in 1814, and by the resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts passed in 1845 protesting against the annexation of Texas. The Supreme Court of the United States itself accepted the independence of the States and State officers from control by Federal authority as the major premise in the construction of section 2 of article 4 of the Constitution providing that fugitives from justice shall be delivered up by the governor of the State on demand of the governor of the State having jurisdiction of the crime, in the case decided in 1860, Kentucky against Dennison (24 Howard, 66), from which we extract the following:

But—

> looking to the subject matter of this law and the relations which the United States and the several States bear to each other, the court is of the opinion the words "it shall be the duty" were not used as mandatory and compulsory, but as declaratory of the moral duty which this command created, when Congress had provided the mode of carrying it into execution. The act does not provide any means to compel the execution of this duty nor inflict any punishment for neglect or refusal on the part of the executive of the State; nor is there any clause or provision in the Constitution which arms the Government of the United States with this power. Indeed, such a power would place every State under the control and dominion of the General Government, even in the administration of its internal concerns and reserved rights. And we think it clear that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no power to impose on a State officer, as such, any duty whatever and compel him to perform it. It is true that Congress may authorize a particular State officer to perform a particular duty; but if he declines to do so it does not follow that he may be coerced or punished for his refusal.

STATES AND STATE OFFICERS AS SUCH CAN NOT BE COERCED.

When the people of the country learned of the decision by the Supreme Court in the case of Chisolm against Georgia (2 Dallas), they promptly brought forward and adopted the eleventh amendment making squarely impossible a suit against a State by a citizen of another State. The first inaugural message of President Lincoln plainly admits that the National Government could not legally coerce a State, as such, and pronounced the various ordinances of secession as mere void utterances by lawless individuals. The following summary of the case is well stated by Willoughby in volume 1, page 86, of his work on the Constitution.

In a Federal State such as the United States is now agreed to be the supremacy of the national authority is never maintained by direct action against its member Commonwealths, but it is exhibited in its authority to execute its will upon all persons subject to its jurisdiction, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding and irrespective of what may be the opinions and effects of those exercising the political powers of those States.

CONTEMPORANEOUS CONSTRUCTION.

In the Slaughter cases, decided in 1872 (16 Wallace, 66), we find an almost contemporaneous interpretation by the court of the effect of the fourteenth amendment upon the relation of the States to the Nation. And we find that the view that prevailed from the adoption of the Constitution down to the first inaugural of President Lincoln, was still entertained by the court, as evidenced by the following extract:

We do not see in those amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system. Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the States with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of person and of property—was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government.

The States can not tax nor restrict Federal agencies and conversely the National Government can not tax nor restrict State agencies, because the power to tax or control involves the power to destroy and the continued existence of the States in the full possession of their constitutional powers is essential to the preservation of our system of Government.

From Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wallace, 533), we extract the following:

It may be admitted that the reserved rights of the States, such as to pass laws, to give effect to laws through executive action, to administer justice through the courts, and to employ all necessary agencies for legitimate purposes of State government, are not proper subjects of the taxing power of Congress.

THE COUNTY REPRESENTS THE STATE AND IF THE COUNTY CAN BE PENALIZED SO THE STATE COULD BE, AND THUS BE FINALLY DESTROYED.

From the case of Pollock v. Trust Co. (157 U. S., 583), decided in 1894, we extract the following language to prove that the property and revenue of State municipal corporations are not subject to Federal taxation:

The Constitution contemplates the independent exercise by the Nation and the State, severally, of their constitutional powers.

As the States can not tax the powers, the operations, or the property of the United States, nor the means which they employ to carry their powers into execution, so it has been held that the United States has no power under the Constitution to tax either the instrumentalities or the property of the State.

A municipal corporation is the representative of the State and one of the instrumentalities of the State government. It was long ago determined that the property and revenues of municipal corporations are not subjects of Federal taxation. Collector v. Day (11 Wall., 113). United States v. Railway Co. (17 Wall., 322, 332). In Collector v. Day, it was adjudged that Congress had no power, even by an act taxing all incomes, to levy a tax upon the salaries of judicial officers of a State, for reasons similar to those on which it had been held in Dobbins v. Commissioners (16 Pet., 435), that a State could not tax the salaries of officers of the United States. Mr. Justice Nelson in delivering the judgment, said: "The General Government, and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other, within their respective spheres. The former in its appropriate sphere is supreme; but the States within the limits of their powers not granted, or in the language of the tenth amendment, 'reserve,' are as independent of the General Government as that Government within its sphere is independent of the States."

CONGRESS CAN NOT TAX SALARY OF STATE OFFICER.

In Collector v. Day (11 Wallace, 113), decided in 1870 we find this language:

As the States can not tax the powers, the operations, or the property of the United States, nor the means which they employ to carry their powers into execution, so it has been held that the United States have no power under the Constitution to tax either the instrumentalities or the property of a State.

So in the case of Ambrosini v. United States (187 U. S., 1), decided in 1902 it was held that Congress could not impose a stamp tax on a bond required by State law to be given as a prerequisite to the right to sell liquor. In the language of Justice White in the case of South Carolina v. United States (199 U. S., 465), decided in 1905, we find the following:

It is not necessary to trace the want of authority of the United States to impose a license exacting on the agents of the State to an express provision of the Constitution, since the court has constantly held that the absence of authority in the Government of the United States to tax or burden the agencies or instrumentalities of a State government, and the like want of authority on the part of the States to tax the agencies or instrumentalities of the National Government, results from the dual system of government which the Constitution created, and that the continuance in force of such a prohibition is absolutely essential to the preservation of both governments.

THE COUNTY IS LEGALLY THE STATE.

In the case of the United States v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad (17 Wallace, 322), we find the following plain language, showing that the attempt to make a county subject to a penalty of $10,000, collectible in a Federal court in a suit brought by the next of kin of any person lynched in such county, is squarely and obviously unconstitutional, unless the Constitution be stretched till it be broken and the States thereby destroyed:

A municipal corporation like the city of Baltimore is a representative not only of the State but is a portion of its governmental power. It is one of its creatures, made for a specific purpose, to exercise within a limited sphere the powers of the State. The State may withdraw these local powers of government at pleasure, and may, through its legislature or other appointed channels, govern the local territory as it governs the State at large. It may enlarge or contract its powers or destroy its existence. As a portion of the State in the exercise of a limited portion of the powers of the State its revenues, like those of the State, are not subject to taxation.

In the early case of Lane County v. Oregon (7 Wallace, 71), we find a clear exposition of the true constitutional status of the State, as evidenced by the following extract:

The people of the United States constitute one nation, under one government, and this government, within the scope of the powers with which it is invested, is supreme. On the other hand, the people of each State compose a State, having its own government and endowed with all the functions essential to separate and independent existence. The State disunited might continue to exist. Without the States in union there could be no such political body as the United States. * * * Now, to the existence of the States themselves, necessary to the existence of the United States, the power of taxation is indispensable. * * * If, therefore, the condition of any State, in the judgment of its legislature, requires the collection of taxes in kind—that is to say, by the delivery to the proper officers of a certain proportion of products, or in gold or silver bullion, or in gold or silver coin—it is not easy to see upon what principle the National Legislature can interfere with the exercise to that end of this power, original in the States, and never as yet surrendered. If this be so, it is certainly a reasonable conclusion that Congress did not intend by the general terms of the currency act to restrain the exercise of this power in the manner shown by the statutes of Oregon.

OPINION OF JUDGE THOMAS M. COOLEY.

Treating of taxation and describing it to be an all-pervading attribute of sovereignty, Judge Cooley in his work on "Constitutional Limitations, seventh edition, page 683, uses the following apt language:

If the State can not tax the means by which the National Government performs its functions, neither, on the other hand and for the same reasons, can the latter tax the agencies of the State governments. "The same supreme power which established the departments of the General Government determined that the local governments should exist for their own purposes and made it impossible to protect the people in their common interest without them. Each of these several agencies is confined to its own sphere, and all are strictly subordinate to the Constitution which limits them and independent of other agencies, except as thereby made dependent. There is nothing in the Constitution (of the United States) which can be made to admit of any interference by Congress with the secure existence of any State authority within its lawful bounds; and any such interference by the indirect means of taxation is quite as much beyond the power of the National Legislature as if the interference were direct and extreme." It has therefore been held that the law of Congress requiring judicial process to be stamped could not constitutionally be applied to the State courts, since otherwise Congress might impose such restrictions upon the State courts as would put an end to their effective action and be equivalent, practically, to abolishing them altogether. And a similar ruling has been made in other analogous cases.

STATE COURTS ENERGETICALLY DEFEND STATE RIGHTS.

In the above extract from the text of Judge Cooley is found a quotation approved by him from the case of Fifield v. Close (15 Mich., 505), some of the leading cases in the State courts are: Jones v. Keep (19 Wis., 390); Tucker v. Potter (35 Conn., 46); Moore v. Quirk (105 Mass., 49); Sayles v. Davis (22 Wis., 225); Davis v. Richardson (45 Miss., 503); Garland v. Gaines (83 Conn., 662); Warren v. Paul (22 Ind., 276); Smith v. Short (40 Ala., 385); Carpenter v. Snelling (97 Mass., 452); Haight v. Grist (64 N. C., 739); People v. Gates (43 N. Y., 40); Bowen v. Byrne (55 Ill., 467); Atkins v. Plympton (44 Vt., 21); Bumpass v. Taggart (26 Ark., 398); Duffy v. Hodson (40 Calif., 240).

Thus we see that the State courts from all over the Nation, without regard to sections, insist upon the integrity and the independence of the States within the sphere of their reserved powers. We believe that the State courts and the United States Supreme Court express not only the true and indisputable constitutional doctrine but also express a deep-seated and universal sentiment among the people that the State governments are the surest guarantee of the life, liberty, and property of the people. The State governments make possible that variety and diversification of statutory and common law necessary to meet the different conditions of industry or climate, and of peculiar customs and traditions orginating in colonial days. It is absolutely impossible for a centralized government at Washington so to legislate by uniform laws as to meet the feelings and needs of the people of New England, who know democracy of the town meeting, of the people of the Southern States who for more than a hundred years have faced peculiar economic and racial problems; the people of Louisiana, with French traditions and the civil law; the people of California, with peculiar traditions and race problems; and the people of the great Northwest, still enjoying and prospering in the freedom of frontier days.

The case of Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46), having been decided in 1906, is not a voice from the dead past but is the ringing expression of a living condition that our constitutional system must be preserved, and that the court will not destroy the Constitution by strained and sophistical interpretation, but will insist that if changed conditions demand changed constitutional provisions, then the changes must be brought about in the constitutional method of conscious and purposeful amendment to be ratified by the people. To summarize the decision in said case we will extract a portion of the syllabus:

The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent power of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and in that alone; that the manifest purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution is to put beyond dispute the proposition that all powers not granted are reserved to the people, and that if in the changes of the years further powers ought to be possessed by Congress they must be obtained by a new grant from the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is, subject to the exception named, vested in the State.

The controversy between the parties plaintiff and defendant is one of a jurisdictional nature. By the Constitution the entire judicial power of the United States is vested in its courts, specifically included therein being a grant to the Supreme Court of jurisdiction over controversies between two or more States.

In a qualified sense and to a limited extent the separate States are sovereign and independent, and the relations between them partake something of the nature of international law. This court in appropriate cases enforces the principles of that law, and in addition by its decisions of controversies between two or more States is constructing what may not improperly be called a body of interstate law.

In view of the foregoing unbroken line of doctrines and decisions as to the proper function of a State in our Federal system, what is there in or connected with the fourteenth amendment to justify legislation which would destroy the independent status of the States, and destroy our dual system of Government, and destroy the possibility of local self-government, and to erect from the remains one single consolidated national Republic?

In order to justify a conclusion so fundamentally subversive of age-old doctrines there must be in the fourteenth amendment language plain and unequivocal indicating a positive intention to modify our form of government. It is obvious that there is no such language, and the inevitable conclusion is that there was no such intention. Then, how was it proposed that the fourteenth amendment in the particulars under consideration should function? Those who framed and adopted the fourteenth amendment certainly understood the Constitution which had then been in existence about 70 years, and they knew full well the constitutional view of a provision which merely denies certain powers to the States. They referred to section 10 of Article I, and they found enumerated quite a number of powers which the States were forbidden to exercise. They understood full well that the prohibition of a power to the States would not confer that power upon the Federal Government. They understood that Congress could not anticipate that any State would violate the Constitution, and that the remedy of any person claiming that a State had violated such prohibitions was retrospective and corrective by appeal to the United States Supreme Court. For illustration section 10, Article I, provides, "No State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contract." Those who framed and adopted the fourteenth amendment well understood that Congress could not frame an affirmative code of laws relating to contracts and to the remedies for their breach, but Congress always presumed that the States by their legislatures, their courts, and their executive officers would keep their constitutional obligations. But when a person claimed before any court that a State had violated the Federal Constitution by impairing the obligation of a contract, then the Federal court could hold such State action to be null and void. There is no greater obligation on the Members of Congress and Federal officials to obey and defend the Constitution of the United States than there is upon members of State legislatures and State officials, because all take an oath to preserve and defend the Federal Constitution. But Congress has frequently violated its oath, not intentionally but effectually, by enacting unconstitutional legislation. Has it ever been proposed to enact criminal statutes subjecting to indictment and punishment Members of Congress who enacted unconstitutional legislation? The question seems absurd, because all men agreed that the constitutional method of disposing of void acts of Congress is to let the matter come before the courts in the regular way.

CORRECTIVE AND RETROACTIVE OPERATION.

In like manner it has been universally agreed that when State legislatures passed acts in conflict with the Federal Constitution that the proper remedy is to let the courts declare the legislation void, as in the case of acts of Congress. But the revolutionary proposition is now advanced in support of this antilynching bill that Congress may anticipate that some State may in the future enact a law that may deprive some person of life, or of liberty, or of property without due process of law, or may deny to some person the equal protection of the laws, and that Congress may prescribe a criminal penalty for the individuals who compose the State lawmaking body and put those individuals in the penitentiary. It will not do to answer that the bill does not provide punishment for State legislators and merely provide punishment for State sheriffs, constables, and policemen. The punishment contemplated for the executive officers last mentioned is upon the theory that they are enforcing a State law, that their conduct constitutes a State law, denying due process, or denying equality. In morals it is far more reprehensible to devise and enact laws which deprive one of property without due process of law than it is in the heat and hurry of action for a sheriff or other executive officer to do something that may appear to those looking at his conduct retrospectively to be negligent, and thus subject himself to criminal indictment. But the absurdity of proposing congressional legislation to punish members of the State legislatures for enacting laws subsequently held to be in violation of the Federal Constitution is manifest to every mind.

Why, therefore, will not the proponents of this antilynching bill be fair enough to see that it is equally absurd to enact legislation prescribing criminal penalties for the individual acts of a State officer under that provision of the fourteenth amendment which says that "no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor [shall any State] deny to any person the equal protection of the law"? There is no escape from the logic of this position, that if this antilynching bill be constitutional whereby a sheriff may be punished in a Federal court for a single act of negligence on the theory that his act is the act of the State, then it will be equally and even more competent for Congress to prescribe criminal penalties for the members of State legislatures that enact laws found to be in violation of the due process of law clause of the fourteenth amendment, and even to punish judges of State courts which render decisions subsequently held to deny due process of law and equal protection of laws. The States must act through their three coordinate branches of government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial—and it can not be consistently contended that Congress can provide criminal punishment to be administered by a Federal court for the executive officers of a State whose conduct may be found to deny due process of law or equal protection of law without at the same time admitting that Congress can provide criminal consequences for the legislative and judicial officers of the State who may be equally guilty with the executive officers in depriving persons of life, liberty, or property without due process of law and in denying them equal protection of the law.

HOW MAY THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT BE ENFORCED?

Much emphasis in argument is laid upon the fact that section 5 of the fourteenth amendment provided that Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of said amendment by appropriate legislation. That argument can add no weight, because under section 18 of Article I of the Constitution Congress is given power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or any department or officer thereof. Yet that power did not confer upon Congress authority to pass in advance affirmative legislation providing criminal penalties for any States which might violate section 10 of Article I. There can be no fair and sound distinction drawn between those parts of the fourteenth amendment now invoked to support the antilynching bill and section 10 of Article I of the original Constitution. There is no middle ground. It must be admitted that the antilynching bill is unconstitutional or it must be contended that every State legislator, every judge, and every executive officer from the governor down may be punished in a Federal court for acts subsequently held to deny due process of law or equal protection of the laws. Either all State officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, are exempt from responsibility for their official conduct in a Federal criminal court, or no one of them is responsible. They are all in the same class. They are either all clothed with the same immunity or they are all for the same reason and to the same extent liable to answer in a Federal court charging them with having committed a crime against the Federal Government while executing the powers of their State offices.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9724.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9724. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will resume the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9724, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9724, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. BANKHEAD. To submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The RECORD of yesterday does not disclose it, and I want to inquire whether the office of Secretary, on page 2, was read before we adjourned?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not read. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Salaries: Secretary of the Treasury, $12,000; Undersecretary of the Treasury, to be nominated by the President and appointed by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum and shall perform such duties in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury as may be prescribed by the Secretary or by law, and under the provisions of section 177, Revised Statutes, in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall perform the duties of the Secretary until a successor is appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease, $10,000; assistant to the Secretary, $5,000; three Assistant Secretaries, at $5,000 each; clerk to the Secretary, $3,000; executive clerk, $2,400; stenographer, $1,800; three private secretaries, one to each Assistant Secretary, at $1,800 each; Government actuary, under control of the Treasury, $4,000; clerks—2 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 1 of class 1; chief messenger, $1,100; two assistant chief messengers, at $1,000 each; messengers—3 at $900 each, 4 at $840 each; messenger boy, $600; in all, $80,760.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the reservation, I would like to inquire?

Mr. WALSH. I reserved a point of order to that part of the paragraph, Mr. Chairman, providing for an Undersecretary of the Treasury at $10,000. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this language was not carried in the appropriation bill heretofore providing for this officer?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it was. It was carried in the appropriation bill that was passed on June 16, 1921, and it was intended for the fiscal year 1922.

Mr. WALSH. This is intended to make it permanent, is it not?

Mr. MADDEN. No. It is practically the same language that we carried in the other fiscal year.

Mr. WALSH. Well, what information has the gentleman as to its being necessary to continue this Undersecretary?

Mr. MADDEN. The Secretary of the Treasury testified before the committee that it was very important for the successful conduct of the work under his charge that he should have a man who could take his place in the event of his absence, and who could act for him in the event of illness, or anything of that sort; and in justification he cited the fact that we dispensed with two Assistant Secretaries, and they thought the work was such that one man of some additional responsibility was essential to do it.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I do not know that it is very much economy to dispense with officials of lower salaries and then provide for continuing a very high-salaried official. This is within $2,000 of what the Secretary himself gets, as I recall. Is the work there piling up, so that it will require a very high-salaried man?

Mr. MADDEN. The Secretary of the Treasury was very urgent in his request for the continuation of this place. He said that without it he would be very much embarrassed.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the same man who has been there under the previous administration?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. The committee felt that inasmuch as the House passed upon this last year by a record vote, we ought not to assume the responsibility of eliminating the item or reducing the amount. We felt that it was a matter that the House itself had acted upon, and we did not feel justified in overriding the action of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The Undersecretary of State draws how much?

Mr. MADDEN. Seven thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. GARNER. Why should the Undersecretary of the Treasury draw a higher salary than the Undersecretary of State?

Mr. MADDEN. There is only one reason why he should do it. I think the work of the Undersecretary of the Treasury is very much more voluminous than that of the Undersecretary of State, and at the urgent request of the Secretary of the Treasury last year we continued this office.

Mr. GARNER. Are you continuing him in accordance with the number of hours he works, or the importance of his office, or his ability to perform his duties?

Mr. MADDEN. We have had to act upon all of these considerations and upon what the Secretary himself said.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that the Undersecretary of State has very little to perform, and probably needs but very little ability, and the hours of work are very short, and therefore you give him $7,500 a year; but because the hours of labor in the Treasury are very long and a man of ability is needed, you give him $10,000. It seems to me there ought to be some uniformity in this Assistant Secretary business. There ought to be some uniformity of procedure and of salary, I should think.

Mr. MADDEN. I would very much dislike to have the gentleman's understanding expressed as mine.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state whether this was recommended by the Budget Bureau?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it was recommended by the Budget Bureau, but originally it was an office created by the House itself.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the language providing for "Undersecretary of the Treasury, to be nominated by the President and appointed by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," and the succeeding language down to the figures "$10,000," in line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Illinois cite any existing law as authority?

Mr. MADDEN. I concede, Mr. Chairman, that the item is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DUNBAR rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DUNBAR. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DUNBAR. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Congresses deserve great credit for the extent to which they have reduced the operating expenses of our Government, reduced the national indebtedness, and approached a degree of normalcy. I am aware that a great many people who have not succeeded in obtaining from our Government or from Congress legislation which they have desired have united in declaiming that the Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Congresses have not been economical and efficient.

Yesterday I was very much interested in the remarks made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], in which he criticized—in a very gentlemanly manner, as he always does—the functioning of the Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Congresses, and made the claim that in legislation they had not been efficient. He pointed out that the operating expenses of the Government for the year 1922 would amount to more than $3,900,000,000. This is true, but he failed to state that the public debt of the United States will be reduced something like $400,000,000 as a part of that expenditure.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] made the remark that the estimates for the fiscal year 1922 and 1923 would show an increase in operating expenses over the fiscal year 1921 and 1922, but I wish to point out the fact that for the year 1923 the estimates carry an additional appropriation of $155,000,000 for the Veterans' Bureau over the amount of the appropriation for the fiscal year as of November 1, 1921, and that after making allowance for this amount the estimated appropriations for the fiscal year 1923 will not equal those of the current year.

Our expenses this year, not including the reduction in the public debt, will amount to $3,600,000,000; but I want to call your attention to the fact that of that amount the sum of $2,300,000,000 will be occasioned directly or indirectly by expenses incurred in the World War, for which we are still called upon to make provision.

From the estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, which call for an expenditure for the fiscal year of $3,604,000,000, we have the following expenditures which are directly a result of the war. The good-road construction cost is possibly an exception, but the sentiment in favor of the construction of national highways was in part suggested as a necessity in the event of war. These increased expenditures are as follows:

Increase public debt interest	$951,000,000
United States Veterans' Bureau	438,000,000
Transportation act	337,000,000
Increase in pensions	100,000,000
United States Shipping Board	74,000,000
Good road construction	70,000,000
Increased compensation—bonus	35,000,000
Russian appropriation	20,000,000
Government life insurance	22,000,000
Civil service retirement fund	8,000,000
Naval building program	142,000,000
Return of taxes illegally collected	40,000,000
Post Office deficiency	51,000,000
Total	2,288,000,000

The increased compensation paid to the Government employees in the nature of a bonus, amounting to $35,000,000, and the Government life insurance of $22,000,000 was occasioned by increased compensation necessitated, and Government life insurance provided for the soldier boys during the war.

We will be called upon to pay $40,000,000 as a return for taxes illegally collected during the war and which were collected as a result of the war. The Post Office deficiency of $51,000,000, which is $85,000,000 less than it was a year ago, was occasioned by the increased charges paid the railroads and to employees growing out of the increased cost of living brought on by the war.

The increased amount of annual interest that we will pay for the fiscal year 1922 over 1916 will amount to $951,000,000. We will spend for the Veterans' Bureau approximately $438,000,000. Who can say that these expenditures were not occasioned by the war? We will spend this current year for payment to the railroads of liabilities incurred under Government control nearly $337,000,000, and I want to say to you, gentlemen, that I think it is a shame that Congress has not ere this provided for the repayment of the money that we justly owe to the railroads. Who can deny that that $337,000,000 was not incurred by the war?

The pensions paid to our Civil War and Spanish-American War veterans have been increased this year $100,000,000 over what they were in 1916, occasioned largely by the fact that the recent war so increased the cost of living that Congress felt called upon to increase the amount of the pensions paid to these soldiers, and that increase amounts to $100,000,000.

Our increased naval expenses for this year, in the construction of our Navy, will amount to something like $142,000,000. Gentlemen, we had begun a constructive naval program. Ships were on the ways. What were we to do? Were we to abandon construction, or were we to go ahead and spend some money in equipping them so that they might be made serviceable and of value? That expenditure, I am sure you will all agree with me, was occasioned by the war.

This year we will pay for the Shipping Board something like $74,000,000. Gentlemen, you all know the history of the Shipping Board. What were we to do with $3,000,000,000 worth of ships if we were not to spend money to complete them, or at least to maintain them?

This year in our items of expenditure there is $25,000,000, occasioned by the United States Grain Corporation, which amount was paid to them in October, 1921. We appropriated $20,000,000 for the Russian relief. Who will say that that was not occasioned by the late war?

The sum total of all these disbursements, the figures of which are taken from the estimate of the Treasury Department of the expenditures for 1922, amount, including $25,000,000 to the Grain Corporation, all told, to more than $2,300,000,000. This year we will spend, exclusive of principal paid on the public debt, $3,600,000,000, leaving but $1,300,000,000 for the ordinary operating expenses of the Government. And, gentlemen, when you consider that in the fiscal year 1918 our operating expenses were something like $18,000,000,000 and that we incurred a deficiency of more than $13,000,000,000, I want to submit to you that the reduction in the amount of our expenditures has been marvelous.

The Post Office Department in 1916 was operating at an expense of a little over $300,000,000 a year, with receipts slightly in excess. To-day that expenditure and receipt is over $500,000,000. The increase in our postal receipts indicates that the business of the country has increased something like 70 per cent, and with this increase I submit to you that the increase in the ordinary expenses of our Government should not be expected to be below at least half that amount and that the ordinary increased expenses of this Government, aside from expenses occasioned by the war, will not this year amount to over 30 or 35 per cent.

I want to submit to you gentlemen that indirectly our departmental expenses should be expected to increase, because that man who to-day incurs no greater increased expense than 30 or 35 per cent for the maintenance of his family over prewar conditions is indeed a man who knows how to rule his own household.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He is also a fortunate man.

Mr. DUNBAR. Gentlemen, we are told by the gentleman from Tennessee that we have not given a good account of ourselves in our duties as Congressmen. But when he says we have not reduced our expenses as we should under afterwar conditions I want to remind you of the fact that the Sixty-sixth Congress reduced our expenses $3,000,000,000 below the amount asked by the previous administration.

It may be of interest to note the comparison of receipts and disbursements for the four previous years and the present fiscal year, which are submitted as follows:

Comparison of receipts and disbursements for the four previous and the present fiscal year.

Fiscal year.	Receipts.	Disbursements.	Deficiency.
July 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918	$3,658,546,510	$12,696,702,470	$9,038,155,960
July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919	5,152,257,136	18,514,879,955	13,362,622,818
July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920	6,704,414,437	6,141,745,240	[1] 562,669,197
July 1, 1920, to June 30, 1921	5,624,932,960	5,115,927,689	[1] 509,005,271
Estimated for July 1, 1921, to June 30, 1922	3,993,000,000	3,604,000,000	[1] 389,000,000

[1] Surplus.

The above statistics are obtained from the following Government publications:

1917–1918: Treasury statement June 30, 1918.
1918–1919: Treasury statement June 30, 1919.
1919–1920: Pages 255–257 Annual Report, Secretary of Treasury, 1920.
1920–1921: Pages 152–153 Annual Report, Secretary of Treasury, 1921.

In the estimate of receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year 1922 no account is taken of receipts and disbursements of Post Office Department except that disbursements are charged with an operative deficit of $51,000,000.

The reduction of the public debt less the net balance in general fund may be obtained from the quarterly comparative public debt statement issued by the Treasury Department, and which is as follows:

August 31, 1919	$25,478,592,113.25
December 31, 1920	23,477,272,773.96
March 31, 1921	23,365,510,971.05
June 30, 1921	23,427,772,446.78
September 30, 1921	23,166,432,894.45
December 31, 1921	22,951,216,822.21

Foreign Governments owe us more than $11,000,000,000, which, if it could be collected, would accordingly reduce the above indebtedness.

It will be observed that the revenue of the country has rapidly decreased, and when we have been told that taxes should be reduced, no allowance has been made for the fact that normal taxes were reduced early in 1918 from 12 and 6 per cent to 8 and 4 per cent. The reduction in revenue which prevented a reduction in taxes was largely occasioned by decrease in business, which reduced the amount paid for corporation and income tax. The revenue for the present fiscal year will be less than $4,000,000,000, whereas for the fiscal year two years ago the revenue amounted to more than $6,700,000,000, and the estimated revenue for the fiscal year 1923 will amount to $3,445,000,000, and an estimated expenditure exclusive of any amount that may be paid on the public debt of $3,143,000,000.

This Congress and the previous Congress have reduced our expenses below the amount that was expected even by the present and former administrations. The Committee on Appropriations have carefully scanned all accounts and have reduced them to the very minimum.

Under the direction and the vigilance of the chairman and the members of the Appropriations Committee, assisted by the desire of Congress to economically administer the affairs of government, our expenses for 1923 will be considerably reduced over those of 1922. If we can succeed in doing so, with indirect war expenditure still prevailing, I feel that not only the Committee on Appropriations, but the Sixty-seventh Congress, will be entitled to receive the congratulations of the people of this great American country. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR]. My friend has made some criticism of the figures which I submitted yesterday relative to the estimated expenditures for the present fiscal year in comparison with those estimated for 1923. As I recall, the gentleman stated by way of explanation of the increase in estimates for 1923 over the appropriations for 1922 that there would be a greater expenditure for the disabled soldiers during 1923 than during the present year in the amount of $155,000,000. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the report submitted by the Director of the Budget, which was indorsed and approved by the President of the United States, shows that the estimated expenditure for the Veterans' Bureau, which takes care of all activities on behalf of the disabled soldiers for 1923, will amount to $460,761,946 and that the estimated expenditures for 1922 amount to $442,878,744, or a difference of only $17,883,202.

The gentleman fails to take into consideration the fact that the estimated expenditures for 1923 do not include something over $369,000,000, which will be expended during the present year for payment of railroad claims and operations growing out of control of the railroads during the war. There is no such expense contemplated in 1923.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. Did I say there would be an expense in 1923 of nearly $400,000,000 for railroads? What I meant to say was that the amount was money paid this fiscal year to the amount of nearly $400,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct in the last statement. I did not understand the gentleman to make any reference to 1923 in connection with the expenditures on account of railroads. I was pointing out the fact that this year we are burdened with over $369,000,000 for that purpose, whereas in 1923 there will be no such burden on the Treasury—that is, by the way of direct appropriation.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In addition to this there will be spent in 1922 $35,000,000 for bonus to civilian employees. No such estimate is made for 1923. Hence the gentleman will see when he comes to analyze the figures that there is an absolute increase in the estimated expenditures for 1923 over those of 1922 in many department activities of the Government. When I say that I refer to the ordinary expenditures. The gentleman will notice that even in this bill the estimates are more than a million dollars for the Treasury Department over and above the amount appropriated for 1922. The very comparison between the estimated expenditures for 1923 which the President approved of over $3,505,000,000 for 1923 and $3,967,000,000 for 1922 shows that there is an increase when you take into consideration that there are activities, some of which I have referred to, to be paid for this year which will not be accounted for in 1923. These figures do not include over $575,000,000 for the Postal Service.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF CHIEF CLERK.

Salaries: Chief clerk, including $300 as superintendent of Treasury Building, who shall be the chief executive officer of the department and who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to sign official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary, Undersecretary, and Assistant Secretaries of the department, $4,000; assistant chief clerk, $3,000; assistant superintendent of Treasury Building, $2,500; administrative clerk, $2,000; clerks—one $2,000, 4 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 4 of class 2, 5 of class 1, 1 $1,000; operator of photographic copying machine, $800; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 2 assistant messengers, at $720 each; mimeograph operator, $720; messenger boy, $420; storekeeper, $1,200; telegraphers—1 $1,400, 1 $1,200; telephone and telegraph operator, $1,200; 3 telephone switchboard operators, at $720 each; mechanical superintendent, $2,250; chief engineer, $1,400; 4 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each (including 1 for outside buildings); 8 elevator conductors, at $720 each, and the use of laborers as relief elevator conductors during rush hours is authorized; 8 firemen, at $720 each; coal passer, $600; chief electrician, $1,600; locksmith and electrician, $1,400; captain of the watch, $1,400; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $900 each; 65 watchmen, at $720 each; foreman of laborers, $1,200; assistant foreman of laborers, $840; 8 chauffeurs, at $720 each; 4 automobile truck laborers, at $660 each; skilled laborer—1 $840, 2 at $720 each; 2 electricians, at $1,200 each; wireman, $900; 39 laborers, at $660 each; plumber, $1,100; painter, $1,100; plumber's assistant, $780; attendant for emergency relief room, $660; head of char force, $720; 85 charwomen, at $240 each; 2 carpenters, at $1,000 each. Winder Building and annex: Engineer, $1,000; 3 firemen, at $720 each; elevator conductor, $720; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; 3 laborers (one of whom, when necessary, shall assist and relieve the elevator conductor), at $660 each; forewoman of char force, $480; 12 charwomen, at $240 each; female laborer for ladies' toilets, $660. Cox Building, 1709 New York Avenue: Two watchmen, at $720 each; laborer, $660. Auditors' Building: Forewoman of char force, $480; 25 charwomen, at $240 each; 2 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 7 laborers (one of whom, when necessary, shall assist and relieve the elevator conductor), at $660 each; female laborer, $660; skilled laborer, $840; in all, $217,310.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the language beginning in line 23, page 2, with the word "including," and the following language:

$300 as superintendent of Treasury Building, who shall be the chief executive officer of the department and who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to sign official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary, Undersecretary, and Assistant Secretaries of the department, $4,000.

I make the point of order that that language is unauthorized by law in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order against the language indicated. Has the gentleman from Illinois the law at hand authorizing it to present to the Chair?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this language is the same language that has been carried every year in the legislative bill. Section 6 of the legislative bill of March 4, 1915, has this provision:

SEC. 6. The officers and other employees of the United States whose salaries are herein appropriated for are established and shall continue from year to year to the extent that they shall be appropriated for by Congress.

This same language is in the act. So that the offices to which the point of order is made are established and only dependent on the question whether we appropriate for their continuance. There is no doubt whatever but we have the authority to appropriate under the language of the act. I think the point of order would not lie against this provision.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair hear me a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The main vice in this language is that which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to designate another to act for him in his absence and sign official papers. There could be some very important official papers that might be signed in the absence of the Secretary which would vitally affect the Government, especially when at this time there is owing the Government of the United States nearly $10,000,000,000 in money loaned, besides one billion and a half of interest due and past due.

There could be important functions that could thus be delegated to some one with less authority than the Secretary of the Treasury in his absence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is speaking to the merits.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no language in any law, other than in an appropriation bill, which does not make it law, giving the Secretary of the Treasury authority to delegate the right to this particular officer to sign official documents for him and in his stead.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I differ with the gentleman upon that. The language—

Chief clerk, including $300 as superintendent of Treasury Building, who shall be the chief executive officer of the department and who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to sign official papers and documents—

Was contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial act of 1915, and in that same act section 6 provided that—the officers and employees of the United States whose salaries are herein appropriated for are established and shall continue from year to year to the extent that they shall be appropriated for by Congress.

I maintain, therefore, that this is not subject to the point of order because the authority to appropriate exists.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman contend that there is any substantive law authorizing the words—

During the temporary absence of the Secretary?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; exactly. This is what I do contend. In the paragraph of the act approved March 4, 1915, there is to be found the identical language against which the gentleman makes the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. But that was an appropriation bill, and was not substantive law.

Mr. MADDEN. But wait. Section 6 of the same act provides that the officers and employees of the United States whose salaries were therein appropriated for—are established and shall continue from year to year to the extent that they shall be appropriated for by Congress.

I maintain that this office was appropriated for in that bill which contained the section 6 from which I quoted, and that the act itself says that all places appropriated for are hereby "established."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the Chair will note that the authority submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is an appropriation act. There is nothing in that act cited by the gentleman to show that this particular language delegating this authority was to be permanent law.

Mr. MADDEN. Section 6 does that.

Mr. BLANTON. The section containing the language shows that it is merely the language in an appropriation act which ceases when that year ends.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I wish to supplement what the chairman of the committee has said and to call attention to the additional fact that this provision authorizing this officer or any other party to sign department mail does not add one single dollar of expense to the pay roll. It simply provides that the mail in the ordinary course may be signed and forwarded without delay. It is merely an authorization to the Secretary of the Treasury to designate a person such as the chief clerk to sign the mail and to avoid the delay of that mail until the Secretary may return.

Mr. WALSH. But this does not say anything about mail. It refers to official papers and documents.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the language there means the ordinary letters and statements of accounts and approval of contracts, and the approval of the routine business of the department, and if that business be held for a day or two days or for a week, the Secretary, upon his return, has that much accumulated matter on his desk; that is all it amounts to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The language that is under discussion would merely authorize him, then, to sign these letters in the event that the Secretary and all of his assistants were absent. He is authorized under this language to do this only when the Secretary and all of his assistants are absent, and evidently the gentleman must be mistaken about its authorizing him to sign the mail.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I am perfectly confident that the construction that I have indicated is correct. I have witnessed the routine hundreds of times. Many cases happen from day to day, from week to week, and the head of the department or the assistant is busily engaged in the discussion of policies of the department, and the mail may accumulate on the desk, and there it will stay unless the Secretary has power to expedite the mail in the manner designated here, and the people who are entitled to prompt replies may be delayed for a considerable period of time. It merely means the expedition of public business.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman misunderstands me. It does not require authority of Congress to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to authorize his chief clerk to sign a letter.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. It does.

Mr. WINGO. It does not. We are not talking about a matter of custom. I am talking about this particular language. We all know that a lot of things are done through custom that are not authorized by law, and this language would be a restriction on the present custom, according to the gentleman's interpretation, because, according to the language, the Secretary could not even authorize the chief clerk to sign his letters unless the Secretary and all of his assistants were out of the building, which would be absurd.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. This means just that, and the request has ordinarily been for the purpose, and the specific purpose, of expediting the public business. There is no increase of expense. The law provides that the head of the department or his assistant shall transact certain business. If they find it practically impossible to meet that business on demand, they would under this provision of law have the power to forward the business without delay, and that is all there is in the proposition.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. There is no such limitation as the gentleman suggests upon the authority. This provides that the chief clerk shall sign official papers and documents. The language does not place any limitation upon the character of the documents.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That is wholly immaterial, because if the Secretary has the power to give direction for the signing of certain papers he will exercise his good judgment in deciding what he shall instruct them to sign.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the question is a point of order, as I understand it, and, as I had something to do with section 6 of the legislative act of 1915, the Chair will pardon me if I express an opinion upon the point of order. As the Chair will probably recall himself, there had been a great many points of order made prior to that time against items, particularly in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, carrying employees of the Government in the District of Columbia in the main, and a great many items had been stricken out on points of order.

Officers and employees who had been provided for for many years without question, but without distinct authority of law, had been stricken out on points of order, and in some cases that bill has been practically rewritten by the Senate of the United States reinserting items which had been stricken out in the House on points of order. There were some of us in the House who did not desire to have the Government run in that way, or the legislative branch run in that way. We did not desire to pass a law providing for new places in the different departments ad libitum without any control, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. Fitzgerald, at that time chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, myself, and several others on both sides of the House conferred on this subject and we wrote into the law section 6. That provision of the law established the officers who were then named in the appropriation act of that year and made them in order in future bills.

Now, the question is whether the legislative description and authority in this bill is authorized by law, and that practically is the question, whether it is now the existing law. It seems to me that section 6 of the act of 1915 expressly provides for the officers there appropriated for according to the description in that law, and the description of this office in that law includes the additional salary and the authority for the designation to sign papers. The exact language in that law is the exact language carried in this bill. I do not think it would make any difference myself if this were stricken out, but it can not be stricken out, it seems to me, on a point of order, because it is the exact language of a law now on the statute books.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that a legislative provision conferring an authority upon the Secretary of the Treasury can at all be considered as descriptive as to apply to the office of the chief clerk?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly it is. Here is the office of chief clerk created, with a description of the powers that the chief clerk may exercise. The chief clerk may exercise the powers to sign papers when designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. That is the law creating the office. That is just as much descriptive as any other provision in the law creating an office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] makes a point of order against the portion of the paragraph beginning with line 23, page 2, and ending with line 3, page 3, the point of order being that the same is not authorized by existing law. The attention of the Chair is called to section 6 of an act approved March 4, 1915, which reads:

The officers and employees of the United States whose salaries are herein provided for are established and shall continue from year to year to the extent they shall be appropriated for by Congress.

This section simplifies the point of order and makes it a question of whether or not this office is provided for in that law. A comparison of the appropriation act referred to with the present appropriation bill indicates that the description of the duties of this officer is identical in the law and the present bill. It would seem to the Chair, therefore, that this officer having been authorized, the office having been established, both as to the salary and the duties, the duties being described in detail, and apparently in exactly the same language as here described in the present bill——

Mr. BLANTON. How about the word "Undersecretary," in line 3, page 3?

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike it out.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman can not do that. That word is not authorized, "Undersecretary," and the point of order would have to be sustained because of that one word, I submit.

The CHAIRMAN. If the word "Undersecretary" is included, that of itself vitiates the whole.

Mr. BLANTON. And, of course, makes the point of order sustainable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that, whether the language remains in the bill or not, the officer provided for in the law would now be authorized to receive the salary and perform the duties whether the language is carried in this bill or not.

Mr. BLANTON. But because of the word "Undersecretary" being included in the paragraph, it makes the whole clause obnoxious.

The CHAIRMAN. The introduction of a new office would, of course, make the whole paragraph obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I insist on the point of order on the ground——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not examined as to that provision of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will not the gentleman allow me to make a motion to strike it out?

Mr. BLANTON. That will come in the proper way after the Chair has ruled.

Mr. MADDEN. I know, but the gentleman ought not to stand on a technicality. Of course the Chair ought not to be called upon to rule on something on which he ought not to be called upon to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists upon the point of order upon the ground that the position of Undersecretary is not included in the law——

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, this is not the only law; this provision or a similar provision was carried elsewhere for an Undersecretary but I can not put my finger on it at this moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad if the gentleman will present any authority he may have on this question.

Mr. LITTLE. I think there is such a provision in previous legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman present it to the Chair?

Mr. BLANTON. I insist on the point of order, because of that word, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask just what language went out under that decision?

The CHAIRMAN. All the language included by the gentleman from Texas in his point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 2, line 23, after the word "clerk," insert: "including $300 as superintendent of the Treasury Building, who shall be the chief executive officer of the department, and who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to sign official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary and Assistant Secretaries of the department."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The Chair is not clear as to whether the amount was stricken out or not.

Mr. BLANTON. I think it would be better to add it to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1542. An act for the relief of Philip A. Hertz;

S. 2023. An act defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes;

S. J. Res. 125. Joint resolution to continue the military status of persons deserting the military or naval service during the World War, and the amenability to trial of those persons who failed to comply with the terms of section 5 of the selective service law;

S. 2199. An act to provide for the marking of anchorage grounds in waters of the United States;

S. 2072. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to make and receive conveyances effecting an exchange of title to the railroad rights of way at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., and for other purposes;

S. 486. An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska;

S. 2363. An act to abolish the limitation on military service without the continental limits of the United States imposed by the act of Congress approved March 4, 1915;

S. 2801. An act to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes," approved May 28, 1896; and

S. 2621. An act authorizing the President to dispose of certain arms and ammunition seized in pursuance of the act approved June 15, 1917, along the Mexican border.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 2914. An act to add certain lands to Minidoka National Forest;

H. R. 7204. An act to provide a Government-owned water service system for the Fort Monroe Military Reservation;

H. R. 5700. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.;

H. R. 8401. An act to transfer the custody and control of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department:

H. R. 9021. An act to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America;

H. R. 6380. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended; and

H. R. 8344. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FISCAL YEAR 1923.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of employees, office equipment, fuel, light, electric current, telephone service, maintenance of motor trucks, and other necessary expenses for carrying into effect the Executive order of December 3, 1918, regulating the transfer of office material, supplies, and equipment in the District of Columbia falling into disuse because of the cessation of war activities, $120,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,500 per annum, and not more than three persons shall be employed at a rate in excess of $1,800 per annum each: Provided further, That the said Executive order shall continue in effect until June 30, 1923, without modification, except that the price charged shall be the current market value at time of issue, less a discount for usage, but in no instance shall the discount be more than 25 per cent, and that the proceeds from the transfer of appropriations thereunder shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: Provided further, That the heads of the executive departments and independent establishments and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall cooperate with the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with the storage and delivery of material, supplies, and equipment transferred under the foregoing order: Provided further, That typewriters and computing machines transferred to the General Supply Committee as surplus, where such machines have become unfit for further use, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be issued to other Government departments and establishments at exchange prices quoted in the current general schedule of supplies or sold commercially.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I noticed that this paragraph carries one or two provisos, and one of them is continuing in effect an Executive order until the end of the next fiscal year. What is that order? I have not had a chance to read the hearings upon this particular point.

Mr. MADDEN. The order provides that all surplus supplies and materials shall be turned over to this sales committee, and we wanted to be sure that they should be turned over to them, where the different departments could buy the material instead of going out into the market to buy new material.

Mr. WALSH. You mean the General Supply Committee?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And in the absence of that Executive order being continued what would become of it?

Mr. MADDEN. Nobody knows. We wanted to be sure that the General Supply Committee had control over the surplus so that where the departments had to make purchases they must buy from the supply committee instead of going into the open market.

Mr. WALSH. I know; but the fact is we have got a lot of surplus property that is only being handled by Executive order instead of by legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. I think this is being handled by Executive order. There were $1,900,000 of supplies, if I remember, in the possession of the General Supply Committee at the time we held our hearings, and their sales last year amounted to about $1,000,000, if I recall. As the supplies are declared surplus they are transferred into the possession of the General Supply Committee, so that they will have incoming supplies to supply the place of the outgoing supplies all the time; and unless they did it—unless we were certain they had this Executive order in effect—nobody could tell whether they would or not.

Mr. WALSH. What would become of the General Supply Committee?

Mr. MADDEN. They would then go out of existence or have nothing to do.

Mr. WALSH. And that has been all turned over to them—all these desks, furnishings, and so forth?

Mr. MADDEN. They have $1,900,000 of that sort of stuff on hand now, and they are getting it in every day under the Executive order. If the Executive order was to cease, no one knows what would become of the surplus supplies. There can be no harm in establishing that safeguard.

Mr. WALSH. I see. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the necessary number of words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. DUNBAR. I wish to address myself to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. My statement that there would be an increase in expenditures of $155,000,000 for the year 1923 in the Veterans' Bureau was erroneous. I find the appropriations made for the fiscal year 1921 and 1922, as of November 1, 1921, is $155,000,000 less than the estimates for the fiscal year 1923. But in all probability the excess in amount expended by the Veterans' Bureau will be the amount the gentleman from Tennessee stated. I wish to ask him, however, this question: You stated that the total estimated expenditures for 1923, exclusive of the Postal Service, would be slightly in excess of $3,500,000,000. I ask the gentleman where he gets that information?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I got that statement from the message of the President of the United States transmitting the budget.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is the gentleman aware that the amount includes an expenditure for the reduction of the public debt, amounting to $388,000,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I will say to the gentleman that that is an expenditure that is made during the present year as well as next year. I do not know that any particular credit can be taken in 1923 for an appropriation which will take care of the sinking fund.

Mr. DUNBAR. But it should be accounted for in your estimate that is made for the actual operating expense?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly. But that is an expense similar to expenses incurred this year and last year with reference to the sinking fund.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All purchases of typewriting machines during the fiscal year 1923 by executive departments and independent establishments for use in the District of Columbia or in the field, except as hereinafter provided, shall be made from the surplus machines in the stock of the General Supply Committee. The War Department shall furnish the General Supply Committee, immediately upon the approval of this act, a complete inventory of the various makes, models, and classes of typewriters in its possession, the condition of such machines, and the point of storage, and shall turn over to the General Supply Committee such typewriting machines in such quantities as the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time may call for by specific requisition for sale to the various services of the Government. If the General Supply Committee is unable to furnish serviceable machines to any such service of the Government, it shall furnish unserviceable machines at current exchange prices and such machines shall then be applied by the service of the Government receiving them as part payment for new machines from commercial sources in accordance with the prices fixed in the preceding paragraph. And in selling typewriting machines to the various services the General Supply Committee may accept an equal number of unserviceable machines as part payment thereon at the exchange prices quoted in the current general schedule of supplies.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what that provision means, as to selling typewriting machines to the various services. It says:

The general supply committee may accept an equal number of unserviceable machines as part payment thereon at the exchange prices quoted in the general schedule of supplies.

Mr. MADDEN. The various departments have worn-out machines. They may want to get new ones. If they wanted to get a complete new machine and the general supply committee did not have one on hand they would probably have to go into the open market to buy. The general supply committee takes machines that are exchanged by the departments for the ones they sell to the departments and rebuilds them, so that, for example, if the Navy Department wanted to buy a machine that was in the possession of the General Supply Committee they would turn over to the General Supply Committee a machine they had which they were unable to use, and then the General Supply Committee would repair that machine and resell it to some other department when they came in for an exchange. That is what it means.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I do not understand that that is what that provision means.

Mr. MADDEN. If the machines could not be repaired they could not be sold outside or exchanged in commercial trade. They can either be repaired or exchanged.

Mr. WALSH. In selling a typewriting machine to the various services—if they want to sell a typewriting machine to the Treasury Department they can accept one unserviceable machine as part payment?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Now, they could not sell three typewriting machines and accept six as part payment? There must be an equal number of unserviceable machines with those sold?

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is true. It would simply be a trade. If the department wanted one machine that the General Supply Committee had, they would turn in one machine in part payment.

Mr. WALSH. I know; but the department might have 40 or 50 old machines stored away and of no use, and they might have need of only 25 new machines.

Mr. MADDEN. They would be declared surplus in that case, and they would go to the General Supply Committee and be sold through the General Supply Committee.

Mr. WALSH. I know; but there would not be any need for them to do all this if they could exchange these 40 or 50 machines for 20 new ones. Now, you are limiting them to exchanging 20 new ones for 20 unserviceable ones.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the general trend of activity should be along the line that would force the department to declare surplus and put the machines into the hands of the General Supply Committee for a useful purpose.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. When you speak of "dollars," there is a question of $5,000. For instance, we could transfer an automobile from the War Department.

Mr. MADDEN. We have passed that.

Mr. ARENTZ. I want to discuss that.

Mr. MADDEN. That matter has been passed and discussion of it is out of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This paragraph authorizes the War Department "to furnish to the General Supply Committee, immediately on the approval of this act, a complete inventory of typewriters of the various makes, models, and classes." That is the current law. I suppose that has been done. What is the need of requiring the War Department to furnish a new inventory on the passage of this act?

Mr. MADDEN. They may have a lot of surplus on hand, and they may not continue the practice of making an inventory if we do not continue this provision.

Mr. MANN. The existing law says they "shall furnish the General Supply Committee with a complete inventory of the various makes, models, and classes of typewriters in its possession, the condition of such machines, and the point of storage."

Mr. MADDEN. They might buy new ones.

Mr. MANN. I apprehend they will not buy new ones to store. I am very sure that the War Department is not buying new typewriting machines. However, it is immaterial, except for the matter of expense and time in making the new inventories that are copies of the old inventories of material turned over to the General Supply Committee.

Mr. MADDEN. They have had a lot of trouble in getting a complete inventory. Of course, we are trying to help them get it.

Mr. MANN. If they need this, I shall not object, but we ought not to require them to repeat the same thing.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman will recall that when the matter was under discussion during the consideration of the last appropriation bill the quantity that the Government had on hand at that time was stated to be somewhere between 200,000 and 2,000,000, and we attempted then to find out how many they had, because we wanted to find out how many were going into this supply department to enter into competition with machines now being made.

Mr. MADDEN. The department now has 12,000 typewriting machines, 9,000 of which are serviceable and 3,000 unserviceable and about 400 in a very bad state of decay.

Mr. SNYDER. I have no interest in it now, because I understand the figures here are a compromise between the governmental authorities and the manufacturers themselves. If they are satisfied, of course I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of commissioner of accounts and deposits: Commissioner of accounts and deposits, $6,000; accountant, $4,000; principal clerk, $2,500; clerk, $2,000; stenographer, $1,800; messenger, $840; in all, $17,140.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 12, line 12, after the word "deposits," strike out "$6,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,500."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, if we refer to the record preceding the war and to the developments of organizations in the Treasury Department during the period of the war we will find that this office was developed entirely within the period of the war. Prior to that time it had no existence under a title like this. Whether there is permanent law behind it or not I do not know. In fact, I do not care. The point I wish to make is this, that the expense for the heads of this division and the Division of Deposits, together with the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, before the war amounted approximately to $9,000, while we have here for this one office $6,000 for the commissioner of accounts and deposits and $4,000 for an accountant. In other words, two of the officers in this division carry more expense than the heads of the three divisions required prior to the war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What does this commissioner do? I do not know exactly.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The hearings outline that quite clearly. He handles questions relating to deposits in banks, keeping practically the record of the amounts of certain deposits and the records in connection with the public debt. I will not take the time to review that, but let me call attention to this central fact: Prior to the war we had the Division of Public Moneys, which had charge of this question of deposits. The Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants handled a portion of the work that has been subtracted and handed over to this commissioner of deposits. The work assigned to the commissioner of accounts and deposits now is the work that belonged before to the Division of Public Moneys and the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants. Note, now, the inconsistency in salary. Drop down to the next paragraph, Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, chief of division, $4,000. That chief performs far more difficult and important work than does the commissioner of accounts and deposits. I speak of that which I know from an examination of the records and the methods of the business.

Turn, if you please, now, to the Division of Deposits. That is on page 13. Chief of division, $3,500. That division now handles a portion of the work segregated from the former Division of Public Moneys; so that the Division of Public Moneys was divided up and two divisions are made here, costing more than ten times what it cost to do the same work prior to the war. Oh, you say that there is more detail work to be done. That belongs to subordinates, and not to those who manage and supervise divisions. It practically means this, that this division, commissioner of accounts and deposits, has been created not entirely from public necessity. I will not add anything beyond that. I know the circumstances. I know the influences behind the whole thing.

Mr. SNYDER. Tell us what they are.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. On page 14 you have another proposition, in line 7, where I will offer an amendment in due course. Commissioner of the Public Debt, $6,000. Then below, assistant, $3,500. Here again you have carved out of the old Division of Public Moneys part of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, and put here practically three new divisions in connection with the public debt and these deposits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks permission to speak for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman stating that he has some information relative to the influences behind the retention of these particular officers other than what is contained in the hearings?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I have; but I am not going to give it. I stand on the record in the hearings.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is the excuse given for putting the salary of the Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits at $6,000, while the salary of the Chief of the Bookkeeping Division is $4,000, and the salary of the Chief of the Deposit Division is $3,500, and the salary of the Chief of the Division of Loans and Currency is $3,500? What is the excuse given for making this difference in salaries?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The work to be done is about equal to $3,500, considering the ordinary increases for other grades beyond the ordinary clerks, in the salaries fixed elsewhere.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but what is the excuse given by the department for recommending a salary of $3,500 for the Chief of the Division of Deposits and a salary of $6,000 for the Commissioner of Loans and Deposits?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I can not answer that. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can. I see no valid reason for it. I think the $6,000 should be stricken out and the amount placed at $3,500.

Mr. MANN. Can not the gentleman tell us the excuse they offered?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I have not the reason in connection with that. I am satisfied that it is more a matter of precedent and of certain forces which were in operation at the time these things were done.

Now, take the question of the details of the work in the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants. Note, if you please, that in the hearings the Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits says that he received certain information from the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, and he conveys the idea that he has a kind of supervisory influence over that division. Not so in actual practice, to my personal knowledge. He gets the data from the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, the only division that can furnish the facts. Then he tabulates that work and is merely a statistical clerk in so doing. I know both of the men at the heads of these divisions. I am not offering personal criticism in relation to either of them, but I want it understood that the Commissioner of Accounts is doing practically duplication of work wherever he goes, compared with these other divisions that we have now.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not see what reason can be given for all three of these different departments, nor can I see that this commissioner of accounts does anything except bookkeeping work.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Practically so; and he borrows the facts from people who study the law and make an analysis and hand the facts over to him.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Therefore it seems to me clearly that the office ought to be dispensed with entirely and the duties assigned to these other Divisions of Bookkeeping and Warrants and Loans and Currency.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I had hoped the chairman of the committee would see his way clear to offer that proposition, but, as he does not desire to destroy the organization in the department, I thought I would be charitable in offering these amendments which would help us to save some money and bring out the facts.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will not be adopted. I think the office is one of the most important offices in the Government service. The Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits has an important office. What does he do? He has to keep track of the amounts of money on deposit in all the Federal reserve banks, so that the Treasurer himself may know where to find the money to meet the obligations from day to day. He must make up all lists of obligations existing, find out where the money may be transferred to or from to meet the obligations of the Government in the various sections of the country. He must keep an account of the investments of money received by the Veterans' Bureau from insurance; he has charge of the investment of the funds held in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian; he has charge of very important functions, and I certainly do not believe that there should be any amendment adopted affecting the existing organization in an important branch of the Treasury Department like this without full knowledge on our part. How can we tell? We can not tell whether this man ought to get $10,000 or $3,000. It is for the Secretary of the Treasury to say what the value of the services of this officer is. From investigations I have made of the importance of his duties, I conclude that $6,000 is not too high compensation to be paid to him.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not yet see the necessity of these separate divisions. Why should it not be put under the Division of Deposits? He has simply to deposit the funds.

Mr. MADDEN. He must keep a record of the details of deposits, payments, everything connected with the Treasury Department, so that the Treasurer may know from day to day what payments have to be made and where the money is to come from.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The greater part of it has to be done by the Division of Deposits.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not that the same service that he has always performed? How has his service increased?

Mr. MADDEN. The man in charge of the division of deposits only keeps track of the money on deposit in the various banks of the country belonging to the United States Government. This man has the varied and important functions that I have described to perform, and it is necessary that he should be up to the minute with information so that there will be no chance of any mistake being made at any hour of the day. This is no child's play. It may seem easy, and may be easy for the man that is doing it, if he knows his business. Put a man in that position that does not know his business, take away the compensation to which he is entitled and prevent him from keeping the place and turning the work over to someone who knows nothing about it, and you will create a bad condition of things. I do not believe it is for us to say as to the wisdom of the organization of the department. At any rate, I do not believe we ought to say whether it is wise or unwise unless we know. If we know we can decide, but it will not do for us in this way, by an amendment offered to a pending bill, to decide that we know better what ought to be done than those who have the responsibility resting upon them after long years of experience.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Who is this officer the gentleman speaks of? What is his name?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know the name of any of these officers of the Government, and thank God, I do not know. I do not want to know.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me ask the gentleman why they propose to increase the salary to almost double?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no increase, it is just the same salary.

Mr. BUTLER. The same as it was prior to the war?

Mr. MADDEN. It was not in existence prior to the war. It is an office that became necessary during the war and the Government now has all the functions to perform through the Treasury Department that it had during the war.

Mr. BUTLER. We ought not to be asked to increase the salary unless it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. MADDEN. We are not increasing the salary.

Mr. BUTLER. Can not we get along without this division?

Mr. MADDEN. I will ask my friend from Pennsylvania how can we say whether we ought to abolish the office or not?

Mr. BUTLER. If I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations I would ask the question.

Mr. MADDEN. We have asked all kinds of questions, and I commend the hearings to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to read.

Mr. BUTLER. But I have no time to read the hearings; it is the gentleman's place to tell us about it and give us the information.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think there is much in what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has said. We do not know at this time what ought to be done. My idea would be that the whole division ought to be abolished and consolidated with the other two departments or divisions of bookkeeping and warrants and division of deposits. But the gentleman from Illinois is right. We have not the information before us so that we may know whether that ought to be the proper course or not. We do not know what the effect of it would be and no one is able to state here what the duties of the office are.

Mr. MADDEN. I stated what the duties of the office were.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What the chairman stated was a mere matter of bookkeeping, which could be done for $1,800 a year.

Mr. MADDEN. We can not get these duties performed by anybody for $1,800 a year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. All he has to do is to keep track of the funds.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This officer has supervision of the other two divisions to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] showed fairly conclusively that that was not the case.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that in a matter of this importance we ought to give some attention to what the Treasury Department says in reference to the duties of this division. The statement was made that this man is at the head of this division and has supervisory authority over the other two divisions. In addition to that, I regard this particular position as one of the most important in the Treasury Department. We had a billion-dollar debt before the war; we now have an indebtedness of $23,000,000,000. This particular official has charge not only of keeping track of the investments of securities of the Government but he is also in charge of the duty of keeping track of the investments of Government insurance funds, which is a very large amount, and also the funds of the Alien Property Custodian, which amount to hundreds of millions of dollars. It seems to me it is beside the question when we say that an officer of this importance to the Treasury Department is drawing too much when he gets $6,000 a year, especially when those over whom he has supervision get $3,500.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield, although I would like to have a little of my own time for myself.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Before the war all of this work was done through the Division of Public Moneys, the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, and the Division of Loans and Currency. This Commissioner of Deposits and Accounts must from the nature of things get his data through other divisions, and he does not act upon policy. He is little more than a statistician, a bookkeeper, and the force under him proves that he can not be any more than that.

Mr. MADDEN. But there was an indebtedness of only $1,000,000,000 before the war.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I understand that, but this man does not handle the bonded indebtedness.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He does not have anything to do with that.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. And you propose a salary of $6,000 for the Commissioner of Public Debt and a salary of $3,500 for the Chief of the Division of Loans and Currency.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas). The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have two minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. These divisions did the work before, and this is carved out and put into that place.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] in their conclusions, but not in their premises. I agree that we have not sufficient information before us at this time to act on this matter, but I want to say that this is one of the matters that ought to have been taken up by the Director of the Budget.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Absolutely.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I had heard very much at the time the budget proposal was before us about the consolidation of these departments and doing away with unnecessary duplication. I am absolutely satisfied that there is unnecessary duplication. Just how it ought to be handled I do not know, but I do not think we have testimony before us to determine at this time, and in that respect I agree with my friend from Illinois and the gentleman from Tennessee. I hope that such matters in the future will receive further and more attention from the officer who is especially charged with the duty of examining into it.

Mr. MADDEN. We will undertake that ourselves.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment pending is to reduce the salary carried in the bill for the commissioner of accounts and deposits from $6,000 to $3,500. I do not know but that the salary ought to be a little bit more than that.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Not now. The bill provides a salary for the Chief of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants of $4,000, for the Chief of the Division of Deposits of $3,500, for the Chief of the Division of Loans and Currency $3,500, and for the Commissioner of the Public Debt $6,000. Gentlemen defending the item in the bill have given to this Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits all of the work that these other chiefs do, and if he is competent to do the work of all of the other chiefs, perhaps he ought to have the $6,000, but in that event there is no occasion for the other chiefs. Just what his duties are I do not know. Nobody seems to know except my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and, of course, all he knows is from the record.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true. I would like to read——

Mr. MANN. No. It is perfectly patent that this salary is out of proportion to the other salaries paid by the Government. The Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits is to receive a salary of $6,000, the accountant in his office $4,000, the principal clerk in his office $2,500, a clerk $2,000, a stenographer $1,800, a messenger $840, and they constitute his whole office. He has only two clerks under him. He has an accountant who does the work at a salary in excess of the ordinary salary paid by the Government for similar work. Everyone knows how this salary came to be this amount. It is one of the salaries created by the official of the Government having a lump-sum appropriation during or following the war, when the dollar-a-year men who came here asked higher salaries than were being paid by the Government. I have no complaint. I think we pay rather too low salaries to these men in the main. The only way that we can get any consideration of this matter is by reducing in this bill the salary carried, and then there will be plenty of explanation given to the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate and the Members of the House as to why the salary ought to be what it is to be. We will know then what the office is and how important it is. We will never know in any other way.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that before this salary is increased somewhere else some reason for it will be given?

Mr. MANN. Before it is accepted by the House some reason will be given, I imagine, if it is decreased here.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it seems that no one understands what the duties of this man are. I tried to explain what they are a short time ago, but evidently nobody understood me. I shall read now what his duties are:

> The duties are of two general classes; first, supervisory, as to the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, the Division of Deposits, and certain of the transactions in the office of the Treasurer of the United States which are related to the Accounts and Deposits activities in these other divisions, and, in addition, I am responsible to the Undersecretary for the public-debt statement issued each month by the Government, and the statement of securities owned by the United States Government, which is shown on the back of that statement.

He also has the individual accounts of the railroads in connection with the transportation act of 1920. He has all the detailed accounts of the loans to the railroads from the $300,000,000 revolving fund appropriation in the transportation act, and the duties in connection with the collection of the principal and the interest on those loans, sending out advanced notices of amounts due, and seeing that the money is collected and deposited in the Federal reserve banks to the credit of the Treasury, so that they may have control over the situation when the vital need comes. He has in custody accounts for all securities kept with the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, and securities accepted from other Government departments, as the Treasury offers the facilities of the Federal reserve banks to each department for the safe-keeping of securities and collection at maturity. He has the accounts of the investments that the Secretary is responsible for under the law, among which are the investments of the Government life insurance fund under the Veterans' Bureau that have to be made from time to time as funds become available from the premiums on converted insurance. He has at the present time about $43,000,000 of those investments which are made from time to time in lots of $100,000 and up as fast as the funds become available. He has charge of the investment funds held by the Alien Property Custodian, and he has charge from time to time of the most part of the Treasury certificates of indebtedness. As they mature the funds have to be reinvested. The Treasury certificates can not be issued for a longer period of maturity than one year, and the reinvestment of the funds causes work from time to time in that connection. The investment amounts to about $160,000,000, and so on and so on until the end of the chapter.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman must certainly be a wizard to do all that with three men.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Why do they need anybody else?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. At least one-half of these duties that are being read here I know are performed more or less by other parties, but the others I do not know about, but even then I wonder how he can get through with three men.

Mr. MADDEN. All of this simply includes the functions that come under his jurisdiction, and, of course, the details are something about which we can not know definitely.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Is it a fact that the jurisdiction with reference to railroad advances has been taken from one of the assistant secretaries and placed under the supervision of this commissioner?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I told the gentleman what I was told as being the duties.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. Do I understand this Commissioner of Accounts is really the head of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants in the Division of Deposits?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no; I did not say that. I simply stated what his duties were, and those duties are multifarious.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 25, noes 33.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Salaries: Chief of division, $3,500; assistant chief of division, $2,500; clerks—1 $2,250, 1 $2,000, 1 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 1 of class 2; messenger, $840; in all, $17,490.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to address the House out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, one who attempts to curb the excess of Government printing is, I presume, in the position of Mrs. Partington, who tried with her broom to sweep back the sea. But a few things are happening from time to time in the Government printing which should be called to the attention of Members. I have here, and I would like to have Members see it, a publication of the Federal Board of Vocational Education entitled "Diary of Home-making Activities," just printed. Two pages are printed and the other 10 pages are blank with space for making out the diaries.

The instructions on the first page say that the home maker is to write down just what she does through the day, and she is asked to sit down three or four times a day and make a note of everything she has been doing—even the little things that seem of no account. It particularly urges her to be careful to include the little services, for, as it says, "They seem little to you but multiplied they become large." These are to be sent to farmers' wives and the wives of mechanics, the plain people. Of course we all know that woman's work is never done, and that no diary can report her necessary daily activities. Here is a sample diary for a day written out as a guide:

Saturday, November 5: 6.30 to 7 dressed self; waked husband; opened doors and windows downstairs; prepared breakfast. 7 to 7.30 ate breakfast; planned evening party with husband; called children. 7.30 to 8 dressed baby; combed Alice's hair; helped Billy put on his overalls; gave children breakfast. 8.30 to 9 put kitchen and dining room in order. 9 to 9.30 gave baby his bath and planned luncheon and dinner. 9.30 to 10 put house in order. 10 to 10.30 gathered peas out of the garden. 10.30 to 12 minded baby; mended husband's shirt; hunted his tie; washed and ironed waist. 12 to 1 gave children luncheon. 1 to 1.30 inquired about sick neighbor; planned the afternoon for the children; punished Billy for hurting Alice.

And so on. [Laughter.]

Why is this being done? I will try to explain. I want——

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can not yield in five minutes. I am sorry. Here is a companion to this publication of the diary for the plain people. This other sample diary is not from the Federal end of the vocational training institution, which as you know is one of our 50–50 propositions—half Federal and half State. The diary from which I just read is from the Federal end. The next one is from the State end—one of the States—and it is a diary to be kept by married women who have received college educations. It goes further than the one for farmers' wives. The college-bred wives are asked to tell what they did and why they did it. The trick is to get the mental operation. The instructions say that they need not give their names for the following reason. I quote:

5. Since every person thinks about things which she is reluctant to mention, we have safeguarded your identity by not asking you to sign your name. But if with this safeguard there are still items which you do not list, we ask you to make a mental note of them and to indicate in the place provided on the supplementary information sheet the kinds of things you are reluctant to enter.

That is going pretty far for information. Women with college education are asked to report what they did and why they did it. Here is printed a sample diary page:

7.30: Dressed, prepared breakfast.
9.30: Lay flat on my back and read the paper.

She gives as the reason she did that was because she was tired and curious to read the news and had finished the morning routine. [Laughter.]

9.45: A neighbor came in to show me her new coat and gown—I admired them—we discussed clothes and husbands.

The reason was:

I knew she wanted me to. The subjects interest her.

[Laughter.]

10.15: Hunted for Italian address book.
10.45: Wrote secretary's minutes for Unitarian Alliance. Cleaned out jets in Reznor stove in bathroom.

The reason she did that was this:

My husband had said they needed it to get full strength of gas.

Next she—

Wrote a letter to a library student.
Helped our chameleon change his skin.

[Laughter.]

The reason she did that is right here in the document. She says:

I am very fond of him and enjoy cheering him up.

[Laughter.]

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. I simply want to say that I do not think the House of Representatives ought to laugh at that, considering the fact that they recently voted for and took on the maternity bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is something to that. And in that connection I am afraid, gentlemen, that through the various 50–50 plans, 50–50 for one thing and 50–50 for another, that we have plunged into something that will carry us a long, long way from the noblest conception of popular self-government; 50–50, neither Hamiltonian nor Jeffersonian, and the end is not yet.

When I received this sample diary, I went over to the building of the Federal Board for Vocational Training, which is in the Maltby Building, to attempt to secure some information. What did I find? Why, first, that I was in an independent establishment of the Government. And these words "independent establishment" mean something, mark that. I will explain if I have time. But I found something else, which was that the paid board members—two out of the three, at least—and all of the heads of the bureaus, except one, maybe two, are out in Kansas City, where they are having a vocational education annual convention. It is, of course, a big event, and speeches are to be made, and all that.

A MEMBER. Out there at Federal expense?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why, of course, and on the business of the Federal Government and the States' government—50–50—and will undoubtedly make progress in vocational education.

But I found an assistant chief. She is an enthusiast. They are all enthusiasts, no matter which bureau or what service. She gave me what information she could. The 5,000 home activities diary did not cost much—$61.10, that is all—but she could not say what the next printing expense would be after the diary reports are in. She goes next week to Milwaukee, then back to Connecticut and Vermont, thence to Montana in March, and on to the north Pacific coast. I talked with others. In some manner I seemed to gain the impression that it is no business of Congress to concern itself very much about the printing bill of an independent establishment, for is it not half Government and half State?

Mr. WALSH. What would they do should Congress refuse to appropriate the Federal 50 per cent?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Ah, then we will be assaulting roads, or education, or health, or whatever the 50–50 proposition might be.

I see we are having some trouble of another kind with an independent establishment, the Federal Reserve Board, in relation to the erection of public buildings. I notice from the papers that the board has suspended its work on the construction of buildings for the Federal reserve banks until it can get authority from Congress. The buildings are either completed, half finished, or started, and I suppose we will at this late date be compelled to authorize the work. Of course, the banks are not on the 50–50 plan but on the per cent profit plan, but apparently just outside of control of the representatives of the people—and this is a representative form of government.

As a matter of fact, I am beginning to believe that we as a Government have gone about as far as we can go on the 50–50 schemes. I can see how they develop, each and every one with some good end for the people in view, each one developed by bright-visioned enthusiasts who want to help the people, geniuses at the head of governmental bureaus who, having exhausted the possibility of getting more money from the Federal Treasury through Congress, design the plan by which they reach out and get the money from the rainbow's end out in the States, forgetful of the fact that it all comes from the same taxpayers. But the taxpayers must see that they pay these days State taxes and Federal taxes and on top of these taxes 50–50 taxes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. What connection does this diary of the ordinary housewife and the college-educated housewife have with the problems of vocational education?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is the interesting part, and I will try to answer. I have diverted. Now, I will be very frank and, I hope, fair. These diaries were printed only to the number of 5,000. They are to be sent out through the various official channels, and it is presumed that not more than 1,000 will come back. If the Vocational Board gets a thousand back, it says it will do well. No return franked envelope is sent out with the diary blanks in order to get them back.

My informant—the assistant over there—says if they get a thousand back as to what farm wives and workingmen's wives did during every minute of a busy day, they—the board—will be able to form a curriculum for educating young girls along the line of what the most women have to do according to these 1,000 reports. They said to me, almost in these words, that if enough wives reported that they took some time to cut papa's pants down for Willie, they hoped to show the necessity for having a study on the remaking of papa's pants in the curriculum. I asked, "Suppose enough women report that they spent half an hour a week in the making of fudge, would they have to have a fudge-making class in the economics schools?" The reply was "No;" that they did not believe in teaching fudge making. That is where modern grammar schools beat them.

Mr. WALSH. What would happen if they entered in the diary that they spanked Willie every morning? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It follows that they would have to have the spanking business brought into the curricula of vocational education, and give regular instruction along that important line. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. And the Government would probably have to furnish the shingles?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Possibly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now, all this is under what they are proud to call, and do call, the Smith-Hughes Act, one of the 50–50's. It is all designed for a great purpose. They said to me, "We are going to find out whether the women spend their time making bread when they might be buying it cheaper at the bakeries." And I had the pleasure of answering that in some parts of my district if they did not bake their own bread, way out in the mountains, away from the cities, they would have no bread. They said that would come in these reports. I asked how 5,000 copies were going to circulate among the States, and it developed that all the States have adopted the 50–50 plan for vocational training. It also developed that most of the officers of the organization are put on the road three-fourths of every year, and that they receive $5 a day for traveling expenses, whereas in our Immigration Service and in the Internal-Revenue Service the men on the road must get along with $4 a day.

They argued to me—and I think with some justice—that a man getting $4 a day when he is out on the Government service may turn in voucher showing $4 a day spent traveling. The assumption is that he had to spend the $4, whereas these people who get $5 a day have to turn in an itemized account, and they said that only in a few cases had they been able to live on the $5, and that it was a waste for the Government to have a large number of bookkeepers and clerks engaged in analyzing these accounts to see whether they had properly expended the $5. I agree with them on that. As a matter of fact, if a vocational educational trainer can travel around on $5 a day, is it not a pity to send, for instance, the Commissioner General of Immigration out to Chicago and give him only $4 a day to live on at a good hotel in Chicago?

Mr. MANN. There is one good thing about it. It shortens up the travel. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I notice, however, that out in my country that when our delightful summer time comes and in that great playground of the world, and the road to Alaska is open there is an exceedingly large number of Government employees—both the 50–50 kind and the regular kind—who find it to the interest of the Government for them to go out that way, even at the modest per diem of $4.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will recall that during the Panama Canal Exposition at San Francisco nearly every Government official under the administration at that time discovered that he had business to be out at San Francisco at Government expense. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desired to discuss waste in printing; I have digressed. We are busy. We have before us the first of the annual appropriation bills. We can not all take the time to get around to these independent establishments of the Government. It will pay Members of Congress to do so. It will pay to watch just how far the independent establishments go. They are very nice about it. When they get out of bounds it is almost impossible to get them back. That is what is making the trouble with so much of the Government printing just now. It ran wild, first in one place and then in another, until heroic methods had to be used to call a halt. No Member of Congress, certainly not myself, desires to strike down any of the good publications.

I desire to say that I think the useful and valuable publications will be quickly restored. I have introduced a bill to that end. I ask Members to look at it, and study it. In the meantime your Committee on Printing will strive to strike down the wasteful ones, the unnecessary ones, and the foolish ones. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] in his very interesting statement referred to the expenditures by commissions under the 50–50 plan. He referred to the statement in the newspapers this morning as to expenditures of the Federal Reserve Board, but the fact is that the expenditures of that board are not made upon any 50–50 plan.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I admit that, of course.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. After a dividend of 6 per cent has been paid to the member banks as stockholders the law provides that the net earnings shall be paid to the United States as a franchise tax, with a proviso that one-half of such net earnings shall be paid into a surplus fund until it equals the paid-in capital. To the extent that the board engages in extravagance, they lessen the amount that is returned to the Treasury. The gentleman is correct in stating that the press announces that the board has ordered a suspension of construction of some bank buildings heretofore authorized. This is good news. It is remarkable that the board states that the reason for the suspension is that an amendment has been introduced by a Senator from Georgia prohibiting such construction until authorized by Congress. It is the first time I have seen such evidence of desire on the part of the Federal Reserve Board to consider the views of Members of Congress. For some reason they now do not wait for action of the Congress, but merely because an amendment is offered to a bill not pending in the Senate, but pending before a committee, they have ordered a suspension of their building program throughout the country. I care not what reason actuated them; I rejoice at the suspension. But unfortunately it does not provide for a suspension of construction of the building at New York, and it is my opinion that the real reason for the suspension announcement this morning is that they have finally awakened to the view the country entertains of their action, and the criticism of the country is due in great part to the building they have approved for the reserve bank in New York City.

Yesterday I read a letter which the Speaker of the House sent to his constituents, in which he stated that though he knew a new public building was needed at Springfield, Mass., and had been needed for some time, that in view of the financial condition of the Treasury and of the country the Congress could not pass a public building bill. For eight years Congress has refrained from passing such a bill, and throughout the country there are many cities where there is necessity for the construction of buildings. But Congress having some regard for the taxpayers has refused to pass such a bill, insisting that the people make sacrifices.

The last public building bill, passed about nine years ago, carried an appropriation of some $40,000,000, as I recall, for buildings throughout the entire country. Now we have the Federal Reserve Board approving a bank building at New York City which, according to their report to the Senate, will cost, with the annex, more than $25,000,000. They state that the furniture will cost $800,000. In this building they propose to have a gymnasium, an auditorium to seat 1,000 people, occupying 4,600 square feet, applying this space in a building on Wall Street to an auditorium for educational purposes. Club quarters are to occupy 4,400 square feet. The fees of the architect and engineer will amount to $1,106,000, enough to construct public buildings in several cities where buildings are badly needed at this time and which are not appropriated for by Congress because Members of Congress have some regard for the taxpayers at this time. Yet this board, beyond the restraint of Congress, authorizes the construction of one building for $25,000,000, which amount might otherwise be paid into the Treasury as franchise tax.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, the gentleman is not conveying the idea that the money for these buildings is a direct tax on the people?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Indirectly it is a tax.

Mr. SNYDER. It is paid out of the earnings of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; but if those sums are not so paid out, they would be turned into the Federal Treasury and thus relieve the taxpayers of the country by that much. The gentleman does not contest my statement on that, does he?

Mr. SNYDER. No. But what I rose to ask was whether the gentleman was certain about his facts as to why the reserve board was discontinuing the construction of these buildings. Does the gentleman realize that the reason for it is that whereas one year ago to-day the earning assets credited to the Federal reserve banks were something like three and one-half billions, they are now down to about one billion?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that the only information I have is that which is contained in the Associated Press dispatches of the morning, in which the governor of the Reserve Board is quoted as stating that it was to be discontinued because of the introduction in the Senate of a bill by the Senator from Georgia with reference to that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to speak for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman did not read that story, I will state to him that the governor of the Reserve Board says, further, that he had received a letter from Mr. Hoover stating that it was desirable to engage in public building work throughout the country at this time in order to relieve unemployment, but that he could not grant that request because of the introduction of this amendment in the Senate.

Mr. SNYDER. I have no doubt that that was the statement, but what I was trying to get at was the real reason.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. The question of the cancellation of contracts was not entered into in that connection, was it?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No. I am simply repeating the Associated Press statement of this morning, and I have given the substance of it. Whether they have canceled contracts, I do not know.

Mr. McFADDEN. My understanding is that they simply discontinue operations on buildings that are not started or under contract. The New York building is already under contract, and it can not be stopped. Each one of these Federal reserve banks has the right under the law to put up buildings. As a matter of courtesy, the Federal Reserve Board has passed on each one of them.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not yield to the gentleman for a statement. I agree that the Federal reserve banks, of course, have the legal right to put up buildings and to pay present salaries, but the salaries that they are paying would never in this world be authorized by this Congress. Nobody can defend them, if they will look at the statement.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What are those salaries? Can the gentleman give them?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not go into the detailed figures, but there are 20 officers, whose salaries from the time of their employment, have increased 500 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What are those salaries?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. One of $50,000, three at $30,000, one at $25,000, one at $20,000, two at $18,000, three at $15,000, four at $12,000, and five at $10,000. There are 20 officers with salaries over $10,000 and many more just a little less than $10,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. In comparison with the salaries paid to other bank officers, is it not a fact that the salaries paid to the Federal reserve officers are less?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not know.

Mr. McFADDEN. Well, it is a fact.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It would depend entirely on the banks. And the fact is that other banks like the National City Bank do business with the individual, while the reserve bank deals only with banks. And the National City has correspondent banks all over this country and abroad, while the New York Reserve Bank deals only with banks in that one district. In order that we may have a chance to consider it, I am going to introduce a bill providing that hereafter the Federal Reserve Board shall submit to the Bureau of the Budget for presentation to Congress the estimates of expenses of operating these banks, and for the salaries for their employees, so that Congress will have some power to restrain them. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that at this time when the people learn, as they are learning day by day, that our Government, through the Federal Reserve Board, is putting up a bank building in New York at a cost of $25,000,000, with a gymnasium and club quarters and an auditorium to seat a thousand people, and when they learn of the salaries that are being paid it will do more to incite what you call bolshevism that you talk about so much on this floor than any other thing. They are being told that the amount the board intends to put into one building is more than is being loaned for agricultural purposes in 15 States. All the States are striving to cut down appropriations for State purposes, and when they learn of this expenditure they lose heart. To-day this New York bank pays for rent, light, and heat $300,000. Now, they propose to pay $25,000,000 for a bank building on which they will pay more taxes than they now pay rent. Last year when people were suffering from the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, the reserve banks made more than 100 per cent upon their capital. Now the people learn that the profits derived from interest rates that contributed to their financial ruin are to be spent in erecting $25,000,000 bank buildings.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LUCE. Does the gentleman understand that the Federal reserve system is a national organization?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am not going to discuss the organization. I know that the Federal Reserve Board in their report to the Senate said these proposals for buildings must be submitted to them and approved by them, and it is because they approved those buildings that I criticize them. I can not enter into a discussion of the Federal reserve act. I know that member banks own the stock in it, but I know that the Federal Reserve Board, appointed by the President, not the banks, exercises supervisory power, and that exercising such supervisory power it approved the construction of this building. The board approved the construction of a $25,000,000 building at a time when this House and when the gentleman himself would not vote for a public building bill to put up necessary buildings, and yet the board, beyond restraint from Congress, go ahead and construct costly buildings over the country, and for doing that they properly deserve the criticism of the people. If they did not spend that money it would revert to the Treasury, and to that extent there would be that much more money in the Treasury, and you would not have to devote so much time searching for new sources of revenue. The President of the United States alone has the power to bring the pressure upon this board, and he should call upon them to change the plans of this New York building so as to cause a reduction in the cost of this bank building in New York City. It was unnecessary to buy a lot on Wall Street, at a cost of $4,500,000, or to plan a $25,000,000 building, and such extravagance at this time of financial depression deserves, and will receive, the condemnation of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC DEBT SERVICE.

For necessary expenses connected with the administration of any public debt issues and United States paper currency issues with which the Secretary of the Treasury is charged, including rent in the District of Columbia, and including the salaries of the Commissioner of the Public Debt at $6,000, Chief of the Division of Loans and Currency at $3,500, two Assistant Chiefs of the Division of Loans and Currency at $3,000 each, Register of the Treasury at $4,000, Assistant Register of the Treasury at $2,500, Chief of the Division of Public Debt Accounts and Audit at $3,000, and the salaries of such assistants, accountants, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, $3,700,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except as above provided and except the following: Two at not exceeding $4,500, 1 at not exceeding $3,500, 10 at not exceeding $3,000, 4 at not exceeding $2,700, 23 at not exceeding $2,500, 1 at not exceeding $2,400, 5 at not exceeding $2,250, 26 at not exceeding $2,200, and 48 at not exceeding $2,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may allot such amount of this appropriation as in his judgment may be necessary, not exceeding $100,000, for expenditure in the Post Office Department in connection with the distribution, sale, and keeping of accounts of Treasury savings securities, as provided in the deficiency appropriation act approved November 4, 1918, and no person shall be employed under such allotment at a rate of compensation exceeding $2,500 per annum, and only one person shall be employed at a rate exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Not until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his point of order. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 9, after the word "each," strike out all the words and figures down and to the word "chief" in line 10.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the words to be stricken out are as follows: "The Register of the Treasury at $4,000, Assistant Register of the Treasury at $2,500."

I had intended to introduce an amendment in line 7 to strike out $6,000 and insert $5,000. I think it is unwise as a matter of policy to make appropriations for heads of divisions larger than the salary paid to the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury. That, however, I pass because of the vote a few moments ago. Now, with reference to the Register of the Treasury. Some years ago a reorganization of the work in the department was made under the Treasury by the Secretary of the Treasury, and nearly all of the important work belonging to the office of Register of the Treasury was transferred to other agencies. From that time to this the office of the Register of the Treasury is a mere perfunctory affair. It stands, however, under provisions of law that render considerable embarrassment in the accounting work of the Government.

While the accounting offices were under the administrative control of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Register of the Treasury, supported by the Secretary, declined to deliver to the Auditor for the Treasury Department the vouchers which the law says that auditor should have. The auditor, however, without any legal authority to override that ruling of the department was compelled to accept the situation and do the best he could. The Register of the Treasury still declines to deliver to the auditor or the controller general vouchers of the public debt account that the accounting officers should have.

Now, if you note the fact that the work of the Register of the Treasury has been practically removed and assigned to another agency you will see that it now stands as a mere skeleton. What should be done? Why, that office should be abolished. The clerks now handling the work should be distributed to the offices to which these vouchers legally belong. You could thereby save all of the overhead and reduce the clerical force to a considerable extent. You have here a duplication again in the department work that ought to have been singled out by the Bureau of the Budget and recommended for discontinuance. Another commission, the Commission to Reorganize the Executive Departments, could well take this question into account and when their report comes forward this agency should disappear.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to say that that committee, of which I happen to be a member, has not been called together since last June, nor have the members of that committee—at least so far as I am concerned—had any information from the chairman of the committee since that date. The chairman of that committee is not a Member of Congress, but is a gentleman appointed by the President to cooperate with the committee, and by the committee itself or a majority of the committee made its chairman. So, as I say, the committee has had no meeting, and there has been an unbroken silence for over six months.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I was quite aware of the fact stated by the gentleman from Virginia, and I am very glad to have him offer the suggestion. I believe a sufficient number of us, however, have faith in the doctrine of the resurrection, and possibly this committee on reorganization may be resurrected. Possibly the Committee on Appropriations, possibly the department itself, may find their way clear to come in with a specific recommendation for legislation that will remove the useless expense and provide for an adjustment of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that I was impressed by what the gentleman said about the duties of the Register of the Treasury and that many of them had been turned over to these other divisions. As I recall, the law specifically imposes on the Register of the Treasury certain duties. Now, if we abolish the office by failing to appropriate the salary for the Register of the Treasury, what authority would the Secretary of the Treasury have to designate other officials to perform duties which are specifically imposed upon the Register of the Treasury. I think if we abolish the office we should do it by a legislative bill and not on an appropriation bill, but we ought to give the matter very careful consideration before anything is done.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether his committee has a provision of that sort in contemplation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has not. The Appropriations Committee is not a legislative committee.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. May it not offer a friendly suggestion to the legislative committee that has jurisdiction of the matter?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is performing that function right now much better than I could possibly do.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. With the aid of the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Illinois, I hope we will bring something out of this question by and by. Gentlemen, this is a proposition that ought to have been settled five years ago. We have been running year in and year out with useless expenses aggregating at least $25,000 a year, and we ought to have abolished it long ago. I called attention to this matter for the purpose of emphasizing it. I may not be able to write a law, but as Horace said about writing poetry, I may be the whetstone for the man who can.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Is not there some provision of law by which the Register of the Treasury has to sign the currency that is issued?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes; he signs one, and then they make a plate for all the others.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. You would have to substitute some one for that duty.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. But that could be readily provided for in the bill, of course.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I wanted to take the floor in my own right.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman from Illinois is going to take the floor in his own right and is going to tell us just how he proposes to work this out. Therefore I shall yield back the remainder of my five minutes in order that he may begin while he is in the humor.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is a very commendable function that the gentleman from Nebraska is performing. We are anxious to economize in every way we can, and every suggestion made by any Member of the House naturally calls the subject more emphatically to our attention. But I submit to the House that we ought not to act without deliberation on questions of as great importance as this. The paragraph before us is that which deals with the public-debt service. The public-debt service is a great service. It became a tremendously important service during the war, and it has lost none of its importance since that time. When the war came on it was provided in the authority for the issuance of various securities by the Secretary of the Treasury that payments should be made out of the moneys received from the sales of these securities, and it ran into the hundreds of millions of dollars. There was no special fund appropriated to pay those who were engaged in this branch of the public service, except as the money to pay them was taken out of the revenues collected from the sale of war securities. There are four different functions in connection with the public-debt service. Each one of these functions is important. Each one of the functions had an audit. These audits were not only duplicated but triplicated and quadruplicated, and it cost a vast amount of money. Lately, through the ingenuity of men who are there, they have devised a scheme by which we have only one audit in connection with the activities of this branch of the Government service. The Register of the Treasury is one of the functionaries needed in connection with the audit now necessary to be made. As a result of the consolidation of the activities through this paragraph—and it is the first time they have been consolidated—the Director of the Budget was able to cut $560,000 a year from the expenses incident to the work covered in the paragraph.

The further investigation and help in the simplification of the work by the Committee on Appropriations resulted in a still further reduction of $300,000, so that we have before us on the face of the facts an activity that will be conducted in 1923 for $800,000 less than it cost in the present year. I submit to the committee that that is evidence of fairly deliberate consideration of the questions before us, and of our desire to economize in the conduct of the Government.

The Office of the Register of the Treasury is an office created by law. I do not believe that we could abolish that office by striking out the appropriation for the salary. He is acting to-day as one of the chiefs of bureaus in connection with the public-debt service, and, if I understand the situation, he still retains all the functions that are imposed upon him by law. I desire to read briefly from the record in this connection:

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, the Register's Office has handled an enormous volume of United States securities which have been canceled and retired. These securities represent redemptions, exchanges, and conversion of bonds, notes, certificates of indebtedness, war-savings securities, and interest coupons, and reach a total for the year of 227,850,967 pieces——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Those very securities are vouchers, not accounts to be audited, and the accounting officer never gets the voucher.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us see what more there is. Those securities represent a value of something over $24,000,000,000. All of them were examined and filed promptly following their receipt and appropriate clearance given the Federal reserve banks or other fiscal agency or office concerned. The record further says:

Prior to the beginning of the fiscal year 1921, by direction of the Secretary, a reorganization of the public-debt work was made affecting the handling of the public-debt securities in the Office of the Register and the Division of Loans and Currency.

Mr. Chairman, as a result of this reorganization we have to-day only one audit instead of three or four.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. "Under the present plan of the accounting office, one audit." Mr. Chairman, it has been frequently asserted before that there were three or four audits by accounting officers. That is wholly incorrect. I reviewed the record in full.

Mr. MADDEN. But we must take the statements of those responsible for the Treasury Department, or where will we land? At any rate, we have cut the expenses under this provision of the bill some $860,000 a year below what they are for the present fiscal year. I suggest the wisdom and the propriety of being a little orderly in the matter of changing the law, so that we will not do anything foolish, so that we will not do anything unadvisedly, without facts, without studies, fraught, as it must be, with the danger that if we do we will disturb the equilibrium of one of the greatest and most important departments of the Government.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. I see that the committee is on the right line now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] referred in the course of his remarks a few moments ago to the committee on reorganization of the departments. It seems to me that it is time that the gentleman from Nebraska and other gentlemen recognize the fact that for all practical purposes that committee became a memory about six months or more ago. The House of Representatives, in cooperation with the Senate, created a Joint Committee upon Reorganization of the Departments. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], as I now recall it, in a former Congress had introduced the first specific measure looking toward departmental reorganization. Other gentlemen in the beginning of this Congress introduced similar resolutions. The House was impressed by those resolutions, and agreed unanimously to the appointing of a joint committee, and the same thing was true in the Senate. The gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. REAVIS, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. TEMPLE, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. MOORE, all of them of recognized ability, students of governmental affairs, were placed upon that committee on the part of the House.

With the beginning of this administration, very shortly in the extra session of the Congress, the President of the United States requested or demanded—I do not know which—that he be permitted to name a representative upon that committee, and furthermore that that representative named by the President should be paid out of the contingent funds of the House and Senate. The minority made very grave opposition to it—not because of any personal feeling toward the man who was appointed—I have forgotten his name——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Brown.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not because of any feeling against the President of the United States, but because of a realization of the fact it was an interference on the part of the Executive with the legislative branch. Their protests were unavailing. It was predicted at that time if that member were appointed that he would become chairman. There was denial at the time; and yet within 10 days after authority had been given to appoint him as a member he did become chairman of that committee. He was not a Member of Congress, not responsible to the Congress, but appointed by the President and paid out of the contingent fund of the two bodies; and yet he became chairman of that committee. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] is authority for the statement, because he made the statement just a few moments ago, that not since last June has that committee had a meeting, and yet in the press we see statements carried to the country of what that committee is doing. Within the last fortnight there appeared in the Washington Post an editorial undertaking to comment upon the work which that committee was doing. That committee is doing no work. The minority members of the committee, of course, protested against his being made chairman of the committee, because it was not proper that he be made chairman, and because they knew it probably meant the end of the committee's usefulness. If there was any reason on earth for his appointment, he might have been appointed as a representative of the President to communicate with the committee, to work with the committee, and he ought to have been paid out of some Executive fund and not out of the contingent funds of the House and Senate. In no event ought any joint congressional committee to have as its chairman one not a Member of the Congress. All hope of results from that reorganization committee was absolutely destroyed the moment this body and the Senate chose to turn the power over for an outsider to become the chairman of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] I want to insert in the RECORD, with the permission of the House, the correspondence which I have received from the Federal Reserve Board in regard to these building operations. I also want to state, in view of what the gentleman from South Carolina said, that the 12 Federal reserve banks are privately owned institutions. The stock of all of those banks is owned by the member banks. The Government did not contribute one dollar to the stock and is not a stockholder in any sense of the word. Under the law those 12 Federal reserve banks individually have the right to provide suitable buildings. That matter is entirely under the control and direction of the directors of each of the 12 banks. Of the nine directors of each of these banks six of them are chosen by the stockholders of the bank and three are by appointment by the Federal Reserve Board, so that the direction and control of buildings is entirely in the hands of the 12 banks. The Federal Reserve Board under the law has no jurisdiction over the operations which are specifically conferred under the Federal reserve act with reference to suitable buildings. Under one section of the act, however—

The board has always taken the view that the law authorizes directors of Federal reserve banks to provide for their banks and branches with such buildings and equipment as may be necessary for the proper conduct of their business.

Under paragraph J, section 11, of the Federal reserve act, the board has required all Federal reserve banks to submit for its consideration all options for the purchase of real estate, all plans and specifications for buildings and vaults, and has advised the banks that they should not enter into any contracts involving investments of this kind until the board has had an opportunity to make any suggestions or offer any objections as it might deem proper.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have only five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. McFADDEN. Go ahead.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In the report to the Senate by the Federal Reserve Board it is stated that the board advised the reserve banks that all plans and specifications for buildings and vaults should be presented to them and that "they should not enter into any contracts involving expenditures for these purposes until authorized to do so by the board." If they have not the power, why did they advise the reserve banks not to enter into a contract until authorized to do so by the board?

Mr. McFADDEN. Under the power conferred under section 11, paragraph J, the question of supervision of the 12 banks' operations by the board was provided for, but they can act independently of the Federal Reserve Board in the matter of providing suitable quarters for the orderly conduct of their business in their respective localities.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. As a matter of fact, the board in the letter states that they did approve of this building program, did not they?

Mr. McFADDEN. My understanding is that practically all of these building propositions were approved by the Federal Reserve Board, and the man who has raised this question of costs and salaries at this time is the former Comptroller of the Currency, John Skelton Williams, and he while acting Comptroller of the Currency and acting member of the Federal Reserve Board approved of these authorizations from time to time as they were made. I might also say that, in regard to the salaries which the gentleman criticizes, this same gentleman approved of them and of all the increases. It ill becomes a former member of the board, who has been retired by mutual consent from the public pay roll, to now criticize his own previous action while a member of the board, in an attempt to gain some cheap notoriety for selfish or political reasons.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the gentleman, Is this building at New York to be used for any other purpose except for that of a Federal reserve bank?

Mr. McFADDEN. My understanding is entirely for the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman state how many employees there are?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have not those figures before me.

Mr. LUCE. My recollection is it was about 3,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman think it is necessary for an ordinary banking institution employing 3,000 persons to spend $25,000,000 on a building?

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. LUCE. The $25,000,000 is in the aggregate. The present sum available is about $14,000,000 net.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he agrees with the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts after reading the report made to the Senate by the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is covering the cost of the building proper. He is not including the site.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The figures of the board and the gentleman's figures are not in accord.

Mr. McFADDEN. The original cost of the New York building, being site, is stated at $4,797,882. Cost of new buildings in course of construction is $758,072. Total cost to September 1, 1921, $5,555,954. The outside cost for the entire building, equipment, and costs, except vaults and fixtures, $17,900,347 for 14,000,000 feet, or $1.08 per net foot.

I want to take this occasion to call the gentleman's attention to Senate Document No. 75, being a letter from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, transmitted in response to a Senate resolution of October 14, 1921, concerning certain information relative to the number and salaries of employees of the Federal reserve banks, expenditures and erections of buildings, expenses of general administration, and amount of net earnings paid to the Government as franchise tax, and to say to the gentlemen of the House that this Senate document contains the full information in regard to both salaries paid and buildings bought and built for the 12 Federal reserve banks and its branches to date, and those in process of completion or under contract, and buildings in contemplation, not contracted for.

I find on page 21 of this report that the cost of bank premises of Federal reserve banks to September 30, 1921, state the original investment as $16,923,580; cost of remodeling buildings, $1,811,463; that the cost of new buildings in course of construction, $17,423,013; total cost to September 30, 1921, is $36,158,056; that there has been depreciation allowances charged off of $6,684,213, and that the book value on September 30, 1921, of these bank properties is $29,473,843.

The above figures refer to the 12 Federal reserve banks. The cost of bank premises of branches of the Federal reserve banks to September 30, 1921, is—

Original investment	$2,358,397
Cost of remodeling buildings	439,685
Cost of new buildings in course of construction	414,267
Total cost to Sept. 30, 1921	3,212,349

Depreciation and allowances charged off, $346,369, and that the book value, September 30, 1921, is $2,865,980.

The Federal reserve act requires in section 10 that the Federal Reserve Board shall annually make a full report of its operations to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall cause the same to be printed for the information of Congress.

The Federal Reserve Board has transmitted such reports annually and the details of these reports have set forth from time to time the operations of the system regarding the matter of buildings as well as salaries of its officers.

From my own personal knowledge of the manner in which the business of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York is conducted, being located in the Equitable Life Building at 120 Broadway, New York, there are various departments scattered on different floors of this large office building which subjects the transaction of their business to very grave risks, and when you take into consideration the vast amount of its daily transactions, coupled with the large amount of gold reserves and cash held by this institution, together with the fact that they are not enabled to have in their main offices sufficient space to cover their requirements, but that they are housed in some six different rented buildings elswhere in the city, indicates to me the grave need for proper protection and proper housing for this most important bank of the 12.

It is not incumbent upon me as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency to have supervision over the buildings erected by any of the 12 Federal reserve banks. This responsibility is placed under the law with the boards of directors of each of the 12 banks. As I have previously explained, the Federal Reserve Board have assumed supervisory functions over the operations of the different banks.

It is interesting to note, in connection with the criticism of large salaries paid, more particularly by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, that at a meeting of the Federal Reserve Board on September 14, 1918, Hon. W. G. McAdoo, then Secretary of the Treasury and ex officio chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, advocated approval of a salary of $50,000 per annum, which the directors of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York had voted for the governor of that institution, and stated that his attitude had been that during the formative period of the Federal reserve system comparatively low salaries should be paid until the business of the banks could be established and a fair measure obtained of their operations and a more accurate realization reached of the dimensions of the problems and responsibilities of the bank's officers, stating further that previously he had opposed an increase in the salary under consideration only because the country was at war. He said further that as the business of the banks had been well established and they were making large earnings for the Government, the time had come when the office of governor of a Federal reserve bank should command other merits, a fair and just compensation, and that he would vote to fix the salary of the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York at the amount proposed by the directors of the bank, to wit, $50,000 per annum.

It is interesting to note, also, that the then Acting Comptroller of the Currency and ex officio member of the Federal Reserve Board, John Skelton Williams, was present and acquiesced in the fixing of this salary.

On page 13 of this Senate document a comparison of the average annual salaries paid to officers by each Federal reserve bank and by three of the larger banks in each Federal reserve bank city as of October, 1921, discloses that the average salary of Federal reserve bank officers is $7,743 and the average salaries of officers of the larger member banks is $13,092, or 69 per cent in excess of that paid by the Federal reserve bank to its officers.

Under the Federal reserve act it is true that out of the net earnings, after the payment of a 6 per cent dividend on the stock owned by the member banks and the creation of a surplus as provided by law, there shall be turned into the Public Treasury annually 90 per cent of the then net earnings, leaving 10 per cent of the net earnings to remain with the 12 Federal reserve banks to be added to their surplus accounts. It is true that the earnings of the Federal reserve system have been large during the last few years, owing to the large transactions which it has had, caused by the war and the fact that a large amount of Federal reserve notes were outstanding. Had the earnings of the system been used in payment of the franchise tax which is provided for under the law, these surplus earnings would have gradually gone monthly or at stated periods into the Public Treasury and the published net earnings of the system would have shown much less.

I want to make it clear that the stock of these 12 banks is owned by the member banks and that the majority of the board of directors are elected by the members of the stockholding banks, and that the conduct of the business of these 12 banks is in the control of the board of directors.

It is true that the Federal Reserve Board has supervisory jurisdiction over all of the 12 banks and makes periodical examinations of the banks, but I maintain that the earnings of the institutions, until they are distributed as net earnings, are entirely under the control and dominion of the 12 banks.

Mr. Chairman, I place in the RECORD at this point letter from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board under date of January 5, inclosing copy of letter written by Herbert Hoover under date of October 17, 1921, to the Federal Reserve Board, and copy of Gov. Harding's reply under date of October 18, 1921; also copy of letter from Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, addressed to me under date of January 5, 1921, inclosing copy of letter from the Federal Reserve Board under date of January 5, 1922, to the chairmen of all Federal reserve banks:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 5, 1921.

Hon. L. T. MCFADDEN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I inclose herewith, as a matter of probable interest to you, copies of correspondence which I had during October last with the Secretary of Commerce, which is self-explanatory.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

OCTOBER 18, 1921.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
Secretary of Commerce.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, which I brought to the attention of the members of the board at the meeting this morning. Several of the Federal reserve banks are now actively engaged in their building operations, while others are just about to commence them. The board is preparing a response to a resolution of the Senate adopted last Friday and will describe at length the building operations of the Federal reserve banks and branches which have been authorized. Plans have been approved for most of these projects, and it seems probable, unless Congress should intervene by legislation, that the work of construction will be actively under way at several Federal reserve cities and branch cities throughout the winter.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, October 17, 1921.

Hon. W. P. G. HARDING,
Federal Reserve Board, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GOV. HARDING: I hope you won't mind my personally calling to your attention the following resolution which was passed unanimously by the President's National Conference on Unemployment, as follows:

"The Federal authorities, including the Federal reserve banks, should expedite the construction of public buildings and public works covered by existing appropriations."

I am taking the liberty of writing to you about it at this time, because I am told that there is a very large amount of work in prospect, under control of the Federal Reserve Board, which perhaps might be expedited. If it should be undertaken at once, instead of next spring or later, it could not help having a most helpful effect upon the present emergency of unemployment.

I do not need to point out to you that the great hope is, in all sound ways, to provide work for those who are now without it. This is, of course, far better than anything in way of charity or doles. In my judgment the situation is serious, and is likely to become more so as the weather becomes more severe. I feel that public works which are approved and can be started now certainly should be in order to contribute their share toward ameliorating the situation.

With best regards, I am,

Very truly, yours,

HERBERT HOOVER.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 5, 1922.

Hon. L. T. MCFADDEN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am inclosing for your information copy of a letter which the board is sending to-day to the chairman of the board of directors of each Federal reserve bank.

The buildings of the Federal Reserve Banks of Richmond, Dallas, and Kansas City have been completed and they are now being occupied by the banks. The Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta has outgrown the building which it is now occupying, and the work of constructing an annex large enough to meet present requirements is now well under way. The building of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston is nearly completed and some departments of the bank have already been moved into the new building. The buildings of the Federal Reserve Banks of Chicago and San Francisco are also well advanced and it is expected they will be ready for occupancy within the next few months. Contracts have been let in connection with the construction of buildings of the Federal Reserve Banks of New York and Cleveland which can not now be canceled, and the work of construction must accordingly proceed. The Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia was able to purchase a building which, after certain changes and the addition of a large vault, is suitable for its purposes, and this building is occupied by the bank. The contracts for the foundations of the building for the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis were let some time ago and the foundations will be completed within the next 10 days. No contracts, however, have yet been let for the superstructure. No contracts have so far been let for the building of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland has completed repairs and additions to the building of its branch at Pittsburgh, and has acquired a lot for the use of its Cincinnati branch, but no contracts have been let for the construction of the building, and that branch is still occupying leased quarters which are very inadequate. The Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond some years ago purchased a building for the use of its Baltimore branch, which has proved to be entirely too small, and more than a year ago it acquired a larger building site in that city. It is proposed to erect a building upon the site so acquired, and upon its completion to sell the building which is now being occupied by the Baltimore branch, but no contracts have been let for the new building. The Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta has purchased a building for the use of its branch at Nashville, which must, however, be remodeled before it can be utilized, and no contracts have yet been let for these necessary changes. The Atlanta bank has purchased a site upon which it is proposed to erect a building for the use of its branch at New Orleans, but the construction contracts have not yet been let. It has also purchased a lot for the use of its Jacksonville branch, but has not yet entered into any contracts for the construction of the building. The Detroit branch of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago is occupying leased quarters which are entirely inadequate and unsuitable in many respects, and the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago has recently bought the ground in Detroit upon which it proposes to erect a building, but no contracts for construction have yet been let. The Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis more than a year ago purchased a lot upon which it proposes to construct a building for the use of its branch in Little Rock. Plans have been made, but contracts have not yet been let. The St. Louis bank purchased a building in Louisville which has proved to be entirely too small and it has since acquired 50 feet of ground adjoining, on which it proposes to construct a two-story annex uniform in style with the present building. Contracts for construction have not yet been let. The Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis completed some time ago its building for the branch at Helena, Mont. The Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City had acquired a lot in Denver, but has not yet let contracts for the construction of a building which is badly needed. It has not yet let contracts for the building to be used by its branch in Oklahoma City, but has purchased a building for the use of its Omaha branch. The Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas completed about two years ago the building for its branch at El Paso, and the work of construction on the building for its branch at Houston is well under way. The Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco about a year ago bought a lot for the use of its Salt Lake City branch, but has not yet begun the preparation of plans for a building, and consequently has let no contracts.

No real estate has yet been bought for the other branches of Federal reserve banks, Buffalo (New York), Birmingham (Atlanta), Memphis (St. Louis), and Portland, Seattle, Spokane, and Los Angeles (San Francisco), which are occupying leased quarters, which answer the purpose for the time being; but it is evident that ultimately all these branches must either be given more adequate quarters or must be abandoned.

Since the Subtreasuries were abolished the Federal reserve banks have been exercising the functions formerly performed by the Subtreasuries, and these functions have been extended wherever present facilities admit to the branches. In view of the large amounts of actual cash and securities held by all Federal reserve banks and branches it is very important that they be provided with proper vault facilities. Several of the Federal reserve banks are very anxious to let contracts and proceed with the work of construction of buildings, which are urgently needed, but the board is not willing that anything should be done to defeat the intent of Congress. As a vote will be taken on the pending amendment at an early date, it is not thought that any serious inconvenience will result from awaiting an expression of the will of Congress.

It seems proper to call your attention to the fact that full and detailed reports of the building operations of Federal reserve banks have been made to Congress in the annual report of the Federal Reserve Board each year, as well as in the board's reply to Senate resolution 153, which has been published as Senate document 75.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 5, 1922.

Subject: Building operations of Federal reserve banks.

CHAIRMEN OF ALL FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

DEAR SIR: On December 19, 1921, an amendment was proposed by Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, to Senate bill 2263, which by agreement will come to a vote on the 17th instant, reading as follows: "The Federal Reserve Board shall have no authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any building of any kind or character or to authorize the erection of any building without the consent of Congress having previously been given therefor in express terms."

The Federal Reserve Board has never assumed that it has authority to enter into any contract for the erection of any kind of building. The directors of Federal reserve banks are, however, empowered under the provisions of section 4 of the Federal reserve act "to make contracts" and "to exercise * * * all powers specifically granted by the provisions of this act and such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking within the limitations prescribed by this act."

The board has always taken the view that the law authorizes directors of Federal reserve banks to provide their banks and branches with such buildings and equipment as may be necessary for the proper conduct of their business. There is nothing in the Federal reserve act that requires the specific approval of building contracts by the Federal Reserve Board, but under its power of general supervision (par. j, sec. 11) the board has required all Federal reserve banks to submit for its consideration all options for the purchase of real estate, all plans and specifications for buildings and vaults, and has advised the banks that they should not enter into any contracts involving investments of this kind until the board had had an opportunity to make any suggestions or offer any objections as it might deem proper.

In some cases buildings of Federal reserve banks and branches have been completed and in others contracts have been let which must necessarily be carried out. Although the amounts involved in the erection of Federal reserve bank buildings represent investments of the banks' own funds and not the expenditure of public moneys, the board feels, nevertheless, that no attempt should be made by any Federal reserve bank to anticipate any action by Congress which may tend to restrict or modify its present authority, and you are requested to advise your directors at once that the board advises that no new contracts for the construction of a building be entered into by them until there has been opportunity of ascertaining the disposition of Congress toward the amendment above quoted.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I remember quite well the discussion that took place on this very question when the Federal reserve act was framed. There was not any doubt then in the minds of those who studied the act that the supervisory control is vested in the board, and I think no doubt in the minds of any lawyer now, that none of the Federal reserve banks have authority to make any extraordinary capital permanent expenditure without the authority or approval of the Federal Reserve Board. I think that is conceded. Gov. Harding before our committee has admitted that the board approved these expenditures by the New York bank, and if you pick up the paper of this morning you will find that he states that he has wired the different banks throughout the country that have not yet let contracts for buildings not to let them, even though the plans have been approved by the board; so I presume there is no question in the minds of the board that it has authority to control such expenditures and that buildings can be erected only by their authority or approval. The question of whether or not they should have authority to erect buildings is one that no one thought in the beginning could not be safely left to the governmental board that was given supervisory control over the system. And, gentlemen, how any man can defend the Federal Reserve Board for approving these extravagant expenditures in New York City is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not the only place.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly; but that is the worst.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is not the gentleman aware that the cost per foot for construction in New York City is less than the cost in Richmond, Va.?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, you are trying to consider only the dispute between Williams and Harding. Whatever may be charged against Williams does not justify Harding and the present board for approving the extravagant proposals for the erection of these buildings. I say that there is not a man that looks into it but will admit that there is not a private directorate in the country that would stand the wanton, wasteful extravagance that is proposed to be entailed in the erection of the Federal reserve bank in New York City, for, according to their own statement of what they intend to do, it is going to cost not only $14,000,000, but it is going to cost on the present estimate, in my opinion, over $27,000,000. Before they get through with the decorations, the furnishings, and extraordinary fittings and equipments it is going to total pretty close to $30,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say for the information of the Members of the House that do not have the information, that the cost of building now is 166 as compared with 100. During the peak of the war it was 246. I suppose the cost of these buildings will be two to one over what they ought to cost in ordinary times.

Mr. WINGO. That does not go to the principle of the thing. Here is what I merely rose to say. It is the supercilious, contemptuous contention that is continually put forward by the directors of these banks that these are strictly private institutions in which the public has no interest, because forsooth the member banks own all the stock. And I am surprised to hear that from the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. Why did you establish the Federal reserve system? Was it for the sole benefit and profit of the stockholders of the banks? No. They deliberately settled the question, not only in the committee, but in the caucus and in the full House, that they should be nonprofit-making institutions and held down their dividends to 6 per cent, the balance of their profits to be paid into the Public Treasury.

Two prime functions do those banks have. One is that they shall be quasi public institutions to hold the reserve funds of the banks of this country free from the spirit and the venturesome profit making and desire of private institutions that possibly might put them beyond safe reach in an hour of stress and storm.

Mr. MADDEN. The idea was to mobolize the reserve.

Mr. WINGO. Another idea was to furnish an elastic currency and furnish a market that would be storm proof against panic, so that in a time of stress and storm the member banks could go to these Government controlled quasi public institutions and put up their paper and receive gold demand obligations on the National Treasury.

You tell me that any institution that gets that kind of a public benefit should be free from control? Do you tell me that they are mere private profit-making institutions? Such a contention is absurd and ridiculous to anyone who is familiar with the law, the conditions that induced the creation of the Federal reserve system, and the service it was intended to render. But it has been contended that Congress authorized these banks to set aside and retain from their earnings a surplus for the purpose of erecting these costly buildings. I deny it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. In 1919 we amended the law by providing that Federal reserve banks might create a surplus out of earnings equal to 100 per cent of capital, but the Banking and Currency Committee were told it was necessary to give the banks standing, and not for the purpose of piling up funds to be wasted by extravagant buildings. We were told that the Federal reserve bank of New York had been discredited in Argentina and the Argentine Government criticized because it had agreed to making that bank a depository of certain funds. There was a certain fund of gold, as I now recall, that, by agreement between the Argentine and United States Governments, was deposited in that bank. But the arrangement was not continued, because the enemies of the Argentine ministry criticized the matter on the ground that the Federal reserve bank had a small capital and small surplus and was not a great, stable financial institution, like the Bank of England or Bank of France. That was the argument made to the committee that induced it to report the bill favorably, and not the need of surplus funds to erect expensive buildings.

Congress would not have approved such a scheme had it been presented. Did Gov. Harding then tell us that it was necessary to build up a surplus in order that they could erect these magnificent buildings? I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, if that is so?

Mr. McFADDEN. No. The matter of the construction of buildings was not discussed. It was a matter of establishing a surplus.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; and the statement that Gov. Harding has given out is erroneous. He stated that the Committee on Banking and Currency approved it, and he has stated that when the bill was passed to authorize them to increase the surplus one of the reasons assigned was that it was necessary for them to build these bank buildings.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think the gentleman will admit that when Gov. Harding was before our committee he made a statement in relation to the necessity of building a building in Washington, because he stated to the committee that they did not have authority to put up a building in which to house the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. WINGO. That was at another meeting. When he asked for permission to build up a surplus did he assign as the reason for it the necessity for the construction of Federal reserve bank buildings? No. It was true then and it is true now that under the law if the Federal Reserve Board permits them, they can spend all their surplus, and I say that the Federal Reserve Board is responsible for this waste and extravagance.

If the governor of the Federal Reserve Board had the authority to issue the order that he issued yesterday, why did he not issue his order in the beginning, or, rather, refuse to approve these extravagant plans? Does the gentleman contend that $25,000,000 is a reasonable and necessary expenditure for a Federal bank building in New York City? Does the gentleman defend that expenditure?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I was discussing the authority of these individual banks. They have supreme authority in that respect to build buildings under the law.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman approve the expenditure of $27,000,000, or even $20,000,000, for the construction of that building and equipment?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have not looked into the reasons assigned for it, and therefore I am not qualified to give an answer to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. Has not the gentleman been furnished with information by the Federal Reserve Board and by John Skelton Williams as to that matter, and will the gentleman say, as the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, he has inserted in the RECORD this report, which he asked leave to do, without reading it, and without knowing whether he approved it?

Mr. McFADDEN. I referred to the statement that was published this morning, and which was referred to by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit me to use an illustration, without intending any offense, I fear he is like the young jay bird in his committee nest, takes whatever worm the Federal Reserve Board puts down his legislative throat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think we shall have to stop this discussion. I want to proceed with the bill.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the debate should be on the bill. This discussion is not in order on the bill.

Mr. LUCE. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses incident to the discharge of the duties imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the transportation act, 1920, the Federal control act, approved March 21, 1918, as amended, and for expenses arising in connection with loans and credits to foreign Governments under the Liberty loan acts and the Victory Liberty loan act and in connection with credits granted or conditions entered into under the act providing for the relief of populations in Europe and contiguous countries, and in connection with credits granted or conditions entered into under the act providing for the sale of surplus war material, including personal services in the District of Columbia, $25,000.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, perhaps it will not unduly interfere with the consideration of these matters if I should now say a word in reply to my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], expressing my sympathy with his position and my anxiety to relieve him from embarrassment, if it is possible. The gentleman from Arkansas, as a leading member of one of the great political parties, shared in the construction of the Federal reserve system and he has taken great pride therein. That system was put into operation under a Democratic administration, which went before the country and demanded credit for its achievement. It was placed in charge of members of that party, and the head of the system was an appointee of the Democratic President. Unfortunately, the Democratic President saw fit to nominate a Democratic Comptroller of the Currency, and now these two Democratic appointees have fallen out and are now engaged in a party row, which gentlemen at my right hope to turn to their party credit or advantage. With the usual adroitness of gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House they point now to the derelictions of this Democratic appointee and now to the derelictions of that Democratic appointee and at the same time ask the favor of the people by reason of the fact that both of the two gentlemen criticized are Democrats.

Mr. WINGO. I challenge the gentleman's authority for that. Those in authority under the present administration boasted that Gov. Harding would be retained because he had done so much to help elect his namesake to the Presidency, that his service was highly appreciated. The Washington Post is my authority for that statement.

Mr. LUCE. I am sorry for the occasion to express my sympathy with the gentleman now who is attempting to provide for party ends by attacking the workings of a system for which his party was responsible and for which he himself had claimed a share of credit that I believe is justly due him.

Mr. WINGO. I am treating it as a nonpolitical question. Does the gentleman approve the expenditure of $25,000,000 of the Federal Reserve Board on a building in New York City?

Mr. LUCE. I will cross that bridge on proper occasion when I come to it.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman, after his long experience in matters of banking, state whether, in his judgment, it is necessary to spend as much as $20,000,000, if not $27,000,000, in the construction of a bank building in the city of New York?

Mr. LUCE. Sometimes I think I have a single-track mind and can only operate in one direction at a time.

Mr. WINGO. Very well.

Mr. LUCE. At the present time I want to say that my friend and his associates brought into being an institution for which they are entitled to credit. But they brought it in under the guise of a private institution, fearing the shade of Andrew Jackson rising from his tomb and protesting against the organization of a United States bank. They did not dare to favor the establishment of a United States bank. They said then, and until very recently they have continued to say, that this is not a Government institution; but now for the purpose of argument they are attempting to demonstrate that it is a Government institution. Is it fish or is it flesh or fowl, or what is it? It is either a Government institution or it is a private institution. Let them base their conclusions upon one premise and not try to ride two horses at the same time, and let them squarely tell us whether this is or is not another United States bank, and whether they do or do not still adhere to the faith of their predecessors in the time of Andrew Jackson.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman say that the public has no interest in the expenditure of these funds? Does the gentleman say it is strictly a private institution?

Mr. LUCE. I am pointing out to the gentleman what he said and what his party said, not what I believe. My beliefs are of slight consequence in the matter.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman contend that it is strictly a private institution, and that they can spend this money as they please, and that it is not the business of the Government?

Mr. LUCE. I am making no contention as to that. You were responsible for it.

Mr. WINGO. No; we did not approve it.

Mr. LUCE. You created it.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman knows that ever since he has been on the committee I have protested against extravagant expenses in this way.

Mr. LUCE. But you wrote the law.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; but nobody ever dreamed that under this Republican administration the chairman of the committee and a very responsible member of it would stand here and state that they did not know whether or not it was a wise expenditure. Nobody ever dreamed that.

Mr. LUCE. I still express my regret that the gentleman should have occasion here to rise and criticize the operation of a Democratic institution administered by Democratic appointees. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. In opposition to the pro forma amendment I would like to call the attention of the committee to what was divulged here a few moments ago on the Vocational Board. I should like to call the attention of the committee to the possibility of some change. The original act known as the Smith-Hughes Act which creates the Vocational Board, in section 7 made an annual appropriation of $200,000 for the purpose of making studies and investigations and reports on agricultural processes and requirements, agricultural workers, trade industries, and so on. I think now that it was a mistake to make this a permanent, perpetual appropriation, annually of a fixed amount to be used for investigational work. Before the passage of this law we had no cooperative work on educational subjects pertaining to vocations, and it was thought wise that we create the power and give the means to organize this work, which would require considerable investigation. Now that work has been organized. The investigations have been made. The cooperation has been established between the Government and the State. If there is any other investigation to be made along the lines of agriculture it could be made in cooperation if not entirely under the direction of the Department of Agriculture. And if there are investigations along the lines of trade that ought to continue, that could be done in cooperation with or under the direction of the Department of Commerce. All this work has been done since 1917, and I see no imperative necessity for such annual outlay. I am ready, as a member of the Committee on Education, to make an investigation as to the character of these studies that are made, their importance and their necessity. I frankly say that if the report that was read here by my friend from Washington is a sample, the quicker it is discontinued the better. Such a report can certainly have but on effect, namely, to discredit the real work of the board. If that is the sort of work that is being done, for which we provided this annual appropriation, I shall be very glad to offer an amendment to the vocational bill to eliminate that part of the appropriation of $200,000 so employed, retaining only a sufficient amount to maintain the necessary overhead in organization, which would not be anything like the sum originally planned for investigation purposes.

It is difficult for the membership of the House to understand how a governmental agency can seriously expend public funds as suggested by the bulletin just read. It sounds more like some burlesque upon education.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. The Appropriations Committee are now making a thorough study of all the permanent appropriations, and we have already compiled the information affecting them, and when we finish with all the appropriation bills it is our purpose to take those up for consideration, and we expect to report a bill back to the House dealing with all the permanent appropriations, and this, of course, will be included with them.

Mr. FESS. I thank the chairman, because that would be very much more orderly than for some particular amendment to be offered here and there. I would state to the Members of the House that while I was on the commission that reported the needs of vocational education and recommended the bill which became law in July, 1917, I had my doubts about the necessity of an independent board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask for three minutes more in which to complete my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks three additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Whatever be the importance of it at first, the work of that board is now certainly completed. There is no valid reason why it should continue. The work, however, must continue, but it can continue under a director instead of a board of three, each at $5,000 a year. The public welfare bill which I introduced at the beginning of the special session provides for the abolition of the board, and I did it as a friend of vocational education. I do not think the board is now necessary. In the provisions for carrying on studies and investigations in the bill which was recently passed, the rehabilitation of the industrial cripple, there was provided an allowance of $75,000 to make these studies, but it was limited to four years. By that time this work will all be done. But here is a case that is perpetual, and while I voted for it, believing it necessary, I am thoroughly convinced that as long as we make any appropriation, great or small, it will all be spent, whether wisely or unwisely, and the chairman will have my sympathy and support in so far as this particular item is concerned when he brings in his bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIVISION OF APPOINTMENTS.

Salaries: Chief of division, $3,000; assistant chief of division, $2,250; executive clerk, $2,000; clerks—four of class 4, six of class 3, eight of class 2, eight of class 1, three at $1,000 each, one $900; messenger, $840; assistant messenger, $720; in all, $50,310.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out the last word. What particular function does this Division of Appointments perform?

Mr. MADDEN. It keeps the record of the appointments of all employees in the department, the record of separations from the service, the record of those certified over to the Civil Service Commission, and the record of those who may be certified back from the commission. They have charge of the surety bonds and everything that goes with the employment in the department.

Mr. WALSH. Have they charge of the reappointments?

Mr. MADDEN. If some one leaves the service and has a record that justifies it, he is certified to the Civil Service Commission as eligible for reappointment.

Mr. WALSH. Does this division initiate appointments?

Mr. MADDEN. No; it deals with the records.

Mr. WALSH. My observation has been that there has not been a great many appointments made in the bureaus of the Treasury Department.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand the people have been there a good many years and are there now still functioning.

Mr. WALSH. The chief of the bureau has been there quite a while, six or seven years. Is that the system in the Treasury Department—that once you obtain a position you are to retain it for life?

Mr. MADDEN. I am glad to say that I do not know anyone in any of the departments of the Government, from the head down. I have purposely avoided knowing anybody. They are making transfers and appointments every day. Resignations being accepted, new appointments being made, and all come from the Civil Service Commission, and the records of these people must be kept.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is particularly true of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue office, where there are many resignations.

Mr. WALSH. They have not been able to pry anybody loose from that division up in some parts of the country.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collecting the revenue from customs, including not exceeding $200,000 for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, $11,300,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do it for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if this large lump-sum appropriation of $11,300,000 is in the usual form.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and that is what I criticized in my speech yesterday.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is the reason I asked the gentleman the question.

Mr. MADDEN. It has always been appropriated for in this way. I said yesterday that the time had come when these items ought to be revamped. There are items or paragraphs containing very large sums in a few lines, and others with small sums in, as I said in one instance, 57 paragraphs. But we could not change the language without having reference to the accounting officer and the budget officer and have time to study that question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This item was not corrected because the gentleman thought the committee did not have sufficient information in regard to it?

Mr. MADDEN. We were afraid that if we undertook to do the thing now we might make a mistake. We felt that we could not do it without having it conform to the accounting methods, and in order to do anything in this line we must know what the accounting system was, and we would have to do it in conjunction with the chief accounting officer and the Comptroller General. So that it will take some time to work it out. In some places the form of the language should be restricted and in other places enlarged.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman another question. We have had a complaint before the Ways and Means Committee about the inspectors of customs and some others that are covered by this paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; they are in this paragraph.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The complaints were that they were not receiving sufficient salary.

Mr. MADDEN. They are receiving a good salary. Some of them receive up to $12 a day and travel allowance. The inspectors two years ago were given a million dollars for increase of salaries. They have had the salaries increased to that extent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. How are the salaries fixed?

Mr. MADDEN. Let me say that there has been no request for an increase of compensation of any of these people in the service, because, as I say, they used a million dollars for an increase of salary all along the line, and they are getting all they ought to get.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not prepared to say that the gentleman is not correct. Perhaps this item does not cover the particular employees that I had in mind.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it covers them all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Very well; I think the gentleman has given a sufficient explanation of the item which I rose to inquire about, and I think it ought to be corrected, because the ordinary Member can tell very little about what is contained in these lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. MADDEN. The man in charge of the Customs Service was before the committee and he knew nothing whatever about the service, and I was compelled to send him back for details of the department over which he presides and come back with the information.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the chairman whether or not in this lump sum of $11,300,000 there is carried the additional $1,000,000 that the gentleman spoke about as an increase for the salaries of the men in the Customs Service?

Mr. MADDEN. This is for the salaries as they are at present.

Mr. McKENZIE. In other words, the item is based on the present salaries and the committee did not go back to the former salaries?

Mr. MADDEN. The million dollars was given for fixing the salaries that were then inadequate. They were the worst-paid people in the Government service, and they had to get additional compensation on which to live.

Mr. McKENZIE. You are permitting them to have the increase?

Mr. MADDEN. We have nothing to do with it. It was done two years ago.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does this take into consideration the laborers?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it takes in everybody.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET.

Director, $10,000; Assistant Director, $7,500; for all other necessary expenses of the bureau, including compensation of attorneys and other employees in the District of Columbia, printing, binding, telegrams, telephone service, law books, books of reference, periodicals, stationery, furniture, office equipment, other supplies, traveling expenses, street car fares, per diem in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 for officers and employees while absent from the seat of government on official duty, $137,300; in all, $154,800.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Before proceeding directly to a discussion of this particular paragraph, I take this opportunity to compliment the Committee on Appropriations, and especially the gentleman who is the chairman of that committee, for having presented this bill in such form and accompanied by such documents as for the first time to enable the ordinary Member of Congress to get some idea of what is being done without his being compelled to go through the Book of Estimates to find out how the appropriations compare with previous appropriations and what money is being used. Nor is this the only reform which the very able chairman of that committee has instituted.

I rise more particularly, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to this particular item appropriating $154,800 for the Bureau of the Budget. At the time it was proposed to establish the budget system I went before the Committee on the Budget and made the statement that it would not result in any substantial economy if it were established. I had no hesitancy in making that statement. The result has fully verified my expectation. As a matter of fact we find now that the executive departments are costing more instead of less, and I am not surprised for another reason. The gentleman who has been in charge of the budget has shown great ability in the use of language in which ordinarily mule drivers are said to be particularly proficient, but if he has manifested it in any other way it does not appear in the budget statement. We have heard much about what he was going to do, but we have seen nothing accomplished. The committee has found it necessary to cut down his estimates, and I think they could properly have gone even further than they have. It is evident that if there are to be any deep cuts Congress must make them.

However, Mr. Chairman, I did expect one thing from this budget system, and it may yet come, although I am not very hopeful of it now. That was referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] yesterday when he said that the real and especial function of the budget was to fix the responsibility for expenditures upon the executive officers of the Government.

For some reason or other the country declines to put that responsibility where it belongs and still persists in holding Congress responsible for every item of waste and every item of unnecessary expenditure that may occur in any of these appropriations, when every gentleman within the sound of my voice knows that we here in Congress, in all the committees, from the chairmen down, and outside of the committees to the individual Members, are engaged in a continual struggle with the chiefs of the departments, with the executive officers, to stop extravagance and limit expenditures. Notwithstanding this, the other day a prominent banking and statistical concern, I think located in New York City, sent out a statement to the country at large saying that the executives and the administration are engaged in an attempt to lower these expenditures, but that Congress is continually frustrating all attempts made in that direction. I do not know how we are to get the real facts about this question before the country, but I do know that if we could accomplish that one thing to which the gentleman from Tennessee refers, viz, the placing of responsibility for these appropriations upon the executive departments, and especially upon the Director of the Budget, we will have accomplished much.

The budget as carried on at the present time, and as shown by the short distance that we have gotten in this bill, is not working out the way we expected it. We thought we were going to get rid of duplications and yet, although we have gone but a few pages in this bill, we find a number of duplications that have not been eliminated. We expected that large economies would be effected. They have been as a result of the work of the committees of Congress, but they have not been effected as a result of the working of the Budget Bureau. If there were some way that the real situation could be gotten before the country at large there would be a great service performed by the budget system. Then it would be known where the responsibility really rests. As the matter stands, I am unable to see how we are getting the worth of the $154,800 appropriated in this paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is very interesting and attractive to hear the criticisms of this new activity of ours known as the budget, and I wish to say that, of course, it was not possible to do everything that we expected in the short time since the budget law went into effect. We all recall that the Director of the Budget was appointed only a short time before the 1st of last September. We also recall that the law required that all of the estimates be in his hands by the 15th of September. We must not forget, either, that when we passed the law we gave him the right to appoint, I think, only four people who might be qualified to act as executives. No man living, no matter how well qualified or how much knowledge he might have, would be able to assimilate all of the activities of the Government in the short period of time that was allotted to the Budget Director. The department chiefs themselves, although they may have been in the department for a quarter of a century, would not be able to do what we called on the Director of the Budget to do. We required the Director of the Budget to submit the annual estimates in the Book of Estimates, as has always been done, and at the same time to make a recommendation under the alternative budget.

In order to function at all it was necessary for the Director of the Budget to invite people from all over the United States who had especial experience to come in to make personal investigations for him in the various departments of the Government, which they were glad to do and did do without any expense whatever to the Government. It was upon the report made to him by these people that he was obliged to rely for the information on which he finally acted. He had no organization with which to make the complete research that the law contemplates. He does not make any claim that he made such a research. He admits that he was unable to do so. We all realize that the work done is not as completely done as we looked forward to having it done, but I think I may say that we may with more than hope look forward in the days to come to a realization of our anticipations in the development of the budget work.

The budget officer to begin with, as I say, had only four paid people outside of a few civil-service clerks, who knew nothing about the work. He had to make an organization and he had a very short time in which to make it. The organization began at his own office. It went up from his office to the various departments. In each department he originated the idea of having a budget officer appointed by the Cabinet member of that department. The budget officer was to be a liaison officer between the bureau chiefs in the department and the Cabinet chief. The Cabinet chief in turn was to deal with the Director of the Budget and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget was to communicate his final determination to the President, who was finally to send it here through the Speaker. Because it was necessary to make this organization within a very few months, of necessity we must expect that it is not perfect. In addition to that, it seems that in some of the departments the budget officer of the particular department appointed by the Cabinet officer was not in sympathy with the theory of the budget, and in one case we have not been able to get the cooperation which we should be able to get.

We have only had one case. Most of the people in all the departments have been glad to cooperate, and those who have not manifested a disposition to cooperate, if I have any influence that can be exercised, will be either compelled to cooperate or leave the Government service. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARNER. What became of this legislative committee of which this man Browne was at the head?

Mr. MADDEN. That has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know, but do not charge me with being connected with that; I am not interested in that.

Mr. GARNER. I was just wondering whether the gentleman was going to carry the salary again this year in the appropriation bill?

Mr. MADDEN. It is not in this bill.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, yes; I remember it is paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. MAGEE. Is not the gentleman going to emphasize the fact that the budget system has saved a vast amount of money?

Mr. MADDEN. I am going to get to that. I want to say in commendation of the work done by the Budget Director that he really did a wonderful work under the circumstances. He does not claim that his work is perfect, and he does not claim that it is more than a once over job; he would not claim anything else. He could not claim anything else, because he had not the time or the organization; but he has an organization in contemplation, and I shall outline it to you, and I think it will work to the satisfaction of the Treasury, of the taxpayer, of the Congress, and of the people. Now what is it? First, there is the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and then there is a chief deputy, and then three or four experts that he has selected from among the best men in the service, with long years of experience and of understanding of the Government. He has taken those men over and out from under the control of those who had jurisdiction over them in the past. Then he proposes to select men, one man particularly, in every department, those with special qualifications, those of ability, of genius in organization, and he proposes when he finds that man to have him released from the duty he is performing, not to put him on another pay roll, mind you, not to incur any new expense, but to transfer him to the jurisdiction of the President of the United States, at the same time allowing him to be paid out of the appropriation from which he is already paid. And he will take one man like that in each department, relieve him from responsibility to his department chief, make him the instrumentality of the President in the department, give him authority to make research in every bureau, and with his knowledge of the department and his release from responsibility to the department chief, with the power and protection which he has from being under the President and responsible to no one else but the President, it can be readily seen that he will be glad to ferret out any weaknesses anywhere and to furnish information upon which to base many reforms in the future.

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In a moment; we have been in hearty cooperation with the Director of the Bureau of the Budget along these lines and hope that the day is not far distant when we will be able to bring to you evidence of the value of the service rendered by the Bureau of the Budget. Now, I yield.

Mr. VARE. It might be well to state that the budget officer has cut $122,000,000 off the estimates furnished by the departments.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; the Bureau of the Budget officer has cut more than that from the estimates, and I think through his instrumentality the departments for 1922 were induced to save something like $122,000,000, and he has reduced the proposals submitted by the departments. And he has done more than that. He has frightened a good many from coming with proposals that they otherwise would have come with, and if he had done nothing more than that, it is a great accomplishment. Now, the Committee on Appropriations, every member of which is the servant of the House, realizes the responsibility we have not only to you but to the country. We are awake to the necessity and the importance of meeting the needs of the hour in the matter of economy. We are delving into everything we can find that will enable us to bring something to you that will give you evidence of better government, and we will continue to do that, and we believe that with the cooperation we can give to the Budget Bureau and the work they can give to the Nation you will have the proof in the next year or two of the value of the budget system. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. In view of the fact that every speech made upon the majority side of the Chamber for political purposes has emphasized the passage of the budget law—though it passed by practically a unanimous vote—as perhaps the only real achievement of the majority party during this administration, I am wondering whether or not the sacrilegious remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] may not bring him in danger of that threat which was contained in an interview by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] which I had the pleasure of reading yesterday to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Now, the gentleman from Iowa is more nearly right than he is wrong about this matter—does the gentleman desire me to yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was just about to remark as the gentleman referred to the disciplining of certain members of the Republican Party whether the trouble was on the gentleman's side and they did not have any way of disciplining those who got out of the ranks over there on several bills.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, we are getting along finely over here. We will get along well enough. We have won nearly every substantial fight that we have made in this Congress, although we have only 132 Members.

But I started to say that the gentleman from Iowa is more nearly right than he is wrong about this budget matter. That is to say, there has been so much piffle about the thing. Now, as I said in some remarks made here just before the adjournment of the extra session, it looks like some of the newspapers are carrying standing headlines about Dawes's savings. We have read where he saved $30,000,000 or more by remaining away from lunch for half an hour, where he saved a million dollars between cuss words, or things of that sort. Now, as a matter of fact, Gen. Dawes has taken the estimates placed before him by the departments and has done what the Appropriations Committee would have done in any event if it had followed the unbroken precedents of the last 40 years, namely, cut those estimates. There has not been a Congress under any administration with the history of which I am at all familiar that has not always cut the appropriation bills below the estimates of the departments.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. May I remind the gentleman that the Appropriations Committee has cut Gen. Dawes's estimates in this bill nearly 10 per cent?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was just going to say that, and I thank the gentleman. These Dawes's savings that have been advertised to the country have been entirely misleading, and the statements in regard to them have been worded in such a way as to disgust men who are accustomed to deal with public questions with frankness and candor and plainness.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. The estimates in this bill were $131,000,000. The recommendations by the committee are $118,000,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The committee has cut the estimates which Gen. Dawes sent in, of course, and will cut them more and more. I presume that Gen. Dawes has been of service to the committee in that he did a lot of preliminary cutting which the committee would have done in any event had they been sent in from the department.

Now, as far as Gen. Dawes not having aid enough up there is concerned to enable him to make all the cuts, of course, the situation about that is this, if I remember it correctly: He had an allowance of $225,000. He could employ four men besides himself. He gets a salary, I believe, of $10,000, and he could have employed four men at a salary not to exceed $5,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He could employ four at a salary exceeding $5,000 and as many as he pleased at a salary of $5,000 or less.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think it can be claimed that he has not had furnished him by the Congress all the facilities that he needed to enable him to do the work. And I should not like for his failure to cut these estimates to the point where the Committee on Appropriations has found it necessary to cut them to be charged up to any failure of Congress to give him all the financial aid he needed in order to get assistance to enable him to do the work. It ought to be stated, in frankness and candor to the people of the United States, that what he has done is merely to review estimates, cut estimates, and not have it continuously and persistently drummed into the ears of the people all over the country every day that he is saving millions of dollars between bites in the lunch room and thousands between cuss words.

Mr. GARNER. As to the budget system, the principal suggestion as to its merits was first in the direction of the elimination of duplication, and so far as I know up to this time there has not been a single elimination of a bureau or activity of the Government where it is duplicating the work of some other department.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That has been pointed out, and it appears right in this bill.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I was one of those who did everything I could to get the budget system adopted, and I am not going to sit in my seat and hear it lambasted by people who have, I assume, the best intentions, but, in my judgment, do not know what they are talking about. I am satisfied that Gen. Dawes——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman referring to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] or to me? [Laughter.]

Mr. MAGEE. Well, you are both my friends. I hold the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in the highest esteem, as I do the gentleman from Iowa, and I do not think either one of you would intentionally do any injustice to Gen. Dawes. But I am going to have my say, because I am a member of the committee. Gen. Dawes appeared before the committee. I heard his statement, and I am absolutely satisfied that the budget system up to date has saved at least several hundred millions of dollars to the taxpayers of this country, and we have not yet got the system into efficient operation, as it were. Now, at this time to criticize the work and Gen. Dawes, who left his business to come to Washington to do what he could in the interest of the Government and of the country, is something that I do not propose to stand for. I think every Member of this House wants to do justice to Gen. Dawes. I am satisfied that the success or failure of the budget system depends to a vary large extent upon Executive pressure. I am satisfied that there is no person who can make the budget system a success except the Excutive.

I do not think you can get anywhere by making a larger appropriation—that is, by increasing the number of employees in the Bureau of the Budget.

You have got to work through Executive pressure. My idea is that the President must select some man from each department who is familiar with the work of that department, and who, as the direct representative of the Executive, can go to the head of that department and say, "You have got to pare your expenditures."

It is absolutely untenable to claim that the whole responsibility for economy is on the Director of the Budget. His word is not the last word. The last word is with the Members of the House, primarily with the members of the Committee on Appropriations, and, after they have made their report, with you. It is not to be assumed—and Gen. Dawes, I think, would be the last person in the world to assume—that you will take the items as submitted by the Director of the Budget and not review them and reduce them whenever it is possible to do so.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. MAGEE. Well, I have got my mind running now on this subject, and if the gentleman will just wait until I express my thoughts.

What I mean to say is this: I do not think there is any person in the world who would welcome more than Gen Dawes would the action of the Committee on Appropriations in making its own investigation of the items which he has submitted through the Bureau of the Budget. I think that Gen. Dawes would feel that the members of the Committee on Appropriations would be derelict in their duty if they did not do it. Why should we not do it? The responsibility ultimately is upon us to reduce public expenditures. We can not shift that burden.

I think we should give credit to whom credit is due. I feel that I know what I am talking about. I did not spend my Christmas vacation at home; I stayed here and worked with the distinguished chairman of the committee and attended these hearings, and did what I could to get out this bill. I do not want to do any man an injustice. I say that Gen. Dawes is entitled to the gratitude of the House and of the country for the efficient work which he has done. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MAGEE. May I have two minutes additional?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have no personal criticism to make of Gen. Dawes as Director of the Budget. But as I stated on yesterday, I am disappointed at the progress that has been made thus far in the administration of the budget law. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] referred to the budget law and to his very earnest support of it. That law was passed with practical unanimity by Congress. It is a good law. But no law, however perfect it may be, will bring results unless it is properly administered. I realize, of course, that there is something in the contention that this is a new law, it having only been passed early in June of last year; but I think just criticism can be made of the fact that, despite the claims that were made to the effect that the enactment of a budget system would serve to reduce expenditures, the first report of the Budget Bureau and the result of its work have resulted in a request for an increase over the appropriations made for the present fiscal year, those appropriations having been made without the assistance of the Budget Bureau; and if Congress were to accept the estimates submitted by the Director of the Budget Bureau, then Congress would appropriate for next year over $29,000,000 more than was appropriated for the year 1922. I repeat, I think there is some criticism due, because it was in the minds of every Member of Congress on both sides of this Chamber when the law was passed that a proper administration of the budget law would bring about a reduction in the estimates.

Gentlemen have referred to the fact that the Director of the Budget has reduced some of the estimates which were submitted to him by the departments before they were sent to Congress, and for this they attempt to claim credit for the bureau.

I think the trouble on the other side of this Chamber is that they have gotten into the habit of claiming a mere reduction of estimates as a real saving that they can not get out of that habit now in the discussion of the estimates submitted by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. The only proper way to determine whether there has been a saving is by a comparison of the estimates with previous appropriations which have been made for similar purposes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say to the gentleman that if the Congress appropriated the amount of money asked for by the Budget Bureau it will be necessary either to pass additional revenue legislation or else there will be a deficit of between $700,000,000 and $800,000,000 for next year. The gentleman was on the Budget Committee, and, as I recall, one of the arguments made in behalf of a budget was that when we had a budget system and the law was properly administered we would be able to determine within a margin of $5,000,000 what would be the aggregate of the estimates for a given year, and what would be the amount of revenue that would be required to meet them. Now, if the proper help is given by this Congress to the Bureau of the Budget it is hoped that the revenues received into the Treasury and the expenditures under the estimates might be balanced, and if that can not be done there will either be a deficit or it will be necessary to obtain, in addition to the revenue from the tariff, a difference of some $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 additional revenue.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. The fact is that we are in the same situation that we were in before the budget law was passed, due not to the law but its administration. It is necessary for the Congress to greatly reduce the estimates submitted by the Bureau of the Budget or we shall incur a deficit and have to increase taxes or issue certificates of indebtedness.

Now, as I said yesterday, the budget law provided and made it the duty of the President and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to tell Congress how the Government was going to take care of an anticipated deficit, but no such information has been given.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one additional minute. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it is not a fact that one of the virtues of the budget system lies in the fact that if Congress cuts below the estimates submitted by the Budget Bureau, we get the credit therefor, but if they go beyond and increase the appropriations above the estimate made by the Bureau of the Budget then we come in for severe criticism?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Naturally that is one of the effects; but, Mr. Chairman, I fear that the Director of the Budget in making his reductions that have been referred to has followed the practice that he followed when he told Congress and the Committee on Ways and Means, which was preparing the revenue bill, that $350,000,000 would be saved during the present fiscal year. How did he do it? It was disclosed in the hearing. He went to these bureaus, and without considering whether or not they needed the money, arbitrarily directed them to set apart 10 per cent of the amount that had been appropriated. I will give you one instance. The Bureau of Public Health had over $4,080,000 appropriated for surgical and hospital supplies. He directed the Bureau of Public Health to set aside $400,000, which of course went to make up the $350,000,000 which he claimed was an economy this year. Yet in November, when the deficiency bill came before this Congress, the Bureau of Public Health stated that it was necessary to use $200,000 of that reserve; and I have no doubt that all of it will be used between now and the first of the next fiscal year, and the same is true of many other appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of assessing and collecting the internal-revenue taxes, including the employment of the necessary officers, attorneys, experts, agents, accountants, inspectors, deputy collectors, clerks, janitors, and messengers in the District of Columbia and the several collection districts, to be appointed as provided by law, telegraph and telephone service, rental of quarters outside the District of Columbia, postage, freight, express, and other necessary miscellaneous expenses, and the purchase of such supplies, equipment, furniture, mechanical devices, printing, stationery, law books and books of reference, and such other articles as may be necessary for use in the District of Columbia and the several collection districts, $34,409,690: Provided, That not more than $100,000 of the total amount appropriated herein may be expended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for detecting and bringing to trial persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws or conniving at the same, including payments for information and detection of such violation.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the paragraph on page 25 I note that without limitation there is authority for employing certain attorneys and officers in this department. May I ask the chairman of the committee if there are not in this department a definite number of officers, attorneys, and employees without the general authority to employ $34,000,000 extra?

Mr. MADDEN. It is general authority, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. May I inquire if this $34,000,000 is above and beyond all of the regular employees of the department?

Mr. MADDEN. It is above all the statutory salaries. It includes the field officers and the clerks of the internal revenue office, and all their employees everywhere throughout the United States.

Mr. DOWELL. But what I mean is, Does this include those that are specified and their salaries fixed, or is this an additional number? This says in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. It would refer to the officers in the District?

Mr. MADDEN. Part here and part throughout the United States. If the gentleman will give me an opportunity I will try to explain just what it does mean.

Mr. DOWELL. I would like to have it explained. From the reading of it, it indicates that there is a general authority to employ officers and attorneys for these purposes, and from my reading of it I understand that it would be outside of the regular employees of the department. I would like to have the gentleman's explanation of it, if he will be kind enough to give it to the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. The appropriation covered under this provision for the current fiscal year was $29,162,000, plus a deficiency appropriation of $1,792,000. This $1,792,000 was appropriated in the last deficiency act, and authorized the employment of 600 additional auditors, whose employment was authorized to begin as of the 1st of this month.

The proposal under which that $1,792,000 was appropriated contemplated the installation of 100 of these 600 men in each month—January, February, March, April, May, and June. They are to be expert auditors and field inspectors. The occasion for their employment is the fact that the returns of 9,000 corporations, running back as far as 1917, have not yet been audited. Some of these corporation returns are very voluminous. They are the returns of corporations having subsidiary companies. The employment of these auditors and supplementary employees, which include deputy collectors, field agents, clerks, and inspectors, was authorized for the further reason that there are 160,000 claims for reimbursement under tax returns. Many of these run back for several years. A year ago, in the sundry civil act, the sum of $8,000,000 was appropriated for this activity on the promise of the Internal Revenue Bureau that they would raise $157,000,000 in back taxes as the audits were brought current and $200,000,000 more as the field auditors were able to complete their work. That was the basis of the appropriation that was allowed. They have made good to the extent of turning in from back taxes $357,000,000 a year, taxes that they were able to divulge as the result of the examination of the returns that had been made. They told us that in addition to the $357,000,000 to be raised from the sources indicated as a result of the $8,000,000 appropriation, if we would give them 600 additional auditors and the supplementary force and $1,792,000 additional money for the balance of this fiscal year, they would raise $200,000,000 more within the year; that if we would give them 600 more men as of the 1st of July in addition to these 600 they would be able undoubtedly to bring these 160,000 claims for reimbursement out of the pigeonholes, adjust them, and they undoubtedly would be able, judging from their past experience, to raise $200,000,000 more instead of refunding a large amount, because in most cases where claims were made for refunds it would develop that the people who demanded the refunds owed the Government money.

The committee decided that we would give them the first 600 auditors and the supplementary force, which we did under the deficiency act passed just before the Christmas adjournment. Then when they came to ask for the other 600 auditors we said, "Well, no; we will give you the 600 and carry them for the fiscal year 1923." The fiscal year 1923 carrying the 600 would mean $4,300,000, because of the constant employment of these 600 men and the supplementary force, whereas to-day the first 600 were employed for five months, the second hundred for four months, the third hundred for three months, and so on. They would all be employed for the entire year next year, so that makes up $4,300,000, which, added to the $29,000,000 and some odd thousands, makes that $34,000,000. We believe the employment of these additional men and the granting of this additional appropriation will yield additional revenue to the amount of over $250,000,000 at the very lowest. And it will do more than that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. It will do more than that; it will finish the work up sooner. Many of the people who have filed returns for taxes are in a state of uncertainty as to what is going to happen when their schedules are audited. They want these schedules audited as much as the Government does. They want to know whether they are to be responsible for a million dollars more or a million dollars less. There may be four or five million dollars involved in some of these schedules, and there is not a business man that wants to be stood up in the air all the time; he wants to know what he owes. He may die, and he wants to know the condition of his estate before he dies. We have made an appropriation with a limitation later on that no part of the appropriation for Internal Revenue Service of the Government shall be used for increases in compensation within any class.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman may have answered this, but I want to ask the gentleman in that connection whether the final audit for the year 1917 is completed?

Mr. MADDEN. No; that is the trouble. Most of the audits for 1917 that are uncompleted are in connection with the large corporations, and some corporation returns are very voluminous. It will take two or three wagons to carry a schedule and exhibits. There are 9,000 of them. It is said that no man living can audit more than 10 or 15 of these returns in a year.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman state how much money there is in dispute?

Mr. MADDEN. They have 160,000 claims, and there are 9,000,000 schedules filed every year, including the monthly report of sales under the stamp act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have been informed that there is more than a billion dollars in dispute.

Mr. MADDEN. They say that if they get all of the returns audited there is no doubt that they would raise the billion and a half dollars, and if we give them the means to do what they are now proposing to do under this provision of the bill they tell me that they will at least give us $557,000,000 and maybe $750,000,000 in revenue.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am pleased to hear that they are making additional allowance for the auditing of these schedules. It seems to me that that is one of the most important business functions that ought to be looked after because of the fact that some of these accounts have not been audited for 1917. Does the gentleman think that 600 additional auditors and supplementary employees are sufficient to bring the job up to date?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; we went carefully into that, and we figured that if we gave the 1,200 they want the force might get top-heavy. It was done not with a view to economize in force but to economize in the work.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The men are appointed under the civil service?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and all trained men.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Civil Service Commission be able to furnish a list of eligibles of trained men?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; they have a force already assembled so that they can get them without any trouble. They send them to school after they get them. A man must have a fundamental knowledge upon which you can base a superstructure that will enable him to do the work intelligently and effectively. An ordinary man would not be able to do it; you must have a certain class of education to do it, and on top of that they must be trained for this particular work.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, Mr. MCFADDEN, and Mr. FOCHT, by unanimous consent, were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I have no disposition to thresh over old straw, but, inasmuch as the paragraph under consideration has to do with the Internal-Revenue Service, I take this opportunity to submit an observation or two relative to the surtax question. It is apparent from statements that are appearing in the public press and elsewhere that there is still quite a general misapprehension in the country as to the effect of the new surtax rates in the recently enacted revenue law. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] placed in the RECORD a few days ago some figures on this matter. Some time ago I prepared a table that is similar to his but which gives the comparison in a somewhat different way. A number of Members have asked that I insert the table in the RECORD. This table shows the amount of surtax for various incomes under the old law, the amounts under the new law, and also what the amounts would have been had the House provision been adopted instead of the Senate provision. It also shows the amounts of reduction in surtax under the new law and what the reductions would have been for various incomes had the House proposal been adopted instead of the Senate provision.

During the surtax controversy practically all the press publicity centered around the difference in the maximum rates provided in the Senate and the House bills, as though that were the only difference in the two proposals. The fact is that the difference in the method of readjusting the surtax rates was, in the view of many of us, of equal if not greater importance. The House provision gave no surtax relief whatever to incomes below $68,000. It bunched all its relief on the 11,000 surtax payers with incomes above $68,000. The Senate provision, on the other hand, readjusted the rates from the bottom to the top, starting the relief with incomes of $6,000—which are the lowest incomes subject to surtax—and cutting down the rates clear through to the highest incomes. The Senate provision gave a measure of relief to all the 657,000 surtax payers from the lowest to the highest.

Further, unless a man's income is more than $86,000 a year, he will pay less surtax under the new law than he would have paid had the House provision been adopted instead of the Senate provision. It is only the incomes above $86,000 which will pay more surtax than they would have paid if the House provision had been adopted, and it must not be forgotten that even these vast incomes receive substantial reductions below the old law. There is practically no one in many Western and Southern States who would have received a cent of surtax relief under the House provision. Indeed, the men who would have been benefited would have been comparatively few in any State. It was this utter unfairness of the readjustment in the original provision in the House bill which abundantly justified the House in receding and agreeing to the rates provided in the Senate bill. And it was this difference more than anything else which to many of us from the very start made support of the House proposal impossible.

This table has been submitted to the Treasury Department for verification, and perhaps it would be well for the sake of certainty to submit that portion of the reply of the department bearing upon the matter, which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 28, 1921.

Hon. HOMER HOCH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of the 27th instant, together with the inclosed table, is at hand. I have checked the figures of the table, and find them correct.

Respectfully,
JOS. S. McCOY,
Government Actuary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the table that I have referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with Gen. Dawes, but he comes highly recommended by our colleagues from Illinois. The fact that he has been appointed by the President is a guaranty of his ability. The fact that it has been necessary for the standing committee to reduce his recommendations to the extent of 10 per cent thereof is somewhat discouraging, but he is a new man, and I have no doubt but that in due season he will establish a good reputation for himself as an active agent of the Government operating in the interests of economy in national expenditures.

What I purpose to say on this occasion relates to economy. We have in this House on the Republican side a preponderating majority which at times somewhat disintegrates. On the Democratic side we find a small minority which acts with solidarity—largely voting as one man. Since I have been in Congress I have observed that when an amendment is offered having as its object the increase of an appropriation a certain segment of the majority votes for it, and the minority, acting in solidarity, also votes for it, and the amendment carries. In nine cases out of ten I have voted against amendments offered to increase appropriations; nine times out of ten I have voted for amendments intended to reduce appropriations; but ten times out of ten the minority has voted to increase, and never to decrease, the appropriation. If gentlemen on the Democratic side are in good faith about carrying out the letter and spirit of the budget law, that good faith time will prove. If they are sincerely in good faith, and I have no right to challenge their good faith—they are gentlemen of honor, of culture, and reputation, largely from the South—I say time will prove their good faith and sincerity. Thus far they have been playing a little game of politics. If they can convict the Republican Party of swelling the appropriations, they believe that a few more Democrats will creep into the House after the next election. What I am concerned about is the welfare of the country without regard to politics, having in mind the fact that the people are having to pay the bills and that their interests should be considered and looked after a little bit while we are here. Time will determine if the Democratic side of the House is in good faith about standing by the budget law. If these gentlemen stand by the recommendations of the standing committee, we will know that they are at heart in favor of the budget law; but if they vote to disregard the recommendations of the Director of the Budget when upheld by the Appropriations Committee and to increase the amount of the appropriations, then we will know that they want the budget law to break down and fail. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses to enforce the provisions of the "national prohibition act" and the act entitled "An act to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon, all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or cocoa leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes," approved December 17, 1914, as amended by the "revenue act of 1918," including the employment of executive officers, agents, inspectors, chemists, assistant chemists, supervisors, clerks, and messengers in the field and in the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the District of Columbia, to be appointed as authorized by law; the securing of evidence of violations of the acts, and for the purchase of such supplies, equipment, mechanical devices, laboratory supplies, books, necessary printing and binding, and such other expenditures as may be necessary in the District of Columbia and several field offices, and for rental of necessary quarters, $9,250,000: Provided, That not to exceed $49,500 of the foregoing sum shall be expended for rental of quarters in the District of Columbia if space can not be assigned by the Public Buildings Commission in other buildings under the control of that commission: Provided further, That not to exceed $750,000 of the foregoing sum shall be expended for enforcement of the provisions of the said act of December 17, 1914: Provided further, That not to exceed $25,000 of the total amount appropriated shall be available for advances to be made by special disbursing agents when authorized by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the provisions of section 3648 of the Revised Statutes to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL: Page 26, line 18, after the word "quarters," strike out the figure "9" and insert the following at the end of the line: "Any further moneys required shall be paid by the individual States, if they so desire, under the concurrent power conferred upon them by section 2 of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment, in that it is a change of law and is not in order.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. I will reserve it for five minutes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. We have heard this speech a number of times, and I make the point of order.

Mr. HILL. I ask to be heard on the point of order. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. With a point of order prevailing, the gentleman can not; but the Chair will hear the gentleman briefly on the point of order.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is entirely nonpartisan matter of economy, and if you vote for this simple amendment, by striking out the figure "9" you save $9,000,000 a year to the American people. I am sure that it is not out of order, but a proper thing to submit a smaller sum than——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the gentleman, being given permission to discuss the point of order, certainly should confine himself to a discussion of that phase of the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair assumes the gentleman was simply laying his foundation by stating some general facts, but the Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. HILL. The second portion of the amendment deals entirely with the second section of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution dealing with the concurrent power to enforce national prohibition, and I submit that this being an appropriation bill, this amendment being an amendment to reduce an appropriation from $9,250,000 to $250,000 is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It is clear that it is attempted legislation on an appropriation bill; if not, the language is meaningless; and if it is legislation, it is obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out all except that portion of the amendment which reduces it from $9,250,000 to $250,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to offer such an amendment.

Mr. HILL. I move to amend by striking out "$9,250,000," line 18, page 26, and substitute therefor "$250,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 18, after the word "quarters," strike out the figures "$9,250,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$250,000."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division. I withdraw the demand for a division.

The Clerk read as follows:

For medical examinations, medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies for beneficiaries (other than patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau) of the Public Health Service, including necessary personnel, regular and reserve commissioned officers of the Public Health Service, personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, maintenance, equipment, leases, fuel, lights, water, printing, freight, transportation and travel, maintenance and operation of motor trucks and passenger motor vehicles, transportation, care, maintenance, and treatment of lepers, court costs, and other expenses incident to proceedings heretofore or hereafter taken for commitment of mentally incompetent persons to hospitals for the care and treatment of the insane, and reasonable burial expenses (not exceeding $100 for any patient dying in hospital), $5,627,394: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used for the quarantine service, the prevention of epidemics, or scientific work of the character provided for under the appropriations which follow.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. CROWTHER. To move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, there was a vote cast here a little while ago—an hour or two ago—that demonstrated pretty clearly the condition that confronts the Republican side of the House. We tried a few days ago to get a quorum and found it very difficult. Members on the other side of the House—Democrats—deliberately hotfooted from the chamber like a lot of Jack Garner's Angora goats up in the Panhandle, and could not be found anywhere. But to-day when there was a vote and it was necessary to have some support to maintain a salary to which there was an amendment for a reduction in an office held by a Democrat, why, they were right on hand and voted for it.

I want to say to you that there has been considerable undeserved criticism all over the country regarding this Congress. I read in to-day's papers that the administration is looked upon with great favor by the people of the country, but that they do not look with kindly eyes on the Congress, presumably this Republican Congress. I want to say to you that the administration does not help us very much by allowing all the departments here in Washington to remain filled with Democrats. I want to say to you that you have got to parade through a lot of them before you get to the chief of a bureau.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I can not yield. I have only a few minutes.

I want to say to you that the principal thing that is heard by us when we get home is, "Why are there so many Democrats in office under a Republican administration?" There are Democrats in the Treasury Department, in the Commerce Department, and in the mint; all sorts of jobs are held down by Democrats. I do not want to be extremely partisan, but it seems to me that when an administration changes there should be a political change in the personnel. I will give the Democrats credit for this: The Democratic Party everywhere, in municipal or State governments, turns every Republican out of office, but we are so mighty considerate that we keep Democrats in office. I do not know what the right term is that I should use, but I know the principle is wrong. One of the distinguished Senators from the West asked the Secretary of the Treasury during the preparation of the tariff bill if we had no Republican experts. Democratic experts assisted in the preparation of the tariff bill under a Republican administration, a bill that has sleeping sickness in the Senate hospital at the other end of the Capitol. [Laughter.]

They have Democratic employees in the Civil Service Commission that are making it difficult for us to secure proper reports on our candidates for the post offices. They have Democratic inspectors that are going around and reviewing and curtailing the service in the different communities, and you can not get a report on a post office that is against a man, even though his conduct of the office is reprehensible, because a Democratic inspector will go there and write you a letter and say that the post office is being run like the Bank of England, even though the postmaster is a bootlegger. [Laughter.] That is the kind of a position we are in. There has been some talk of cohesiveness here and what would produce it. I want to say to you on this side we do not intend to be divided by sectional lines, and you can not make me believe that the agricultural bloc is dividing the Republicans on this side in a way that is to be permanent. I want to say to you who represent the bloc that we need you on this side. You can not get any legislation of any kind by uniting yourselves with that aggregation of Democrats over there. [Applause on the Republican side.] We are diametrically opposed on all the real fundamentals of government. And I ask you in a friendly spirit to stay on our side and do not let these sectional questions divide our strength. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of workmen and other employees, $8,200. For incidental and contingent expenses, $5,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. I offer a pro forma amendment, on page 43, line 25, to strike out the word "employees," for the purpose of asking a question. I will ask the chairman, if I may, if he knows how many employees we have now in Washington?

Mr. MADDEN. In the Treasury Department?

Mr. BLANTON. In Washington.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is 71,000 or 72,000. I am not exactly sure, but I will try to get it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not 74,000?

Mr. MADDEN. I was not sure exactly, and I was just trying to get it in order to refresh my recollection. It was 78,805 on July 31, 1921.

Mr. BLANTON. And it is 74,000 now?

Mr. MADDEN. About 74,000 now. It was 90,000 on July 1, 1920, and now it is about 72,000.

Mr. BLANTON. I understood about 74,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Maybe it is 74,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that just before the war we had 35,000?

Mr. MADDEN. I think we had between 35,000 and 37,000. I am not sure exactly.

Mr. BLANTON. Was not the gentleman of the opinion before he became chairman of the Appropriations Committee that when we had 80,000 we ought to send about 40,000 of them home?

Mr. MADDEN. I still think so.

Mr, BLANTON. The gentleman still thinks that, now?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Of course, then we had a smaller number. Of course, we did not then have the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. That would give us 5,000 more than we had before the war, even to send 40,000 home.

Mr. MADDEN. Another thing they did not have: They did not have the enlarged Internal Revenue Bureau, due to the large collections.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman has not receded from his former position?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not.

Mr. BLANTON. And being in the official position of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that holds the purse strings, does the gentleman think he is going to be able to send these employees back home?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. We have sent home a good many, and in this bill we have reduced a great many more.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind telling, for the information of the people of the country, how many of these employees he believes we can get rid of by the 1st of next January?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I can not tell that exactly. I do not know how many. It is impossible to tell.

Mr. BLANTON. It is still going to be the purpose of the gentleman, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to cut them loose and send them back home, if possible?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that one thing I have in mind is, if we can, to consolidate the bonded warehouses. I have an amendment for that. I would have introduced it to-day if we could have worked it out. That will take out 900.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean in Washington.

Mr. MADDEN. And another thing, within the year we will be through with the work of the Director General of Railroads, and there will be over 2,000 turned out there, and there will be other places where reductions will be made, and I think there will be a large number reduced in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I am going to help in the work in every way I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Oswego, N. Y., post office: For restoration of stone cornice and wall facing, replacing roof construction and covering, new gutters, downspouts, etc., $35,000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DALLINGER offers the following amendment: On page 45, after line 17, insert "Washington, District of Columbia: National Archives Building: For site of building, including $25,000 for technical services, $500,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, this matter is a matter of vital importance to the country. A national archives building was authorized in 1913, and it has been realized more and more that the Government ought to have such a building. A short time ago there was a fire in the building occupied by the Department of Commerce and all the old records of the Census Bureau were destroyed, and just after that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] made a strong speech here on the floor of the House, which met with universal approval among the Members, urging that this building should be constructed at once and that these priceless records of the Government that are now scattered all around the District in buildings that are not fireproof should be housed in a fireproof building.

This item was in the estimates submitted by the Treasury Department and was also included in the report of the Director of the Budget. In the hearings, page 849, the chairman asked the Acting Supervising Architect, "When was this authorized?" To this Mr. Wetmore replied, "The building itself, in my opinion, has never been authorized. There are some who hold that the legislation as it now stands authorizes the building. The site is authorized." As the hearing goes on it is plain from the questions asked by the chairman that he thought that, if no building was authorized, it would not be good business to buy a site and take that amount of property out of the taxable property of the District of Columbia and hold it until some future time. Probably it was for this reason that the item was omitted from the bill as reported by the committee, for there was no objection to the site itself, Mr. Wetmore testifying that there is no unoccupied land belonging to the Government centrally located of sufficient size without having to buy some additional land.

Now, as a matter of fact, the act of June 28, 1916, chapter 183, after repealing certain existing legislation on the national archives building—provisions relative to a preliminary inspection of archives in Europe, provisions which by reason of the war had become impossible of execution and for other reasons have now become unnecessary—said explicitly: "And the construction of the said building according to the terms of said act of March 4, 1913, is hereby authorized without such inspection and consultation in Europe."

It is not known on what grounds the Acting Supervising Architect, in the face of this explicit language of the statute, could say that the building had not been authorized, the statement which evidently led the committee to omit the item providing for the site. As a matter of fact, the acquisition of the site could be immediately followed by the erection of the building without other legislation than a suitable appropriation.

The Supervising Architect of the Treasury is entirely wrong about the matter. This building was authorized by law, and is still authorized by law. I am aware that my time is limited and that the committee desires to get through this bill this afternoon, but I ask the indulgence of the members of the committee, so that they can see that the information given to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at the hearing was absolutely wrong. Section 21 of the act of March 4, 1913, entitled—

An act (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes—

Provides as follows:

"SEC. 21. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to prepare designs and estimates for a fireproof national archives building of modern library-stack type of architecture, containing not less than 3,000,000 cubic feet of space, suitable for the orderly storage of records, documents, and other papers which have accumulated in the various departments, independent establishments, and executive offices and in the files of the Senate and House of Representatives and are not needed for current use.

"That the said designs and estimates shall be prepared with a view to the erection of the said building in the city of Washington, D. C., upon a lot of land large enough to contain ultimately a building embracing 8,900,000 cubic feet of space.

"That the said designs and estimates shall make provision for a building capable of subsequent extension, without impairing its architectural appearance, from a capacity of 3,000,000 cubic feet to a capacity of 8,900,000 cubic feet.

"That before the said designs and estimates are completed inspection shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury of the best modern national archive buildings in Europe, and consultation shall be had with the best authorities in Europe on the construction and arrangement of archive buildings.

"That the said designs and estimates shall provide for the construction of a building the total cost of which, including heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, shall not exceed the sum of $1,500,000.

"That whenever the said designs and estimates have been approved by a commission consisting of the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Interior, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in his discretion, to purchase, or cause to be taken for public use, by condemnation or otherwise, as a site for said building, any piece of land of the size defined in this section the purchase of which shall be approved by the said commission.

"That for the preparation of said designs and estimates the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be expended for employment of technical and engineering services in the office of the Supervising Architect."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. The only change that has been made is in chapter 183, an act approved June 28, 1916, which simply provided—

That paragraph 4 of section 21 of the public-buildings act, approved March 4, 1913, which reads as follows: "That before the said designs and estimates are completed inspection shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury of the best modern national archive buildings in Europe, and consultations shall be had with the best authorities in Europe on the construction and arrangement of archive buildings," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the acquisition of a site for a national archives building, and the construction of the said building according to the terms of said act of March 4, 1913, is hereby authorized without such inspection and consultation in Europe.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this Congress will be grossly negligent of its duty if it allows the construction of this building to be put off any longer. What are we going to do? Are we going to wait until some other department buildings that we are leasing from private parties, and which are not fireproof, burn down? It seems to me this matter ought to be attended to without any further delay.

At the present time the archives of the Department of State are stored in various parts of the State, War, and Navy Building, of which a recent report by the National Board of Fire Underwriters says: "The building itself has low combustibility, but owing to its arrangement and inflammable contents the fire hazard is high. If a fire were to get beyond initial control, the chance of excessive loss to both building and contents is very great."

The most important archives of the War Department, including, indeed, nearly all its archives, are now housed in a temporary structure at Seventh and B Streets, which is far from being fireproof, and can barely be described as of slow-burning construction. Here are all the headquarters records and papers of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, those of the historical section of the Army War College, those of The Adjutant Generals' Office for all preceding wars, as well as the recent World War, all the muster rolls of previous wars, and all the personal-service records of individual soldiers in this last war.

Furthermore, the papers of the war-time camps and cantonments, which have been ordered transferred to Washington, but have not yet arrived, are now stored in highly inflammable buildings at many scattered points, under no satisfactory care.

The archives of the Treasury Department are much scattered. Those of the Secretary's office are stored mainly in the attic of the Treasury Building, where they are exposed to extremes of heat and cold and where they are deteriorating rapidly. The fire hazard in the attic is very great, and the archives stored there would be totally destroyed if a fire were once started. Other Treasury archives are stored under the north lawn of the Treasury Building in a kind of cellar built around the foundations of the fountain, and still others are in the basement of Poli's Theater. A storage warehouse on E Street—Merchants' Transfer—is filled with public records, largely from the Treasury Department. These records are on wooden shelves, placed as close together as possible, and the records kept there are in the worst possible condition. Here, again, the fire hazard is great because of the crowding and of the combustible nature of the contents of the building.

The Land Office and the Indian Office records, although now stored in the new Interior Department Building, are badly crowded, and are liable to suffer from fire in the same way that the records of the Census Bureau, stored in a building of similar construction, suffered some months ago.

The conditions of storage in the Post Office Department Building are such that a small fire once started would do irreparable damage to the most important records of the department.

Finally, the records of the special war boards are for the most part housed in temporary wooden structures. Those of the War Trade Board, by far the most important for the history of international relations during the war, are in temporary building No. 5, a building mostly of wooden construction, where not long ago they narrowly escaped a destructive fire. Those of the Food Administration, of the United States Grain Corporation, and some records of the Department of Labor are in wooden buildings at Nineteenth and D Streets, the construction of which may be judged from the fact that they have been lately lined with a metallic mesh to protect the records from the depredations of rats. The records of the Federal Trade Board are at New York Avenue and Twentieth Street in a building not much better.

In this connection, I desire to read the following attested copy of a memorial adopted by the council of the American Historical Association at its last meeting:

For 13 years, beginning in 1908, a committee of the American Historical Association has annually urged upon Congress the erection of a suitable national archive building in Washington in which the records and papers of the Government, now kept in a hundred different repositories, mostly unfit and unsafe, may be preserved in safety, arranged in good order, found rapidly, and consulted with ease.

During that time Congress has authorized the erection of the building and provided for preliminary plans, and the Public Buildings Commission has selected a site, but the recommendations and estimates annually submitted by the Treasury have not thus far been followed by any appropriations for purchase of site or beginning of construction.

Meanwhile during these 13 years, and especially since the beginning of the World War, the situation has grown far worse and calls more loudly for remedy. The material needing to be preserved—partly in the interest of history, but much more largely in the interest of the Government as a business organization, whose papers represent great sums of money—has increased very largely in amount.

A larger number of unsuitable places have been pressed into service to receive the overflow. Thus the records and papers of the American Expeditionary Forces in France and all those of The Adjutant General's office relating to all previous wars are kept in a building not fireproof. Another collection, representing many millions of dollars in recent tax claims, lies in the basement of a theater in Washington. Government papers stored elsewhere in the United States or at our legations abroad are in quite as bad case, exposed to fire and destruction. And the rent annually paid for unsuitable quarters in Washington would pay interest on the cost of the finest national archives building in the world.

In the interest of security, in the interest of economy, in the interest of system, in the interest of the rapid and efficient conduct of the public business, and, not least, in the interest of American history, the Council of the American Historical Association respectfully urges Congress to make at this present session an adequate appropriation for at least the purchase of the site for the national archives building.

Signed by the members of the council present, viz:

Charles H. Haskins, professor in Harvard University, first vice president of the association; John S. Bassett, professor in Smith College, secretary of the association; Charles Moore, president of the Fine Arts Commission, treasurer of the association; Arthur L. Cross, professor in the University of Michigan; Sidney B. Fay, professor in Smith College; Carl R. Fish, professor in the University of Wisconsin; Carlton J. H. Hayes, professor in Columbia University; J. Franklin Jameson, Carnegie Institution of Washington; Frederic L. Paxson, professor in the University of Wisconsin; St. George L. Sioussat, professor in Johns Hopkins University.

[SEAL.] PATTIE W. WASHINGTON,
Assistant Secretary of the American Historical Association.

Mr. Chairman, this is the only country in the world that has not a national archives building, and it is about time we had one. We should have had one long ago. This was authorized in the act of 1913, but at each session of Congress the Committee on Appropriations omits this item on the plea of economy. I again ask the Members of the House this question, Are we going to wait until fire after fire has taken place and sets of records that are priceless and that can never be replaced are destroyed before we begin to acquire the site for this building that is already authorized? I trust that the amendment which I have offered will be adopted.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, because there is no authority of law for the proposal contained in the amendment.

I should like to state to the Chair that the only authority cited by the gentleman was merely an authorization for a preliminary survey. The sum of $5,000 was appropriated to pay the expenses of that survey. As far as it went, under the most liberal construction it provided that upon the meeting of minds of five different Government officials, then they would be authorized under such circumstances to purchase a site; but nowhere in that act or in the supplementary act, which merely amended it in one particular, will there be found any authority for the construction of this building. I am not discussing the merits of it, but the matter was presented in detail to the Committee on Appropriations. I presume that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has just as much at heart the interest of the Government as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] has, and if he had deemed it necessary to have this building constructed he would probably have put it in this bill. The chairman has not seen fit to do that, the Committee on Appropriations have not seen fit to do it, and I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if the provisions of the act of March 4, 1913, as to the preparation of designs, estimates, and so forth, have been complied with? In the act referred to there is a provision—

That whenever the said designs and estimates—

Described in the preceding paragraphs—have been approved by a commission consisting of the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Interior, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall be and is hereby authorized and directed, in his discretion, to purchase or cause to be taken for public use, by condemnation or otherwise, as a site for said building any piece of land of the size defined in this section the purchase of which shall be approved by the said commission.

This is all that the Chair can find authorizing the purchase of a site.

Mr. DALLINGER. I am informed that has been done, and there was an item in the bill providing for a site, in the last Congress, as I recall, but in conference between the two Houses it was dropped out.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no information before the Committee on Appropriations to the effect that any such conditions as have been read by the Chairman have been complied with, and I do not believe they have.

Mr. DALLINGER. I understand they have been.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as the Chair has been able to ascertain by a somewhat hasty examination, the only law authorizing the purchase of a site for an archives building is the conditional provision found in the act of March 4, 1913, and unless advised that the conditions therein contained have been complied with, the Chair will be compelled to rule that the amendment is not in order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committe rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9724, making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE LATE SENATOR PENROSE.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, within a few days the Nation has sustained a great loss in the death of Senator PENROSE, of Pennsylvania, and particularly heavy has this blow fallen on our own great State. In pursuance of the affectionate regard in which Senator PENROSE was held by the people of Pennsylvania, the Members representing that State in the Halls of this House on yesterday by unanimous declaration prepared a tribute to the deceased statesman and delegated me to present the same to the House with the request that it be read and become a part of the House records.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the statement referred to be read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOIES PENROSE.

The members of the Pennsylvania delegation in the United States House of Representatives, who only a few brief months ago were bereft by the death of their distinguished colleague, Senator Philander Chase Knox, again have had suddenly snatched from them another colleague, BOIES PENROSE, long distinguished as a Senator of the United States from Pennsylvania. The wounds these separations inflict, the personal losses they entail, are acute, not easily healed or repaired, and are suffered alike by our constituents and theirs, and by the whole people in whose service they were faithful unto death.

BOIES PENROSE passed into the larger sphere just as a dying year took its place in the hoary register of time as man records it, followed immediately by the joyful acclaim of merrymakers heralding the advent of a new-born year. Never more applicable the saying: "In the midst of life we are in death." We are reminded of the saying: "Even in laughter the heart is sorrowful; and the end of that mirth is heaviness."

BOIES PENROSE, whom nature fashioned in gladiatorial form, died fighting, his earthly armor battered and worn, but his courage unshaken. His spirit was dauntless; his will power adamantine; his personality well-nigh resistless. He was an integer—one thing. Yet he had many sides. In few men could be found so prominently developed those elements which were recognized in him and which stamped him in the public mind as a statesman in politics and a politician among statesmen. BOIES PENROSE was as keen in judgment of men and of political situations as he was farseeing in the higher realm of politics called statecraft. He tutored himself in the practicalities and intricacies of that school of politics which has primarily to do with preferments and platforms, while not neglecting that other school where trusted public servants give first thought and consideration to national policies. This man then was both politician and statesman, so regarded by friend and foe alike. And as able, determined, and unflagging in the one pursuit as in the other—so combining dual attributes in the one nature as never to suggest two-sidedness, but presenting oneness or unity of character and purpose rarely to be found in a public servant whose motives, whose purposes, and whose actions were so long subjects for the crucible of public opinion.

For 38 years, more than half his lifetime, BOIES PENROSE was a legislator. Endowed with natural mental power, of studious habits, taking advantage of opportunities offered by early environment, he acquired learning, and from Harvard went out into the world, first becoming a lawyer.

Thus equipped he entered the Pennsylvania Legislature, where his service of 13 years in house and senate was interrupted that he might take up the mantle of J. Donald Cameron in the Senate of the United States. Meanwhile, his party called him to political service of great responsibility requiring that sagacity and acumen which he possessed markedly, so necessary in a State chairman and in a national committeeman of any State, and superlatively in the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

For a quarter of a century United States Senator PENROSE was a commanding figure in the Senate. Contemporaneously he served there with outstanding and preeminent figures and lost no prestige by comparison with them either in constructive ability or in knowledge and grasp of public questions. There indeed was the forum in which PENROSE'S highly developed intellect, his tremendous capacity for hard and difficult tasks, his intuitive judgment and appraisements, even his sardonic wit and humor, found opportunity for full play; and there, as was to be expected, he closed a career of usefulness. Useful to his country with patriot's zeal in the advocacy of measures and policies which he thought embodied right principles of government consonant with the Constitution; useful to his own State in all of its diversified activities; useful to individuals whose number is legion; useful to friends, whom he never betrayed. And his usefulness, his outpouring of self, resulted in vicarious sacrifice of health.

His splendid, rugged physique could not always carry the burden. But after long illness, against which his fighting spirit rebelled, that same spirit in a tired frame resumed tasks, made more difficult by added responsibilities, fought on to the last and only succumbed to the inexorable summons which separated it from the crumbling earthly dwelling and from his friends. But—

"The spirit grows in its allotted spaces,
The mind is narrowed in a narrow sphere."

On behalf of the Pennsylvania delegation in the House of Representatives.

By the committee.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 486. An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 1542. An act for the relief of Philip A. Hertz; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2023. An act defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. 2072. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to make and receive conveyances effecting an exchange of title to the railroad rights of way at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 6998. An act to amend section 17 of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898, as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, and March 2, 1917.

H. R. 6557. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to repair and rebuild customs buildings in Porto and to pay for same out of duties collected in Porto Rico.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet on Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of Members who desire to be informed in regard to the program, I will say that we will probably take up District business on Monday. And my understanding is that there is perhaps enough District business to occupy the day. On Tuesday we will probably proceed to debate the unfinished business before the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, January 9, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

454. A letter from the Secretary of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting statement showing the number of typewriters, adding machines, and other similar labor-saving devices exchanged by the commission during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

455. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on reexamination of Fox River, Wis. (H. Doc. No. 146); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7598) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to dedicate and set apart as a national monument certain lands in Riverside County, Calif., reported the same with amendments accompanied by a report (No. 546), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SWANK: A bill (H. R. 9774) to provide for the purchase of a site for a public building at Stillwater, in the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 7, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we would call upon our entire being to glorify Thy name. We would have it evidenced in our conduct that we believe in Thee, believe in the teachings of Thy word, and are ready to be counseled all the while by the wisdom which cometh from above. Hear and help us in every difficulty, glorify Thyself in and through us; and may great grace be our constant portion. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the bill which has just come from the House of Representatives be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution of South Side Post, No. 531, the American Legion, of Toledo, Ohio, protesting against the proposal to pay a soldiers' bonus from funds raised by taxing beer and light wines, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of the Optimist Club, of Columbus, and sundry citizens of Columbus, Worthington, Clyde, Bucyrus, Powell, Lorain, Coalton, St. Marys, Terrace Park, Wooster, Sandusky, Newark, Alice, Clarksburg, Brooksville, Chillicothe, Morrow, Oak Park, Gallipolis, Cleveland, and Bellaire, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation providing protection for the national forests and the reforestation of denuded lands, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of the Homer Business Men's Association and sundry citizens of Homer, Mich., protesting against the discontinuance of village mail delivery, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented three memorials of sundry citizens of Ypsilanti, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 1184, to suppress the sale of firearms, etc., which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. McNARY. I introduce a bill, with reference to reclamation, which is similar to one I introduced some time ago, though in a slightly different form. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 2941) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces of the United States; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. McKINLEY:

A bill (S. 2942) for the erection of a vault building for the use of the Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 2943) to provide for the establishment of a dairying and live-stock experiment station at Gallatin, Tenn.; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

NORTH PORTLAND HARBOR, OREG.

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment authorizing a preliminary examination and survey of North Portland Harbor (Oregon Slough), Oreg., with a view to modifying the existing project, to secure a channel 300 feet wide and 25 feet deep at low water from the Interstate bridge to the main ship channel of the Columbia River at the mouth of the Willamette River, the work to be done at the sole cost and expense of the Port of Portland, Oreg., intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2881) authorizing appropriations and contracts for the prosecution and maintenance of public works on canals, rivers, and harbors, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

FEDERAL PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT SERVICE.

Mr. STERLING submitted an amendment providing that all executive officers, persons authorized to issue permits, agents, and inspectors employed in connection with the enforcement of national prohibition be placed in the classified service without further examination, and that no appointment shall be made hereafter to any position in the Federal prohibition enforcement service except in accordance with the civil-service act and rules promulgated thereunder, etc., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9724, the Treasury Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ANNUAL REPORT OF WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

Mr. MOSES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 206), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That 25,000 copies of House document No. 143, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, being the Annual Report of the War Finance Corporation for the year ended November 30, 1921, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for a few moments to make a statement to the Senate in relation to a telegram found in the Post this morning, and I suppose in all the other papers, in relation to the Public Health Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that every Senator has been bombarded with telegrams, all exactly alike, in relation to the Reserve Medical Corps of the Public Health Service. I wish to read this telegram into the RECORD and then make just a few remarks upon it. The telegram is dated New York, January 6, and reads:

A telegram from the United States Public Health Service stating that President Harding had given assurance no active orders placing service physicians on a civilian basis were contemplated was received to-day by Dr. R. W. C. Francis, morale officer at the Fox Hill Hospital on Staten Island.

The telegram was in reply to a protest sent to Washington by 600 crippled veterans against any proposal to reduce the medical staff of the service with a 20 per cent cut in pay.

To-day's message asserted the President would back up no such transfers of physicians, and that Brig. Gen. Sawyer, the presidential physician, regretted the suggestion had caused so much anxiety.

Mr. President, I wish to say that there has never been a proposition made by anybody that I am aware of to cut the pay of the reserve officers of the Public Health Service one penny. There has been a proposition, and I am heartily in favor of it, to take the reserve medical officers out of the position they are now occupying, where they are being treated just the same as the regular officers of the Army and Navy; in other words, allowed commutation of quarters, allowed longevity pay, allowed retirement privileges, and all the privileges granted to Army and Navy officers. The Public Health Service even went so far, contrary to law, as to give commutation of quarters and longevity pay to nurses and administrative assistants. If something had not been done to stop it, we would have had thousands of such assistants and nurses upon the retired list in a short time, and some of the administrative assistants who do nothing but clerical work would have been placed on the retired list.

The propaganda that has been going on comes from one source and one source only—I will modify that, not from one source only, but it is inspired from one source only, namely, from the Public Health Service. They are trying now to make it appear that if these physicians in the Reserve Corps now in the service of the Public Health Service are not given all the privileges of the officers of the Army and the Navy the disabled soldiers are going to suffer. My desk is covered with telegrams relating to the matter, and every telegram is word for word alike. They all have this statement in them:

> If movement be accomplished, entire medical personnel would be replaced by civilian physicians and nonservice men unfamiliar with the needs of disabled soldiers.

Why, Mr. President, I have a letter here from the chairman of the Veterans of the World War of the United States, dated January 4, 1922, and they have even impressed him with this idea and told him that we are undertaking to reduce the wage of these physicians, because in his letter to me appears the following:

> We refer to the proposed reduction of the pay of reserve officers in the United States Public Health Service to such an extent that it will force most of them to resign, and those who do not resign will be the poorer class of men who have not made a success in the medical profession on the outside.

I want every Senator to understand that there has never been a proposition to cut the pay of these physicians. In the salary that shall be granted to them they will be given an increase to take care of all the longevity pay which they are now granted and commutation of quarters as well, but it is provided that these reserve officers shall not be given retirement privileges unless through their service in the Public Health Service they shall then belong to the regular corps by promotion.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to inquire if the proposition was to the effect that the reserve officers would be taken out of the hospitals and that the soldiers in the hospitals would be treated by private physicians under some contract arrangement?

Mr. SMOOT. No, no; the proposition is that these same men shall continue to treat the soldiers in the hospitals just the same as they are doing to-day and be paid the same amount they are being paid to-day, but denying them retirement privileges. I do not believe it is necessary to have a man clothed with the power of an officer of the Regular Army before he can attend to a wounded soldier.

Here is Mr. A. C. Weaver, president of the Reserve Officers' Association, Public Health Service, writing a letter to me which contains this statement:

> Again, it is very evident that a medical man in order to develop the best in him to render the best service possible must be free from all worries of any uncertainty of his future.

In other words, they can not do the best work in them unless we shall say we are going to take care of them forever or as long as they live. We have got to assure these men that they are going to get $4,000 or $6,000 a year, and that when they reach a certain age they are to be retired and the taxpayers of the country are to carry them on their backs as long as they live or else they can not take care of the disabled soldiers.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate this morning again to call attention to what has been going on in the Public Health Service. I am simply going to content myself by saying that if the Public Health Service does not correct the evils that have existed in that service—aye, Mr. President, the looting of the Treasury—something is going to happen to that organization that will bring it to its senses and cause it to follow the object that Congress intended in creating it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator whether or not there is any law authorizing the condition that I have understood does exist in the Public Health Service; that is, is there any law authorizing retirement? Is there any law putting their physicians upon the footing of Army officers, or has it been done by a regulation or the practice of the department?

Mr. SMOOT. The regular corps has that privilege by law, but not the Reserve Corps. I will say to the Senator that they had a bill introduced in Congress, in both branches, a few years ago, and it has been reintroduced in nearly every Congress—it was reported favorably from the Public Health and National Quarantine Committee by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE]—granting some six hundred and eighty-odd additional officers to the Public Health Service. What was the object of such legislation? It was in part to cover up the acts of the Public Health Service up to that time that were beyond question unlawful.

I am informed now that past payments that were made for longevity and commutation of quarters to nurses in the Public Health Service are being investigated, and the accounts are now being audited, and I have been informed that there have been requests made on the part of the Government to nurses to refund to the Government the amounts that were thus paid.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to get information. I understand there is quite a great deal of the force of the Public Health Service that in some way has been put under the retirement privilege, if you please, but without authority of law.

Mr. SMOOT. The regular reserve are authorized by law to have commutation of quarters, longevity pay, and retirement privileges, but not so with the Reserve Corps.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator just said that the Reserve Corps has the retirement privilege and commutation of quarters. Is there any part of the Public Health Service force that has the retirement privilege and commutation of quarters that is not entitled to it under the law? Is the Reserve Corps entitled to it?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not positively say, but I doubt whether it has.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to get this information. I have been getting a lot of telegrams. I do not remember having received any telegram where they referred to a reduction in pay, but they all referred to an order contemplated by Secretary Mellon under which they seem to think that the service men who are in the Medical Reserve Corps will be put out. I want to get at just what the situation is and what is contemplated by the Secretary, if the Senator can tell me.

Mr. SMOOT. There was a move on foot to make the Reserve Corps a civilian body. That was all that was intended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Can that be done without legislation?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it can. In fact, the Treasury Department thinks that an order of the President is sufficient under the law to accomplish that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That did not contemplate, however, taking these ex-service men out but simply giving them a civilian status rather than the status of Army officers?

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely; and not only that but I will say to the Senator that they were to be paid a compensation sufficient to cover all the benefits they are receiving to-day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But it would take away from them the retirement privilege?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the retirement privilege.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I do not know what are the provisions of the law; but it seems rather strange to me that we have a corps here created that has retirement privileges which the President could take away by an Executive order.

Mr. SMOOT. More than likely it has been granted by an Executive order, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry in this connection? Is it not true that all these regulations regarding the Reserve Corps were purely regulations that were recommended by the Public Health Service and accepted by President Wilson during the war?

Mr. JONES of Washington. But is it possible that Congress has authorized an executive officer by Executive order to extend the retirement privilege to employees of the Government? I can hardly conceive that as being possible.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the condition is as the Senator has stated; it is done by regulations, and those regulations are approved by the President of the United States. Therefore, an Executive order could undo what has heretofore been done.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand; but what law is there conferring such authority on the President?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no authority of law of which I am aware.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no such authority of law of which I am aware any more than there was authority of law to give a similar privilege to nurses.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That comes back, then, to my first suggestion, that, in the opinion of the Senator from Utah, there is no authority of law giving the retirement privilege to those who are in the Reserve Corps?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true; but have we not been making appropriations to carry out such regulations?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be true, but the law providing for such appropriations is not a permanent statute.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is all wrong; and yet Congress has been making appropriations to enable those regulations to be carried out, and the money to be paid.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe when Congress made the appropriations its Members knew that such an Executive order had been issued, and I do not believe that Congress is going to continue to do so when it learns the true situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So that, as I understand the position of the Senator from Utah, in his opinion, what is contemplated is really to get this matter back to its original status, undoing what has been done under an assumed authority, which is not justified by law; in other words, coming back to the law?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; so that the money shall be expended only for what Congress really appropriated it.

I wish again to emphasize my position. I am not opposed to paying any physician who is laboring in any hospital in the United States all that his services are worth; I am not asking that there shall be a penny of reduction in the amount of pay which is to-day granted reserve officer physicians; but I do object, Mr. President, to taking men who are not in the Regular Army, having them employed by the Public Health Service, and then putting them on an Army or Navy basis. There is no necessity for doing that. I am not in accord with the statement read by me, that in order to get any valuable services out of a physician he must be assured that he will be taken care of for the remainder of his life.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question, as I understand the Senator, he states that if this Executive order be made it will simply mean that these officers in the Reserve Corps are given a civil status instead of a quasi military status, but that they are not to be displaced in the hospitals where they now serve, that they will still be members of the Reserve Corps and the Public Health Service, and will still be engaged in rendering the same services which they are now rendering.

Mr. SMOOT. Exactly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The purpose is not to get rid of them and to put them out of the service and to let to private physicians the contracts for attending ex-soldiers who are patients in hospitals and elsewhere?

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that, but I will go further than that. I will say that I am perfectly willing that wherever there is a vacancy in the regular corps the appointee shall be selected from the Reserve Corps.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 172, submitted by Mr. SPENCER November 15, 1921, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Elkins	McKinley	Shields
Ball	Ernst	McLean	Shortridge
Borah	Fernald	McNary	Smoot
Brandegee	Fletcher	Moses	Spencer
Broussard	Glass	Nelson	Stanfield
Bursum	Gooding	New	Sterling
Calder	Hale	Nicholson	Sutherland
Cameron	Harris	Norbeck	Swanson
Caraway	Harrison	Norris	Townsend
Colt	Heflin	Oddie	Trammell
Culberson	Hitchcock	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Warren
Dial	Keyes	Ransdell	Watson, Ga.
Dillingham	Ladd	Robinson	Williams
Edge	McCumber	Sheppard	Willis

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is detained on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I had not supposed it was possible for the spirit of animosity, hatred, and misstatement to go so far as it has been demonstrated to have gone by some of the Senators during the debate on the question now before the Senate. I have always been perfectly willing, indeed, to accord the utmost candor and sincerity of purpose to every Senator who opposed me on any matter which I advocated; but I have always reasonably expected that such opposition would be based upon the facts in the case, and that there would be no evident intent upon the part of any Senator to bring disgrace and suffering to a colleague in the Senate unless it was from conscientous convictions of duty.

It seems to me that it is necessary at the beginning, in order to arrive at a clear understanding of the question now before the Senate, that Senators should know and appreciate the conditions under which the primary campaign to select candidates for the Senate of the United States was waged in the State of Michigan in 1918. At that time we were in the midst of the war; the spirit of loyalty as against the spirit of disloyalty, of defense of the country as against pacifism was very pronounced in Michigan, as it was elsewhere throughout the United States. The President of the United States, advised and counseled by certain practical Democratic politicians in Detroit, took advantage of the situation then existing and advised Mr. Ford to be a candidate for the Senate. It was known for months that Mr. Ford's friends, who knew what they wanted, expected to put Mr. Ford into the race if, in their minds, there was an opportunity for success. Mr. Ford was called to the White House, and when he emerged from it stated that he had been drafted by the President of the United States to enter the race for United States Senator in Michigan. Those who had inaugurated the scheme proposed that his name should be placed on both tickets; that he should run for Senator on both the Republican and the Democratic tickets in our State. Under our primary law that is possible, and he did run for Senator on both tickets.

Mr. Ford had been greatly advertised for years. In 1916, 1917, and 1918 he had paid for whole pages in the leading newspapers and magazines in the country to advertise his opposition to war and to preparation for war. He had spent thousands of dollars in the campaign of 1916 advocating Mr. Wilson's reelection, on the theory that he had kept us out of war. It is admitted that Mr. Ford was a pacifist.

Senators are familiar with the various means which he employed at that time to exert his influence as only a well-advertised and very wealthy man could exert it. He spent, I repeat, thousands of dollars—nobody knows how much—in placing himself before the country and in advocating Mr. Wilson's reelection. He, of course, had a right to do that; but it was in antagonism to a very strong spirit in our State and throughout the country that believed such efforts to be really disloyal to the country, which was then in the war. Newberry and Ford were at the opposite poles of public sentiment. The latter had and still has the most extensive organization ever known in our State. It extended into every hamlet. It was held together by business contracts and obligations. Mr. Ford was a strong advocate of the Versailles treaty. That was not exceedingly pleasing to the majority of the people of Michigan. This added to the intensity of the hostile feeling that existed in our State against Mr. Ford as a pacifist.

Mr. Newberry, when the war broke out, offered his services to his country, entered the Navy, and asked for assignment to active duty.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understood the Senator to say that Mr. Ford was strongly in favor of the Versailles treaty.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And that that was a factor in the election.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Versailles treaty was not known of during the campaign of 1918. The war was still on, and the armistice was not signed until November 11, 1918.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Absolutely. I am speaking about the sentiment that exists in the State of Michigan.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But I do not see how the Versailles treaty could be an issue in a primary election before the war had ended.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I am confusing the 1918 campaign with the one of 1920.

I repeat, when the war broke out Mr. Newberry enlisted in the Navy and asked for assignment to active duty, but Secretary Daniels did not see fit to give him that assignment. He nevertheless entered the service and was made commander of the third naval district. He had two sons, who also enlisted in the service, one in the Army and the other in the Navy. He had a daughter. Her husband enlisted in the Army and saw most distinguished service in France. It is well known that Mr. Ford's son did not enlist. I do not mention this to criticize him, because I do not want to indulge in any unjust criticism; but I am describing the situation as it existed in Michigan.

Mr. Newberry had also served actively in the Spanish-American War as a sailor on board the Yosemite, a comrade of the present Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Denby, and he rendered distinguished service. That service was recognized by Mr. Roosevelt, who became a warm personal friend of Mr. Newberry and first made him Assistant Secretary of the Navy and later Secretary of the Navy. His record was one of distinguished patriotic service to the country, and it can not be charged—I think no one will charge—that that service was rendered for any other purpose than the good of his country. He had no personal ambitions to promote through that service—neither he nor his sons nor his son-in-law.

Mr. Newberry entered the race for Senator not willingly. He was not a candidate in the ordinary sense of the term, as the record will disclose; but he finally accepted, at the request of his friends, because of a sense of duty. He considered the matter a long time before he accepted, but finally entered the race. He knew little about politics. He was not experienced in politics, but was a business man. He had thought, prior to his accepting the suggestion of his friends, of entering politics for the benefit of his former chief, President Roosevelt. He believed that Roosevelt would be a candidate for President in 1920; at least he hoped that he would be. While considering the question he had some correspondence relative to the situation, and what he ought to do, with Mr. Miller, a friend of his who is the managing editor of the Detroit News. It was suggested to him that Mr. Hayden, who was a representative of the Detroit News here in Washington, would make a good secretary for him. He sent for Mr. Hayden, who went to New York, where Mr. Newberry was and where he remained during the whole of the campaign, the primary, and the election. He talked with Mr. Hayden and suggested to him that he wanted a political secretary, as he expected and hoped to take a more active part in politics thereafter. Mr. Hayden felt that he could not accept the position. In the course of their talk it was suggested, I think by Mr. Hayden, that the fact that Mr. Newberry was a wealthy man would be of some disadvantage to him. Perhaps it was Mr. Miller who also suggested that. Mr. Newberry stated then that he would not tolerate, he would not make, a money campaign, and he called attention to the various Senators who had made such campaigns in the past and without credit to themselves.

Mr. Hayden did not feel like entering into an engagement of that kind as the political secretary of Mr. Newberry. Afterwards Mr. Newberry thought it over and finally concluded to be a candidate for Senator. Many of his friends, prominent people in Michigan, had talked with him about being a candidate and had written to him about it, or talked with him, at least; among them the then governor of the State, Mr. Sleeper; Mr. Andrews, a prominent editor in the upper peninsula of Michigan; Mr. Peterman, as I remember also a former member of the senate of the State of Michigan from Calumet. I repeat, Mr. Newberry concluded to be a candidate and his friends felt that they should organize a campaign for him, and that they would make a campaign for him such as they felt ought to be made under the circumstances.

Mr. Templeton, a very prominent man in Michigan, a business associate of Mr. Newberry for years, talked with Mr. Newberry about this matter, or Newberry brought it up to him, and said, "I am thinking about being a candidate, and if I am I hope we can have a business men's committee, and I should like to have you identified with it." Mr. Templeton said he would be glad to do it. Senator Scott, who had also talked with various gentlemen, especially through the upper part of the State, who were interested in Newberry's campaign or in his being a candidate, suggested that Mr. Paul King would be an excellent manager or director for a campaign of that kind. He spoke to King about it. Mr. Templeton and Mr. Cody also talked to Paul King about his acting as chairman or as executive manager of the campaign.

Mr. King was a man who had had great and successful experience. He had managed my campaign the first time I ran for the Senate. He was then a young man serving in the State legislature as clerk of the senate, a man whom almost everybody knew, and whom everybody loved, and whom everybody who knows him well to-day loves and respects, as clean and as fine a gentleman as I ever knew. He had managed my campaign. He had acted as secretary of that campaign and really had the management of it, and so he was naturally turned to by these gentlemen as a proper man to manage Mr. Newberry's campaign. Mr. King did not feel like giving an answer to them until he had thought it over and talked it over with his wife and family and until he had talked with Mr. Newberry himself, because he and Mr. Newberry had had very serious differences of opinion at the State convention in 1912, which met at Saginaw to select delegates to the national convention.

The State central committee had selected Mr. Newberry for temporary chairman of that convention and announced it beforehand. Mr. King, who was for Mr. Taft for President and who was then, as I remember, secretary of the State central committee, got the majority of the committee together, and they concluded to have some other man for chairman, as Mr. Newberry was known to be strongly for Mr. Roosevelt; and it was an unfortunate convention, because force was used to keep one party out and let the other party in. Finally both got in after a fashion, but Mr. King was successful, and the convention was organized for Mr. Taft and the delegates to the national convention were Taft delegates. Mr. Newberry was kept out of the convention, except that he had a seat in the gallery as an onlooker. Mr. King felt that under those circumstances he would not want to work as manager of the citizens' Newberry committee unless it was agreeable to Mr. Newberry himself—a very reasonable attitude for him to take. He went to New York, talked with Mr. Newberry, they went over that incident, and Newberry said it was all right.

At that talk Mr. Newberry asked Mr. King what a campaign by his friends such as he had in mind would cost. Mr. King said: "Senator TOWNSEND's campaign cost $20,000. He was better known than you are, and I should think your campaign would cost at least $50,000." It was not intimated that Mr. Newberry was to pay the $50,000. Mr. Newberry therefore knew, of course, that such a campaign as they proposed to put up would probably cost at least $50,000. There is not any doubt at all about that.

Mr. Templeton was made general chairman of the committee. Mr. King was made manager. Mr. Blair, who had not talked with Mr. Newberry, was made treasurer, and Mr. Floyd, a young, successful business man and clean up to the time Senators here saw fit to attack him, was made secretary. That constituted what is known as the Newberry committee.

It is charged that Mr. Newberry selected this committee and is therefore responsible for whatever it did. The only thing that Mr. Newberry had to do about it was, before he became a candidate, while he was thinking of being a candidate, that he suggested to Mr. Templeton that if he did become a candidate he hoped Mr. Templeton would be identified with the committee.

Mr. President, my contention is that this committee was a business men's committee, selected by representative people of the State of Michigan because of their deep interest in the campaign and its result. They had no particular care as far as Mr. Newberry was concerned as above any other man that represented what they believed to be the patriotic sentiment of our State.

I can not well overestimate or overemphasize the situation that existed there. These men served without compensation as officers of this committee. They were very industrious, some of them. Mr. Templeton had very little to do about it except as a figurehead, to act as chairman. Mr. Blair drew the checks. Mr. Floyd, the secretary, and Mr. King, the manager, were very active.

Mr. President, there are several questions that have been brought up here that seem to be conclusive on the part of many Senators, or will be conclusive according as those propositions are understood by them. One of them I have already referred to, and that was the selection of his committee.

One of the great questions that is raised here, and I think thoroughly misrepresented, is the charge that Mr. Truman H. Newberry financed his own campaign; that this money which was expended was his own money, or that he caused it to be expended or subscribed by what are known as his relatives and friends, and that therefore he is responsible for it.

Of course, it is understood by everyone that Mr. Newberry was indicted and convicted under the Federal statute which the Supreme Court afterwards declared to be unconstitutional. I am not going to make any attempt to defend anything wrong on account of the law having been determined unconstitutional, because it was in existence at the time this primary was held. While it would be a proper defense in court, and would be upheld, I do not want to bring it as such here, although I wish the Senate to act judicially and properly in considering all questions connected with this case; but Mr. Newberry was indicted and convicted under the Federal statute. His case was appealed to the Supreme Court, and there reversed on the ground that the law was unconstitutional.

The four minority members of the court, who did not join in the decision that the law was unconstitutional, made some suggestions with reference to why the case ought, in their judgment, to be reversed. I hope I will not be considered as begging the question if I say that after listening to the hearing in the Supreme Court and the questions which were asked by the court of the attorneys, I claim that the court was unanimous on the proposition that a fair trial had not been had at Grand Rapids; that the trial court misconstrued the statute. It is proven and admitted that John Newberry paid something like $90,000 or more toward the campaign, and it is charged that it is inconceivable that Truman H. Newberry did not only know about it but, in fact, inspired that contribution. The committee heard John Newberry—the minority and the majority members as well. They are better able to judge of John Newberry than those who did not see him and do not know him.

John Newberry owes what he has, according to his admission, to his brother Truman. He feels under obligations to him and is devoted to him. When he heard that a citizens' committee was to be created or that his brother was to be considered as a candidate he said, "I want to finance the campaign." He is a man who cares very little about money. So long as he has enough of what he wants, he is not particularly interested in it. He was interested in his brother, who he said had done everything for him and made it possible for him to have what he did possess.

So he went to Mr. Smith and said to him, "I want to finance this campaign, and what money is needed I want you to pay for me. He made no stipulations as to what was to be done with it, asked for no report about it; it would not have been like John Newberry to have done so.

There is no more doubt about John Newberry making that statement without consulting his brother than there is that I am talking to you this minute, and every one who knows John Newberry knows that to be true. He put that money in without any consultation with Truman Newberry and without his knowledge. When the war broke out, he went up to the Great Lakes and entered the Navy, and stayed there as Truman had done at New York, till the end of the war. He was in the Navy.

John Newberry, I repeat, and the evidence can not contradict it, paid this money voluntarily or had it paid for Truman Newberry's campaign, and unless it was improperly spent and unless it was used to corrupt the voters of Michigan, and did corrupt them, to the extent of securing Senator Newberry's nomination, Truman Newberry is not responsible under any law.

Other people contributed as the campaign progressed. Relatives of Mr. Newberry, some of them, of course, contributed. They were able to pay, they wanted to pay, and they had a right to pay. Some were not relatives, but interested in Mr. Newberry as against Mr. Ford. That was the moving spirit, that was the thing which induced them to contribute to this campaign, and you have to believe, Senators, that all of these witnesses are perjurers—Truman Newberry, John Newberry, Henry Joy, Smith, Templeton, King, all of them—you have to find that they are perjurers if you find that Truman Newberry is not legally entitled to his seat.

Mr. Templeton has said he never talked with Mr. Truman Newberry about the campaign contributions or about the cost. He is one of the most respected men in the State of Michigan.

John Newberry said his brother knew nothing about it, that he never talked with him even about his campaign, and I repeat that those who saw him and listened to him, those who knew him, know that that is John Newberry. He would have told the truth had it been anything else. He would not have stopped to count the cost, but he would have told the truth, and he did tell the truth.

Mr. King managed the campaign. He had the statutes before him, the State statute and the Federal statute, and believed he was following them. I think he was. He believed that he had a right to spend the money. He said, "I was not interested in where it came from. It was not my business to raise the money. I was told that I could have whatever money was necessary to use in doing whatever I thought ought to be done."

The quotation from King's testimony that was given yesterday, to the effect that he said that whatever was necessary to be done he did, is not correct. He said that whatever he thought ought to be done that was right he did. He was out to elect Mr. Newberry by lawful means, and he was assured that he could have all the lawful means he needed to carry on that campaign.

Mr. Joy is a brother-in-law of Truman Newberry. He is a man in poor health and has been for two or three years threatened with some heart or arterial trouble which has compelled him to quit business. When the committee met, it was said that Mr. Joy was not well. Mr. Lucking said that he was a very desirable witness and must be had; he said he could not very well get along without him; that he had to have Mr. Joy's statement because he considered that he is an honest man and will tell the truth. He knew him. He stated to the committee that Mr. Joy is an honest man and will tell the truth. The doctors had made a certificate to the effect that he could not be brought to Washington and could not be subjected to the excitement of cross-examination without endangering his life. So it was agreed between the counsel, Mr. Lucking acting for Mr. Ford, that Mr. Lucking should prepare the questions that he wanted to submit to Mr. Joy and they would send them down to Detroit to Mr. Joy and he would answer them. That was done. Mr. Ford's head surgeon, or the man at the head of his hospital in Detroit, went and made an examination of Mr Joy as to his physical condition. Mr. Joy answered those questions and immediately he became a perjurer.

The man who had said he was honest and could be believed and that his testimony was absolutely necessary in order that the committee could act properly—that he could be believed when he gave the reasons for making his contributions—when he gave those reasons and stated that Mr. Newberry had nothing to do with it and knew nothing about it, then he became a perjurer not entitled to consideration. Though he was a man with an unblemished record for years, he then became a perjurer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator can not be very familiar with this feature of the controversy when he advises the Senate that Mr. King was assured that whatever money was necessary to carry on the campaign would be provided. Will the Senator state from what source he was so assured and by whom?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think Mr. King testified it was from Mr. Templeton.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator remember what Mr. Templeton said about it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator state what it was?

Mr. TOWNSEND. He said he did not remember that at first, but if Mr. King said so he no doubt did say it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For whom was Mr. Templeton speaking when he said the funds would be supplied?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Undoubtedly for John Newberry, directly or indirectly, who had given instruction that he would furnish the money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The testimony of Mr. John Newberry is that he never talked with Mr. Templeton about the matter at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is no doubt that that is what was done in that case. Mr. John S. Newberry got a little confused on some of his dates.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the testimony is further from Mr. Templeton that he never talked with Mr. John S. Newberry about it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I do not think that is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; it is true. That is his statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would be very glad to have the Senator look that up, because I would like to see it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to show that that is the situation of affairs.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know that Mr. King testified——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. King testified that Mr. Templeton told him so. I am curious to know, if Mr. Templeton did say so, for whom he was speaking and who were back of Mr. Templeton, who were the parties who were to furnish the money.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Whatever that may be, as to whether there is some admission there that has not been made clear or not, it is undisputed, is it not, that Mr. John Newberry said that he was financing it and wanted to finance the whole campaign?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. John S. Newberry said that he never talked with Mr. Templeton.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know anything about that. I am just talking about the facts as they exist as we come to these things. I am not tracing out all the little details that would not be remembered, but which would have been fixed up if these men were dishonest and were planning and scheming to evade the law.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me recall to the Senator the further testimony of Mr. Templeton, to the effect that no one, not even John S. Newberry, authorized him to make any such statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can assure the Senator that it is true.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I say that I do not know whether that is true or not. I know it is a fact that John Newberry did state that he wanted to finance his brother's campaign. He said that he did, and it was known that Templeton went to John Newberry or his attorney, Smith, for the money and got it.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator objects to an interruption, I do not care to interfere with his remarks.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not object at all to a question. I do not care to yield for any argument, but for any question I am glad to yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator was asked by the Senator from Montana with reference to John Newberry, and if the Senator from Michigan will pardon me I would like to read just a few questions and answers.

Mr. POMERENE. From page 306 of the record.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you confer with any member of the committee about it?

That is, about money.

Mr. NEWBERRY. No, sir.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You did not?
Mr. NEWBERRY. I did not.

Mr. ROBINSON. Whose testimony is the Senator reading?

Mr. POMERENE. John Newberry is the witness.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. On that committee, to be specific, were Mr. Templeton—you knew Mr. Templeton?
Mr. NEWBERRY. Yes, sir.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And Mr. Paul King. You knew him?
Mr. NEWBERRY. I know him now. I did not know him during the campaign.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You did not?
Mr. NEWBERRY. No, sir.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And Mr. Blair. Did you know, Mr. Blair?
Mr. NEWBERRY. I knew of him; knew him by sight. I never had any conversation with him.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you ever have any business relations with him before?
Mr. NEWBERRY. No, sir.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you ever have any conversation with him about this campaign?
Mr. NEWBERRY. No, sir.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Or with Mr. Templeton about it?
Mr. NEWBERRY. No, sir.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Or with Mr. Paul King?
Mr. NEWBERRY. No, sir.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you ever have any conversation with Mr. Fred Cody about it?
Mr. NEWBERRY. No, sir.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, perhaps it may be interesting to the Senator from Montana to know that he is mistaken in the proposition that Mr. Templeton did not know Mr. King. He will find on page 415 of the record where Mr. Templeton was in consultation with Mr. King, and he will also find that Mr. King made the statement explicitly that he understood from Mr. Templeton that there would be no trouble about the finances of the campaign. When Mr. Templeton was asked about that, Mr. Templeton said—I read the question first:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you give assurances to Mr. King that the friends and business associations of Mr. Newberry would finance the campaign?

I am reading from page 415 of the record. Mr. Templeton replied:

He—

That is, Mr. King—

made such a statement, and if he made it I would not question his word. I must have said it at some time or other. I do not remember when or where or anything about it.

But the previous question shows that Mr. King and Mr. Templeton were in consultation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator read the following testimony in which he said if he did make the statement he never was authorized by anybody to make it?

Mr. SPENCER. I think it is undoubted that so far as he had any authority from John S. Newberry his testimony does bear that out?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Did anybody else?

Mr. SPENCER. Yes; but what is away back in the Senator's mind is, was there anything which would connect Truman H. Newberry with it, and I believe there is not a scintilla of evidence that does.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not care about that.

Mr. SPENCER. I thought the Senator would care about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to know who Mr. Templeton was representing when he said, if he ever did say, that the friends of Mr. Newberry would finance the campaign. Who authorized that statement?

Mr. TOWNSEND. This we know, and we have a right to say from the evidence, that Truman H. Newberry did not.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I would like to ask the Senator upon what he predicates that opinion? The testimony shows that Mr. Templeton was more frequently in conference with Truman H. Newberry than anyone else, and it shows that he acted as an emissary for him in going out to organize and bringing people into the organization. How does the Senator presume that he was not the man who made the statement?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall not yield for any such statement as that, because that is clearly an inference not backed by the testimony. Such is the basis of practically all the arguments that have been made here. I shall not yield for any such statement as that, because there is no evidence upon which can be founded such a suggested conclusion.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I merely want——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question, but I do not yield to an argument by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, well, the Senator does not have to yield at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator can not make conditions when he yields to me.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have listened to what has been said by certain Senators, and I have kept my seat in silence and tried to possess my soul with as much patience as possible, but I do not feel especially like yielding to any more of that kind of talk in my time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is the Senator referring to anything that I said?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will not yield, Mr. President. I desire to proceed with what I have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I object to the Senator making any statements about me and then declining to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to read, in order that it may be in the RECORD, what I had attempted to quote from Mr. Lucking's statement relative to Mr. Joy:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Mr. Joy is one of the most important witnesses in this case.

Later on Mr. Lucking says, on page 347 of the record.

We want Mr. Joy's testimony. We believe he is an honorable gentleman and that he will tell the truth about this transaction.

Later on still further he says:

We feel it is absolutely essential to have Mr. Joy here.

In reply to a question by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], Mr. Lucking again made a most significant statement. The Senator from New Jersey said:

As I understand, you are endeavoring to establish, I assume from your line of examination, that Mr. Newberry personally gave that money? Is that the idea?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator advise us as to what he is reading and from what page?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am now quoting from the record before the committee. I will give the Senator the pages of the record where he will find the matter. The first question which was asked by Mr. Lucking was on page 347 of the record; the second is also on page 347; and the third is on page 358. What I am now reading is on page 401. Senator EDGE said:

As I understand, you are endeavoring to establish, I assume from your line of examination, that Mr. Newberry personally gave that money? Is that the idea?

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. We think so. We think the same applies to John S. Newberry and, I have no doubt, to Joy and Victor Barnes.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. I really feel it would inform the committee fully as to this matter if Mr. Joy could answer some questions.

And Mr. Joy did answer the questions that were prepared by Mr. Lucking, but the answers not being satisfactory Mr. Joy then became a perjurer.

I wish to say here just one word further relative to the men who are principally connected with this case—Mr. Templeton, Mr. Blair, who is the head of the Union Trust Co. of Detroit, Mich.; Mr. King, of whom I have spoken; Mr. Joy; Mr. Green, who has been abused here because, as he stated, without solicitation he helped to raise the deficit of $10,000 after the campaign was over. Why did not Mr. Newberry pay it? If they were his expenses, why should Mr. Green or anybody else be asked to pay anything on that bill? The campaign was over.

It was not necessary to go outside. If we are to believe the statement of Senators that Mr. Newberry paid it all, $10,000 more or less did not amount to anything. Certainly enough has been presented to show that if Mr. Newberry was guilty, the payment of the additional amount of money would not have made him more guilty; but Mr. Green says that he himself paid it, and he paid it because he wanted to aid in Mr. Newberry's campaign, to settle up the account which came in afterwards.

It has been said that after the campaign was over Mr. Green gave employment to Mr. Floyd, who was the secretary of the campaign, in order to pay Mr. Floyd for something that he had done in the campaign. All of the questions of Mr. Lucking with reference to Mr. Green indicate that Green and Newberry were not even close friends, but Mr. Green paid the money and he took Mr. Floyd, who is an active, clean, upright business man, and put him in his employ, giving him the place of a man who had not been a success. Mr. Floyd, I repeat, is a clean, successful young man, and both he and Mr. Green have said that Mr. Newberry had nothing to do with the employment of Mr. Floyd by Mr. Green as compensation for what Floyd had done during the campaign. Mr. Floyd said he was not employed as compensation for what he had done during the campaign, that his employment was freely given by Mr. Green. If Green was not a close friend of Senator Newberry, why should he employ Floyd to settle a Newberry obligation?

As to Mr. Cody, much has been said about him, and I think that much more could be said. I am sorry that Senators do not know Mr. Cody. For if they did, I do not think they would charge Mr. Newberry with selecting Mr. Cody as his confidential representative. Mr. Cody was Mr. Newberry's loyal friend, but a very voluble one. He has always been a friend of mine. As I have intimated, he is very talkative, but he is a man who likes to help his friends—there is no doubt about that—and he likes the credit for doing so; but Mr. Newberry never trusted him to manage his campaign or to transact any financial or confidential matters for him.

Mr. Newberry had helped Cody when the latter was in a Detroit school years and years ago. When sickness came into his family or something happened to his position, Mr. Newberry helped him out, and Cody was grateful to him. He did a good deal of talking, there is no doubt about that, but in no place in the testimony can it be shown that Mr. Newberry was either responsible for what Mr. Cody said or bound by what he said. I do not know that Mr. Cody said anything, I can not find anything in the record, that is detrimental to Mr. Newberry, but he was very active and very much in evidence in various places. He and Mr. Templeton were two of those who asked Mr. King to be chairman, the executive officer of the campaign committee. He was present in Mr. Newberry's office in New York on several occasions when people called.

I never go to New York but I see Mr. Cody. He is very friendly; he has always been my friend, as I think he is the friend of everybody; but it is really almost a joke to argue that Mr. Cody was intrusted with the carrying out of these alleged malign, corrupt agreements. There is nothing in the record to prove it.

Mr. Emery was really the active treasurer; he acted for Mr. Blair very frequently. He was a very active man. I think the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] knows Mr. Emery, as I do. He is a good, clean man. He had been in charge of a Government park up at Mackinaw Island, and later of the Colville Indian Reservation in the State of Washington. Mr. Emery was to do office work for the committee; he had charge to a considerable extent of the money that was expended in the office and of the accounts there. He acted in place of Mr. Blair, who had deputized him evidently to do this work. Mr. Emery knew very much about these affairs, but he could not appear before the committee. When the time came to call him as a witness he was not able to appear—and for what reason? When the Senate directed that the ballots up in Michigan be counted they sent men into the State to collect the ballots under an agreement between the counsel and under the law. Mr. Emery was one of the men sent out with one of the Ford agents in a Ford machine, but the driver of the machine tipped the car over and Mr. Emery's skull was broken in five places, and he was otherwise so terribly injured that when the trial was held at Grand Rapids he was tried, convicted, and sentenced without ever being in court. Of course, his counsel agreed that that might be done, if it were possible, and there is no complaint about that; but he was not able to be there, and is to-day a mental and physical wreck, as anyone may readily imagine. So when the committee conducted its examination here it went into the facts as to Mr. Emery's condition, and I think they agreed that he was not able to come before the committee; that his testimony could not be taken, and even if it could be taken it would be of no value whatever.

It has been stated that when it was desired to serve a subpœna on Mr. Emery he had gone over into the north woods of Canada. The fact is that he had gone across the line to the home of a relative, or he had been taken there as a poor, miserable wreck; and he is now wandering about, going to some place he calls his office as often as he can, but is nevertheless a wreck. So his testimony could not be taken. It is unfortunate that that is so because his testimony, like the testimony of others, would have stated the truth and set forth the facts as they existed.

It is stated that the books of the Newberry estate could not be found; that letters and correspondence were destroyed. Of course all of the correspondence that was purely formal and of no consequence was destroyed. If those connected with the Newberry campaign wanted to corrupt the election why did they not destroy everything? Why did they allow any of the correspondence between Senator Newberry and Mr. King and others to be preserved? If they were desirous of being crooked, if it was their intention to destroy the evidence, why did they allow any of it to be preserved? The fact is that they destroyed or caused to be destroyed only those letters which encumbered the office, which had to be turned over the next day to the State central committee. So a portion of the papers was destroyed.

Now, in reference to the books——

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will ask the Senator a question. If they preserved and retaind a part of the evidence, why did they not preserve all of it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The reason why they preserved a part of it and did not destroy it was evidently satisfactory to them. They would have destroyed all of it, however, if they were intent upon destroying damaging evidence that could be brought against them. If it had not been for Paul King taking the stand at Grand Rapids and setting forth this correspondence this case would have even a poorer foundation to stand on than it has now; but when Mr. Murfin opened that case in Grand Rapids he stated all of the facts in the case. At the close of the Government's case Mr. Newberry's attorneys felt that no case against the defendants had been made, but nevertheless they put Mr. King, who ran the campaign, upon the stand and he put in the correspondence with Mr. Newberry. They need not have done it, and in doing it they made it possible for the court practically to direct a verdict against the defendants in that case. If there was any intent to do wrong or to defraud, the defendants were great bunglers in what they did.

But, Mr. President, reference has been made to the books of the Newberry estate which were destroyed. The fact is that the accounts of this estate are voluminous. From time to time its books are closed and stored. This practice has been followed for many years. The Newberry estate has a large business, and the books and papers in connection with that business accumulate rapidly. So they have been in the habit, after a certain length of time, of taking their books out and putting them in what is called a barn, which, perhaps, had better be called a storeroom. They had been doing that for years. However, all of the particular books in question in response to subpœna were taken to the trial at Grand Rapids and laid before the grand jury. The man who examined them before the grand jury was Mr. Souter, who was the clerk of the grand jury and also one of the attorneys of Mr. Ford in connection with the investigation before the Senate committee. He stated before the committee that the books were all before the grand jury and that he made the notes concerning the testimony before the jury. It was he who before the petit jury testified as to what witnesses had said before the grand jury.

It was proven that in some instances he was right and in others he was wrong; but Mr. Souter, who, as I have said, was one of the attorneys of Mr. Ford in this case, made the notes and examined the books, and there was nothing in them that was hostile to the case of Mr. Newberry or harmful from his standpoint, or else Souter would have disclosed it.

After the trial the books were taken back to Detroit, and it was said that they were put in the barn or storeroom to which I have referred. When, however, the investigation before the committee took place, they could not be found, and it is therefore argued that they were destroyed, in order that they might not be produced here. Senators, knowing as I do the parties who have been connected with this case, I could with better reason say that those books were stolen out of the barn, because it would be easier and better for those who were opposing Mr. Newberry to say, just as it has been said about Mr. Joy's testimony, that he would tell the truth, "if we had the books, even though we did not preserve what they disclosed at the Grand Rapids trial, we could prove something that we are now prevented from proving because of the destruction of these books."

Those books had been presented, as Mr. Souter says, to the grand jury. Then when the trial at Grand Rapids was over they were placed in the storeroom or barn, and then something happened to them, so that it was not possible to find them. But what was to be proven by them? What is claimed in reference to what could be shown from the books? The admitted testimony is that Mr. Frederick Smith, the confidential agent of the Newberrys from, I think, the time of their father's death down to the present day, handled the affairs of the Newberry estate under powers of attorney from Mr. Truman H. Newberry, from Mr. John Newberry, as I remember, from Mrs. Joy, and others. Without consulting them, he conducted the affairs of that estate to the extent of keeping the bank balances right, because sometimes one's bank account would be overdrawn, and then he would check money from another's to balance the overdraft, and then in due course it was all paid back and the balances finally settled. Understand, this did not originate in this case, but it had been the custom of that concern for years. It may be possible that in checking on Mr. John Newberry's account they overdrew it, and that Mr. Smith balanced the account by taking the necessary amount from another account that had a balance on the right side, and then paid it all back, and that without even notifying the interested parties.

They say that Mr. Newberry had a long-distance telephone conversation with Mr. Smith, and afterwards Mr. Smith wired that he had been mistaken in what he had said to Mr. Newberry over the telephone, namely, that the primary was on the 27th of July.

It ought to have been on the 27th of August, he said, and he was confused about the matter. He said that Mr. Truman Newberry was interested in knowing why the accounts of the concern were being so drawn down. He was disturbed by the balances of the concern. Why should he say that, if Mr. John Newberry was authorized to spend Truman Newberry's money in this campaign? This is what is already in evidence, and it is all that could be shown from the Newberry books and what they did show at Grand Rapids. The prosecution must have something speculative. The Senate must find, I repeat, that all of these people are perjurers; it must find that there is something sinister and bad in all of the things that were done, or else we must vote to retain Senator Newberry in his seat.

It is charged that Mr. Newberry made a false oath to the Senate, and, therefore, that he is a perjurer, and if he made a false oath to the Senate he is not entitled to retain his seat here. The blank report was sent to Mr. Newberry at New York to sign. He did not take the advice of any counsel, as Mr. Ford did, in making out his statement. He did not go to a lawyer, but he filled it out himself. He did write that he knew nothing about the expenditures; that there was nothing done, or no expenditures made, or something of that kind, with his knowledge and consent. He did not mean by that that he did not know that money had been expended in his campaign, or that somebody had been contributing money to his campaign. That would be a stupid thing for him to say. What he meant was that not with his procurement, not with his knowledge, was it done, because he could not have told of a dollar that had been paid by anybody, nor could he have told of a dollar that had been paid to anybody out of the campaign fund that had been raised for him. So he did not lie about that. If he had taken advice, his report would have been worded a little better, just as you Senators word your returns. You know how to do it, and you do do it. You put it in such form that it tells the truth—that you do not know about these things, this thing, that, and the other—but nevertheless you have every reason to believe that they were done, and you say "Not to my personal knowledge."

I maintain that considering the magnitude of this campaign, considering the organizations that were made throughout the State, there are fewer causes for regret on the part of Mr. Newberry than is usually the case with Senators. We all suffer from our fool friends. There are some people who do things that we neither approve, nor do we know at the time they are done. We are not responsible for those mistakes, unless they result in our election by fraud. There is no such claim of fraud here because of the few isolated cases of indiscretion in this testimony, which all deplore. Neither Mr. Newberry nor his committee were responsible for them.

I refer to such cases as, for instance, the testimony of one witness that he had been threatened by a supporter of Mr. Newberry that his sentence that had been pronounced in the lower court would be affirmed by the Supreme Court unless he carried that precinct or his community for Mr. Newberry. It is said that that precinct was carried, and the Supreme Court of Michigan reversed his case. There is not a Senator here who believes that the Supreme Court of Michigan was influenced by this alleged incident. If this threat was ever made—and I doubt if it ever was—it was foolish and not caused or sanctioned or known by Mr. Newberry or the committee. If it was made it was the fool statement of an overzealous friend. We are not responsible for those things. If we were, God help us all. If you can bring in here isolated cases that were not approved by the committee nor by Mr. Newberry, nor promulgated by them or either of them, and secure a conviction, then there is no safety for anyone who has a contested campaign for United States Senator.

I have had a Senator tell me of this instance that occurred in his State since this trial began: A man was running for the legislature in his State; was very fearful that he was not going to carry his own precinct. He had heard that it was against him; he saw the chairman of the election board at noon and said to him, "How are things going in the precinct?" He said, "You are all right." The candidate replied, "Why, I think they are going to vote against me." The chairman said, "Well, it is all right." "How do you know that?" "Well, when they went out for lunch I opened the boxes and found out." It almost drove the candidate crazy to think that that had been done, and he said, "If that should be the decisive element in my election I shall have to resign." Fortunately, it did not happen to be decisive.

Should a candidate be chargeable with that kind of a thing? I think not. It ought not to be even considered.

It is said, however, that the State law of Michigan was violated. I do not think, as I have said, that the Federal law was violated; and if there had been a proper charge to the jury, as it seems to me, there would have been no conviction at Grand Rapids. But it is said now that a State statute was violated. I want, however, first to refer to that Senate affidavit once more.

Mr. Newberry was brought before the grand jury down in New York and subjected to indictment proceedings because he had made a false report to the Senate. That jury proceeded to hear many witnesses, and, finally, when it came to asking Blair and Templeton to testify, they, under the advice of counsel, refused to testify before the grand jury. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and, of course, they were compelled to testify if called upon, but they were never called back. It was published in the press at the time that that grand jury, which was dismissed because these two witnesses did not appear, said that its members were a unit, save one, in favor of Mr. Newberry. That case never was finished; but when they got down to Grand Rapids Mr. Newberry was indicted on this same ground, namely, that he had committed perjury in presenting his affidavit to the Senate; but Mr. Palmer, after the other counts had been tried, ordered that count or that indictment against Mr. Newberry dismissed. No; they did not have confidence in that charge, and the count was dismissed.

But how about the State law? In 1909 there was enacted a statute in Michigan which, among other things, prohibited the hiring of workers either on primary day or prior thereto. In 1915 or 1913, I have forgotten which year, there was passed another statute in which 11 things were enumerated for which men could be hired. I maintain, sir, that nothing was done in this campaign, when it is rightly understood, that was in violation of the act of 1913. That was a State statute. Mr. Ford's friends have been active since the beginning of the primary until this hour; hired attorneys have been constantly on the job; and the Federal authorities were also active, through their secret agents, all over the State of Michigan. If Mr. Newberry had violated the State statute, do you imagine that they would not have brought a prosecution against him in the State of Michigan? They do not believe that the State law was violated in its spirit and intent.

When some Senator stated here the other day—I think it was the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]—that men were hired to work on primary day, I said there was nothing in the evidence that I knew of that would establish that fact, and the Senator showed me that I was mistaken. There were one or two witnesses who testified that they were going to hire men, or had hired men, provided for some six or seven men at $5 a day to work on primary day.

I shall have to impose upon you by making a statement which is not in the testimony, but I simply state it upon my honor. I know from Mr. King—now, you may not think that is reliable, but to me it is entirely reliable; when Paul King makes a statement of fact to me, I take it for the truth—he told me that he sent out orders to all of the people, his committees in these counties, that they must have nobody at the polls on primary day; not that it was a violation of this statute to be working to canvass the votes but because we had a statute that a man must keep away from the polls a certain distance on election day, and he did not want anyone to violate it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator has testified outside of the record, will he yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does not the record disclose that Mr. King himself stated, in a letter to Mr. Newberry, that he would have men at the polls until the close of the polls in every election precinct in the State?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think not.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There is a letter of that kind in the record.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall be very glad to see that letter, because I did not know that any such thing was there. I have no doubt that Mr. King notified him that he was going to keep up this campaign until its close.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of the issue that is made here now, I will state that I do not recall the testimony just exactly as the Senator from Florida presents it; but the record does show, and I quoted it in my speech, that one of the field agents who had been in a certain section where there were 10 or 11 or 12 counties—I have forgotten the number—said in this letter that there would be one or more workers at every precinct poll in that district.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] called my attention to.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not pretend to quote the exact language.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think that was Mr. Myron J. Sherwood, from Marquette. There were five or six men there, and I think somebody called my attention to somebody else who said he would have workers at the polls. I must ask the Senator from Florida to present to the Senate the statement he made as to Mr. King's testimony, if it is in the record.

Referring, however, to the statute of 1913, there was nothing done by this committee that was not, in its judgment, in accordance with the law and that has been practiced in that State and other States always. Voters were canvassed through county organizations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to say that the record here is replete with testimony of the employment of men to work on primary day. I did call the attention of the Senator to one item of testimony; but here is the testimony of Mr. Habermann, given at the trial in Grand Rapids, in which he testified about Mr. Yelland, who was one of the principal workers out in the State. He says:

> I remember Mr. Yelland gave me some pamphlets at that time and later he gave me $10. I think he came back to Gladstone before the primary at that time. I think he was alone in the car.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator be good enough to give me the page?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator give us the page?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Page 322 of the bill of exceptions:

> He asked me when he was there the first time to get some other fellows to do work for Mr. Newberry in the fourth ward, to help distribute a little literature for Newberry. He requested me to get these men to work at the polls on primary day. He gave me some money for other people afterwards, but that was probably later on, when he brought the literature over there at that time. Mr. Yelland gave me $30—$10 for me, $10 for another man, and $10 for still another man, each of whom was to go to a different precinct and to stay at the polls on primary day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I said, my contention is that unless somebody was employed right at the polls, contrary to the prohibition of the statute relative to proximity to the polls, everything that was done at the primary was justified under the statute of 1913, framed after the act of 1909. Mr. Yelland's testimony, quoted by the Senator from Montana, clearly related to distribution of literature, and that was certainly lawful. These men must be workers if they do the things that they are permitted to do under the statute. There is no use of quibbling over that. Of course they were workers. It is legal to hire men to do these things, and that is what was done; but, Mr. President, how does Mr. Newberry's campaign, or the campaign that they conducted in Michigan, differ from my campaign or from your campaign? Is it true that the mere amount of money that a man spends in his election, if it is legally spent, is improper, and that he should be ousted from his seat in the Senate for that reason?

In other words, they had a very few people employed during the campaign for my benefit—one or two stenographers. They had one or two field men out, so I am informed. In other words, suppose I should organize 6 counties in Michigan or 10 counties in Michigan by having my committees there properly at work canvassing votes and trying to promote my candidacy. I could get into 10 counties of the 83. Another many comes along and employs the same tactics exactly and gets to the whole 83 counties. Is the one right and the other wrong? Is publicity a good thing if it is legal? If it is, can you have too much of it? I realize that this is a mooted question.

The last time I ran for the Senate in Michigan I had one of the wealthy men in our State as my opponent. It was claimed that he reached all the people, every one of them, at least four times during that campaign. I sent out 10,000 letters from Washington to different people over my State, telling them what the situation was so far as I was concerned. I did not make a speech in my State, as I recall, during that campaign. I was criticized by my friends because, they said, "You have a millionaire against you and you are doing nothing." I carried every county but two in our State.

Senators, it is my theory that there was too much money spent in Michigan. For Mr. Newberry's good there was too much money spent. The mere statement of the amount offends the ordinary citizen. The opposition uses it as a synonym of corruption. But was its use corrupt or unlawful? A poor man running there, well known, would have received the nomination. As it was, we had three millionaires in our State running for the office of Senator. Much has been said about poor Mr. Osborn. I do not think he will take that as a compliment. I am very fond of Gov. Osborn. I value him as a personal friend. But he is a wealthy man. So is Mr. Ford, I think it will be admitted, and so is Mr. Newberry. They were all reputed to be wealthy men.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator will permit a question as a matter of securing information, as he has brought out the fact and testified as to the wealth of Mr. Osborn, will he please state outside of the record—there is no evidence in the record, of course—whether or not Mr. Osborn's friends spent over $200,000 in behalf of his candidacy in this particular race?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no reason to believe he did. No one has intimated that he did. I repeat that I am very fond of Mr. Osborn, the same as I am of Mr. Newberry. To those who know, it is simply ridiculous for Senators to say that Mr. Newberry's letter, when he said Mr. Osborn was running out of ammunition, meant that he was running out of money.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then what did he mean?

Mr. TOWNSEND. He meant that he was running out of campaign material; that he was running out of arguments against Mr. Newberry. That is what he meant, and nothing else. Anything else would have been ridiculous to any Michigander who knows what the situation is in reference to these men's finances. No; that was not it. It was simply that his arguments were running low; that the things he was saying and doing were not counting for much; that he did not have enough in reserve at that stage of the campaign. That is how Mr. Truman Newberry felt about it, undoubtedly.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. Osborn was a very rich man.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I believe he was. I do not think anybody from Michigan will even question the fact that Mr. Osborn is a wealthy man. I do not think he is as wealthy as the Senator from Missouri said he was, that he was many times richer than Mr. Ford. I do not think that. There are probably not very many men in the United States as rich as Mr. Ford. But he is a millionaire without any question. I heard of one transaction in which he is reported to have made about $2,000,000. I hope and believe he did. He is a good business man.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator mean a transaction where ex-Gov. Osborn got $2,000,000?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; and legitimately.

Mr. HEFLIN. Who is the wealthier man, ex-Gov. Osborn or Truman H. Newberry?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know. I do not know how rich either of them is.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Missouri said Osborn was a much richer man than Newberry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I said I thought the Senator from Missouri was mistaken about it, although I thought he was referring to Ford instead of Newberry, but I do not know. His guess may be just as good as mine. As you know, when a man gets to be reputed a millionaire, his wealth grows very rapidly in the public mind. If he is once in that class, he is worth many, many millions right away. I do not know the difference in wealth between them, but I know that from my standard they are all rich men. There is no doubt about that at all. This was not a campaign against a poor man. No poor man lost any chances in this campaign, because there was no such man in the race.

Mr. President, there are very many things that I wish to discuss. One of them is that Mr. Newberry is charged with participation in his campaign, which, it is claimed, amounted to a violation of the statute, and would make him responsible for what money was paid in or what was paid out, the claim being that he was kept posted in reference to his campaign, and he must have known it was taking a lot of money to carry on such a campaign as he was written about, and therefore he is guilty of the actions of the campaign committee, that he is responsible for them, that he must have known about this expenditure of money because he was socially and in a family way related to most of the donors who were afterwards found to have been subscribers to this fund.

This question was discussed in the Supreme Court by Mr. Chief Justice White. The trial judge ruled at Grand Rapids that if Mr. Newberry was so intimately acquainted with the conditions which existed in Michigan during his campaign, they had a right to infer that it was his subscription and that his campaign was being personally conducted by him. Mr. Chief Justice White and Mr. Justice Pitney spoke about this. Mr. Justice Pitney's judgment was approved by the two other justices who did not render a separate opinion. If I may, I will ask the Secretary to read the portions of the opinion of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Pitney, which I have marked. It would save my voice perhaps a little.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Reading from the opinion of the Supreme Court, Senate Document No. 10, page 18——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, let me interrupt the reading to state that the fifth count was the charge of bribery. The fifth count was the charge that the nomination had been secured by fraud through an improper use of money, through bribery, in other words. That count the trial court at Grand Rapids took from the jury.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there is some considerable misapprehension with respect to that matter, and if the Senator will yield to me I should like to assist in clearing it up at this time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The fifth count was a charge of conspiracy to bribe voters. Until the 18th day of October, 1918, there was no Federal statute which made the bribery of voters at a congressional election a crime. We passed such an act, the bill being introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. It became effective by the signature of the President of the United States on the 18th day of October, 1918. So, no matter how much bribery occurred prior to October 18, 1918, in the Michigan campaign it was no offense against any law of the United States. The primary occurred on the 27th day of October, 1918. Consequently no act of bribery at the primary could be availed of to establish the charge in the fifth count and accordingly no testimony was proffered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator claim that that was the reason why it was taken away from the jury?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the reason why it was taken from the jury.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is the reason the court gave.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the reason why it was taken from the jury. No evidence was offered of any bribery prior to the time when the statute became effective because no evidence was admissible upon it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It was taken from the jury because no evidence had been presented of bribery. I do not recall that the trial judge gave the qualified statement given by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

I will ask the Secretary to read from the opinions of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Pitney.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Mr. Chief Justice White, dissenting from the opinion, but concurring with a modification in the judgment of reversal, said in part:

At the trial, before the submission of the case to the jury, the court put the fifth count entirely out of the case by instructing the jury to disregard it, as there was no evidence whatever to sustain it. The bribery charge, therefore, disappeared. The second, third, and fourth counts, dealing, as I have said, with one general subject, were found by the court to be all in substance contained in the first count. They were, therefore, by direction of the court, either eliminated or consolidated with the first count. Thus, as contained in that count the matters charged in the first four counts were submitted to the jury, as was also the sixth count; but the latter we need not further consider, as upon it there was a verdict of not guilty.

The case therefore reduces itself solely to the matters covered in the first count. That count charged a conspiracy on the part of the defendants, 135 in number, including Newberry, to commit an offense against the United States—that is, the offense on the part of Newberry of violating the corrupt practices act—by giving, contributing, expending, and using and by causing to be given, contributed, expended, and used, in procuring his nomination and election as such Senator at said primary and general elections, a sum in excess of the amount which he might lawfully give, contribute, expend, or use, and cause to be given, contributed, expended, or used for such purpose under the laws of Michigan, and in excess of $10,000, to wit, the sum of $100,000; and on the part of the other defendants of aiding, counseling, inducing, and procuring Newberry as such candidate to give, contribute, expend, and use, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, or used, said large and excessive sum, in order to procure his nomination and election.

Conspiracy to contribute and expend in excess of the amount permitted by the statute was, then, the sole issue, wholly disassociated from and disconnected with any corrupt or wrongful use of the amount charged to have been illegally contributed and expended. As putting out of view the constitutional question already considered, the errors assigned are based solely upon asserted misconstructions of the statute by the court in its charge to the jury, we bring the statute at once into view. It provides, so far as relevant to the case before us:

"No candidate for * * * Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election, any sum, in the aggregate, in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides: Provided, That * * * no candidate for United States Senator shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding $10,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election:" * * *

Coming to deal with the statute, the court, after pointing out in the most explicit terms that the limitation on the amount which might be lawfully contributed and expended, or caused to be contributed and expended, in the case at hand was $3,750 (that being the limitation imposed by the laws of Michigan adopted by the statute of the United States just quoted), then proceeded, over objections duly reserved, to instruct as to the significance of the statute, involved in the prohibitions, (a) against giving, contributing, expending, or using, and (b) against causing to be given, contributed, expended, or used, money in excess of that permitted by the statute, saying on these subjects, as follows:

"(a) It is important, therefofe, that you should understand the meaning of the language employed in this corrupt practices act, and that you should understand and comprehend the effect and scope of the act, and the meaning of the language there employed, and the effect and scope and extent of the prohibition against the expenditure and use of money therein contained.

"The words 'give, contribute, expend, or use,' as employed in this statute, have their usual and ordinary significance, and mean furnish, pay out, disburse, employ, or make use of. The term 'to cause to be expended or used,' as it is employed in this statute, means to occasion, to effect, to bring about, to produce the expenditure and use of the money.

"The prohibition contained in this statute against the expenditure and use of money by the candidate is not limited or confined to the expenditure and use of his own money. The prohibition is directed against the use and expenditure of excessive sums of money by the candidate from whatever source or from whomsoever those moneys may be derived.

"(b) The phrase which constitutes the prohibition against the candidate 'causing to be given, contributed, expended, or used excessive sums of money' is not limited and not confined to expenditures and use of money made directly and personally by himself. This prohibition extends to the expenditure and use of excessive sums of money in which the candidate actively participates, or assists, or advises, or directs, or induces, or procures. The prohibition extends not only to the expenditure and use of excessive sums of money by the candidate directly and personally but to such use and expenditure through his agency or procurement or assistance.

"To constitute a violation of this statute knowledge of the expenditure and use of excessive sums of money on the part of the candidate is not sufficient; neither is it sufficient to constitute a violation of this statute that the candidate merely acquiesces in such expenditure and use. But it is sufficient to constitute a violation of this statute if the candidate actively participates in doing the things which occasion such expenditures and use of money and so actively participates with knowledge that the money is being expended and used."

Having thus fixed the meaning of the prohibitions of the statute, the court came to apply them as thus defined to the particular case before it, saying:

"(c) To apply these rules to this case: If you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant, Truman H. Newberry, at or about the time that he became a candidate for United States Senator was informed and knew that his campaign for the nomination and election would require the expenditure and use of more money than is permitted by law and with such knowledge became a candidate, and thereafter, by advice, by conduct, by his acts, by his direction, by his counsel, or by his procurement, he actively participated and took part in the expenditure and use of an excessive sum of money, of an unlawful sum of money, you would be warranted in finding that he did violate this statute known as the corrupt practices act."

Whether the instructions marked (a) and (b), if unexplained, were, in view of the ambiguity lurking in many of the expressions used therein, prejudicially erroneous, I do not think necessary to consider, since I see no escape from the conclusion that the instruction marked (c), which made application of the view of the statute stated in the previous passages (a) and (b), were in clear conflict with the text of the statute, and were necessarily of a seriously prejudicial nature, since in substance they announced the doctrine that under the statute, although a candidate for the office of Senator might not have contributed a cent to the campaign or caused others to do so, he nevertheless was guilty if he became a candidate or continued as such after acquiring knowledge that more than $3,750 had been contributed and was being expended in the campaign. The error in the instruction plainly resulted from a failure to distinguish between the subject with which the statute dealt—contributions and expenditures made or caused to be made by the candidate—and campaign contributions and expenditures not so made or caused to be made, and therefore not within the statute.

There can be no doubt when the limitations as to expenditure which the statute imposed are considered in the light of its context and its genesis, that its prohibitions on that subject were intended not to restrict the right of the citizen to contribute to a campaign but to prohibit the candidate from contributing and expending, or causing to be contributed and expended, to secure his nomination and election a larger amount than the sum limited as provided in the statute. To treat the candidacy, as did the charge of the court, as being necessarily the cause, without more, of the contribution of the citizen to the campaign, was therefore to confound things which were wholly different, to the frustration of the very object and purpose of the statute. To illustrate: Under the instruction given, in every case where to the knowledge of the candidate a sum in excess of the amount limited by the statute was contributed by citizens to the campaign, the candidate, if he failed to withdraw, would be subject to criminal prosecution and punishment. So, also, contributions by citizens to the expenses of the campaign, if only knowledge could be brought home to them that the aggregate of such contributions would exceed the limit of the statute, would bring them, as illustrated by this case, within the conspiracy statute and accordingly subject to prosecution. Under this view the greater the public service and the higher the character of the candidate, giving rise to a correspondingly complete and self-sacrificing support by the electorate to his candidacy, the more inevitably would criminality and infamous punishment result, both to the candiate and to the citizen who contributed.

Mr. Justice Pitney, concurring in part, said in part:

Since the majority of the court hold that the act is invalid, it would serve no useful purpose to spend time in discussing those assignments of error that relate to the conduct of the trial. It may be said, however, that, in my opinion, the trial court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendants for want of evidence of the alleged conspiracy; nor in instructing the jury that the prohibition of the statute against the expenditure and use of money by a candidate beyond the specified limit is not confined to his own money but extends to the expenditure or use of excessive sums of money by him, from whatever source and from whomsoever derived; nor in instructing them that in order to warrant a verdict of guilty upon an indictment for conspiracy it was not necessary that the Government should show that defendants knew that some statute forbade the acts they were contemplating but only to show an agreement to do acts constituting a violation of the statute, their knowledge of the law being presumed.

I find prejudicial error, however, in that part of the charge which assumed to define the extent to which a candidate must participate in expenditures beyond the amount limited in order that he may be held to have violated the prohibition—an instruction vitally important because it was largely upon overt acts supposed to have been done in carrying out the alleged conspiracy that the Government relied to prove the making of the conspiracy and its character, and because, unless the purposes of defendants involved a violation of the corrupt practices act, they were not guilty of a conspiracy to commit an "offense against the United States" within the meaning of section 37, Criminal Code.

The instruction upon this topic, excepted to and assigned for error, was as follows:

"The phrase which constitutes the prohibition against the candidate, 'causing to be given, contributed, expended, or used' excessive sums of money, is not limited and not confined to expenditures and use of money made directly and personally by himself. This prohibition extends to the expenditure and use of excessive sums of money in which the candidate actively participates, or assists, or advises, or directs, or induces, or procures. The prohibition extends not only to the expenditure and use of excessive sums of money by the candidate directly and personally, but to such use and expenditure through his agency, or procurement, or assistance. To constitute a violation of this statute knowledge of the expenditure and use of excessive sums of money on the part of the candidate is not sufficient; neither is it sufficient to constitute a violation of this statute that the candidate merely acquiesces in such expenditures and use. But it is sufficient to constitute a violation of this statute if the candidate actively participates in doing the things which occasion such expenditures and use of money and so actively participates with knowledge that the money is being expended and used. To apply these rules to this case: If you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant, Truman H. Newberry, at or about the time that he became a candidate for United States Senator was informed and knew that his campaign for the nomination and election would require the expenditure and use of more money than is permitted by law and with such knowledge became a candidate, and thereafter by advice, by conduct, by his acts, by his direction, by his counsel, or by his procurement he actively participated and took part in the expenditure and use of an excessive sum of money, of an unlawful sum of money, you will be warranted in finding that he did violate this statute known as the corrupt practices act."

However this may be regarded when considered in the abstract, the difficulty with it, when viewed in connection with the evidence in the case to which the jury was called upon to apply it, is that it permitted and perhaps encouraged the jury to find the defendants guilty of a conspiracy to violate the corrupt practices act if they merely contemplated a campaign requiring the expenditure of money beyond the statutory limit, even though Mr. Newberry, the candidate, had not, and it was not contemplated that he should have, any part in causing or procuring such expenditure beyond his mere standing voluntarily as a candidate and participating in the campaign with knowledge that moneys contributed and expended by others without his participation were to be expended.

The language of the corrupt practices act (37 Stat., 28) is: "No candidate * * * shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised," etc. A reading of the entire act makes it plain that Congress did not intend to limit spontaneous contributions of money by others than a candidate, nor expenditures of such money except as he should participate therein. Of course, it does not mean that he must be alone in expending or causing to be expended the excessive sums of money; if he does it through an agent or agents, or through associates who stand in the position of agents, no doubt he is guilty; qui facit per alium facit per se; but unless he is an offender as a principal there is no offense. Section 332, Criminal Code, declares: "Whoever directly commits any act constituting an offense defined in any law of the United States, or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, or procures its commission, is a principal." Clearly this makes anyone who abets a candidate in expending or causing to be expended excessive sums a principal offender; but it can not change the definition of the offense itself as contained in the corrupt practices act so as to make a candidate a principal offender unless he directly commits the offense denounced. Spontaneous expenditures by others being without the scope of the prohibition, neither he nor anybody else can be held criminally responsible for merely abetting such expenditures.

It follows that one's entry upon a candidacy for nomination and election as a Senator with knowledge that such candidacy will come to naught unless supported by expenditure of money beyond the specified limit, is not within the inhibition of the act unless it is contemplated that the candidate shall have a part in procuring the excessive expenditures beyond the effect of his mere candidacy in evoking spontaneous contributions and expenditures by his supporters; and that his remaining in the field and participating in the ordinary activities of the campaign with knowledge that such activities furnish in a general sense the "occasion" for the expenditure is not to be regarded as a "causing" by the candidate of such expenditure within the meaning of the statute.

The state of the evidence made it important that, in connection with that portion of the charge above quoted, the jury should be cautioned that unless it was a part of defendant's plan that Mr. Newberry should actually participate in giving, contributing, expending, using, or promising, or causing to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised moneys in excess of the limited amount—either himself or through others as his agents—his mere participation in the activities of the campaign, even with knowledge that moneys spontaneously contributed and expended by others, without his agency, procurement, or assistance, were to be or were being expended would not of itself amount to his causing such excessive expenditure. The effect of the instruction that was given may well have been to convey to the jury the view that Mr. Newberry's conduct in becoming and remaining a candidate with knowledge that spontaneous contributions and expenditures of money by his supporters would exceed the statutory limit, and his active participation in the campaign, were necessarily equivalent to an active participation by him in causing the expenditure and use of an excessive sum of money, and that a combination among defendants having for its object Mr. Newberry's participation in a campaign where money in excess of the prescribed limit was to be expended, even without his participation in the contribution or expenditure of such money, amounted to a conspiracy on their part to commit an offense against the act.

For error in the instructions in this particular the judgment should be reversed, with directions for a new trial.

Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Clarke concur in this opinion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I take it for granted there is no one here who believes there was any fraud or corruption connected with the election itself after the primaries. The ballots were recounted at the request of the Senate, and from that recount it was found that Mr. Newberry was entitled to his seat so far as the election ballots were concerned, so that all of the very serious charges that were submited by Mr. Ford in the beginning in reference to the election have now disappeared and no one is contending that any such fraud or any fraud whatever attached to the election except as it came through the primaries. A committee of the Senate have had this matter under investigation. They accepted, as I have stated, the testimony that was taken at Grand Rapids, which was largely the testimony that was repeated by Mr. Souter, Mr. Ford's attorney, who at the time was clerk of the grand jury.

The committee also called some witnesses; every witness they wanted was called, except Mr. Newberry. Mr. Ford's attorney asked for Mr. Newberry. Every other witness that they asked for who could be brought here was brought. The majority of the committee, for reasons evidently satisfactory to themselves, did not see fit to call Mr. Newberry before the committee, the assumption being that no case had been made against him and that there was no reason why he should appear. The testimony that was taken, I repeat, was just such testimony as the minority, as Mr. Ford's attorney, wanted taken. He did not call Mr. Cody. Mr. Cody was the witness concerning whom Senators on the other side have said so much. Why they did not call Mr. Cody I never could understand. If he was the go-between, if he was the man who was responsible in this case, and through whom Mr. Newberry worked, as they have intimated, to spend the Newberry money, why have they not called him? They did not do it. It is evidently safer to speculate in reference to witnesses than it is to call them and take their testimony. It is easier to say, "This man is a crook and he did not testify to the truth before the grand jury," than it is to call the man before the committee and examine him there and take his testimony.

Finally, the unfortunate part of it was, that in the Committee on Privileges and Elections the contest resulted in eight Republican members voting to seat Mr. Newberry and the five Democratic members voting to unseat him. I say this is unfortunate, especially as Senators on the other side deplore the fact that politics has got into this matter. Of course, I maintain that it is a political job from beginning to end. Its genesis was politics and its exodus will be politics very largely. Some of the Senators who have been so bitter, so regardless not only of the feelings of a Senator but of the feelings of the Senator's friends and family, would not have acted as they have if it had been the case of a man on their side of the Chamber. I am sure that is so.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] the other day said that there was a "social lobby" at work in behalf of Mr. Newberry. I do not know just exactly what a "social lobby" means; perhaps the Senator does, but I do not. I am not an expert on social activities. Perchance it means friendship. So far as I am concerned, sir, I had rather be subjected to the influences of friendship than to the influences of partisan hatred and contemptible self-serving politics. I know of no "social lobby" here, however, that is at work in this matter; I have seen no manifestation here of lobbies in behalf of Mr. Newberry; but I have, day after day, seen in the galleries paid representatives of Mr. Ford, and I have seen Senators in consultation with them in the lobbies.

I know now that an attempt is being made to influence the votes of Senators by threats as to their political existence. In January, 1919, Mr. Ford was interviewed in the Los Angeles Sunday Times. I quote a portion of that interview, as follows:

Mr. Ford is still keenly interested in the contest he instituted to unseat United States Senator Newberry, his successful opponent in the November election in Michigan, and says he is prepared to spend millions if necessary to attain his ends in this fight, which he insists is against machine politics and not against Mr. Newberry personally.

He is prepared to spend millions.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator be good enough to give the date of the interview he is quoting? I did not catch it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is dated January 25, 1919. I hold in my hand here a portion of a copy of the Washington Times of September 28, 1921, which reads, in large letters:

Henry Ford to fight slush-fund Senators. Auto king grinds ax to battle enemies. Will carry drive against Newberry allies directly to the voters for action.

And so on. Some letters have been sent out to the same effect; and since this case has been on trial before the Senate certain Senators have never hesitated to threaten with defeat other Senators who would vote for Mr. Newberry, and to gloat over the prospect of their remaining at home because of their vote in this case.

An attempt has been made to coerce Senators into voting against their convictions of duty in this matter. Why these threats? Think of what it would cost in millions of dollars if there were carried out the Ford threat to go into the States of all the Senators who vote to seat Mr. Newberry? Is it in the interest of decency in politics and against the extravagant use of money that this is to be done? What must a self-respecting Senator think of all this?

I have received letters threatening me with defeat; I have received a printed circular which has been sent out stating "Get in touch with Senator TOWNSEND at once, and tell him that he will be defeated if he speaks or votes for Senator Newberry." Oh, it would have been infinitely easier for me, and possibly better for me politically, if I had my political fortune only in mind, if I had remained silent here, violating the oath of office which I took at yonder desk, and said, "I am consulting my own personal political fortunes; it is easy for me to remain silent"; but by remaining silent I would stultify myself, my conscience would have been outraged; and, Senators, if such action would elect me I should feel that I had purchased my seat through betrayal of duty. Membership here is not worth such a price. I have never known anything but the hardest and most grinding work since I have been here, and I can see nothing else ahead; but when I quit, sir, I must have the satisfaction of an approving conscience and not carry with me the knowledge of a violated oath and of a surrender of conviction to cowardly fear of political defeat. No; I shall vote my judgment here, under no obligation to anyone except to my State and country. I deplore the fact, if it is a fact, that some Senators may be influenced in their vote in this case by the thought of what will happen to them back home.

I remember that the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] first voted to unseat Mr. Lorimer, and then on the second occasion, when the question came up, after the Senator from Washington had been put on the committee to investigate and the investigation had been concluded, he voted to seat Mr. Lorimer. When he did so the great Roosevelt, who was then so antagonistic to Mr. Lorimer, said to the people of Washington and of the country that the Senator from Washington and other Senators should be defeated because of their votes for Lorimer. They were not defeated. Thank God, the Senator from Washington was not defeated, because his defeat would have robbed his State and the Nation of one of the ablest and most conscientious Senators who ever sat in this body. So, Mr. President, it is a cowardly, a dastardly argument to threaten Senators with destruction if they do not happen to vote as the man who makes the threat thinks they ought to vote.

The country is not in so much danger from the use of extravagant sums in elections as it is from the betrayal of the confidence placed by the people in the Members of the House and Senate. The people can and will change their representatives when they please and for what they please; but the influence of the promoter of class prejudice, of the time server who poisons the public mind with unjust reflections upon men in public life, inflicts a permanent injury upon society.

I expect to be a candidate for reelection; I expect to have opposition backed by millions of dollars, but it does not frighten me. Of course, if I shall not be elected that will not be important; but I have never seen the time yet when merit would not win in an election in the State of Michigan, and if I shall be defeated I shall know I am not entitled to win. So if I have the merit I shall expect to carry the election, and if I do not have it I will be defeated, but that thought does not weigh with me an ounce in this matter.

Mr. President, I was speaking of the threats made that we are to meet opposition at home if we vote our judgment and that judgment should happen to be in favor of Mr. Newberry. I repeat in all candor that for myself I do not know how anybody who has studied this case from beginning to end and knows all the circumstances connected with it can vote to unseat Mr. Newberry. I say the fight against him was born in politics. When Mr. Wilson put Mr. Ford in the ring and into the campaign, that was the real genesis of this case. Mr. Wilson had said he wanted none but Democrats sent to the Congress, and it looked as though he could divide the Republican Party in Michigan by putting Mr. Ford on both tickets.

It is true that the Newberry committee was organized before Mr. Ford declared himself a candidate, and before that time comparatively little money was expended. It was, however, known that Mr. Ford was a strong possibility. So long as he is in the hands of politicians who know what they want he will be a political possibility. I am not complaining about his political ambitions; he has the same right as every other man to aspire to public position; but his great wealth and disposition to advertise give him great power and influence.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the Senator does President Wilson an injustice by saying that he asked that none but Democrats be elected to Congress. He wanted a majority of his party elected to Congress just as Mr. McKinley, Mr. Lincoln, and Mr. Roosevelt on former occasions asked that a majority of their party be elected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well; with that explanation my statement may stand.

Now, Mr. President, I am not standing here alone because of my belief in Mr. Newberry's title to his seat. I know he is a patriot, and not one act of his since he became a Senator has been criticized. When he was here and permitted to work every Senator, Democrat and Republican, will bear evidence to his splendid ability. No; there is nothing against him, so far as his service here is concerned. There can be nothing against him so far as his service to his country is concerned; there can be no question raised as to that. Although he has been abused shamefully, he is a clean man; he was clean before and has been clean since that primary. Did he and others associated with him in the campaign become corrupt overnight? In one campaign did they become corrupt? I do not believe they did, and not so believing, I shall certainly not vote against him.

But, Mr. President, I am interested in the State of Michigan. If that election was bought, somebody sold it. If Truman Newberry or his friends bought his election, thousands of people of Michigan sold it; and yet, sir, there has not been one word of evidence to show that there was any fraud or even any indirection connected with that election. By a majority of several thousand our people said that they preferred Newberry to Ford, and now, sir, before I, as a Senator from my State, will permit an act for personal political reasons, because of feelings of cowardice, or for any other reason to be done, I must raise my voice in protest in behalf of the people of my own State, than whom there are no better people in any State in the Union. This is an indictment not only of a Senator but of the people of the State of Michigan, and I believe it has not been properly brought.

The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] on yesterday made some remarks during the course of which he stated that he was going to ask the junior Senator from Michigan certain questions, if he appeared on this floor. If the junior Senator from Michigan permits such questions to be asked and for the purpose for which they will be asked, I shall have less respect for him than I have now. The junior Senator from Michigan will submit to proper questions, but neither the Senator from Alabama nor any other Senator has any right to cross-examine any Senator on this floor, and every Senator would resent such an attempt. If the junior Senator from Michigan speaks here, it will be upon his honor as a Senator, and I submit that that honor is as high as that of any other Senator in this body.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator holds, then, that Truman H. Newberry should be permitted to come here and say just what he desires to say and nothing else, and that Senators must sit silent and permit points that they would like to have elucidated go unexplained?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would accord the junior Senator from Michigan the same rights that I would accord the Senator from Alabama, and that the Senator from Alabama would demand. The Senator from Alabama would talk as he pleased if he took the floor, and he would yield when he pleased. Senator Newberry will do the same thing, I have no doubt, although I have not talked with him about this point.

Mr. HEFLIN. If my seat were involved, like his, I would be willing to be questioned by Senators about every phase of the case.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is a question for the Senator himself to decide. How many times have I been on this floor and heard questions asked of Senators which they resented, because they said: "You can not cross-examine me, and you must say nothing to me that reflects upon my honor."

Mr. HEFLIN. That must have been where a Senator's right to sit here was not questioned. Now we are talking about a man whose right to sit here is questioned.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is questioned by some of the Senators. He will answer questions, no doubt, that are proper; but for Senators to think that they can rise before another Senator and heckle him, insult him, possibly, and give notice beforehand that they propose to heckle him, that they propose to ask him all kinds of questions, pertinent and otherwise, to my mind, is intolerable.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan further yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. It was not my purpose to heckle him. It was my purpose to ask him about testimony submitted by an ex-governor of his State and the present lieutenant governor of his State about the situation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Neither the late governor of the State of Michigan nor the lieutenant governor have testified to anything except hearsay in reference to this campaign, and both of them wrote letters to Newberry congratulating him upon his election. I do not care anything about that. It is pure hearsay.

I repeat what I said before, that Senator Newberry is a Senator here. Until you vote him out, he is a Senator. He has a right to appear here on this floor upon his honor as a Senator. That is what he will do, if he comes at all, and what he says is entitled to respect. He is the peer of any one of you, here or there. He has demonstrated it in his life. Many of you have had scandals about elections in your States—most of you have. At the same time that this question arose in reference to Newberry in 1918 there were some half dozen on this floor who were also published in the papers as having had peculiar methods employed in their elections. There is not any question about that. I do not hold you guilty because those rumors were prevalent. I state that you are entitled to the respect of the Senate until the vote has been taken and you are denied a seat here.

No Senator ought to rise in his place for the express purpose of embarrassing a Senator in his statements of fact, and especially a Senator who has suffered the tortures of hell, and who no doubt would give every dollar he has if he had not entered the race at all. He has had nothing but sorrow and suffering and persecution from the beginning until this hour. He is entitled to decent respect, decent treatment, at least, on the part of his colleagues on this floor.

Mr. President, I have already talked longer than I expected to do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I hope that before the Senator gets through he will favor us with his views concerning the legality and the propriety of the employment of this great army of paid workers that the testimony shows were employed in this case and give us his views concerning the meaning of the Michigan statute upon that subject.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I thought I had already covered that. I shall be glad to do it again. I discussed that to some extent. I hate to repeat myself, but I shall be very glad to say that I do not think the Michigan statute was violated by committee employment, unless it were in some isolated cases, without authority, that somebody had somebody else at the primaries, at the polls, within an improper distance of the polls. I do not know of any such case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, I do not refer to the isolated cases. I should like to hear the Senator concerning the entire system of going out about the State and employing agents.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I stated a moment ago, Mr. President, that this campaign for Mr. Newberry was just like the Senator's campaign and every other campaign, but on a smaller scale. We all organize or attempt to organize as best we can for our election when we are nominated or seeking the nomination. We try to get our friends interested in our behalf. If we are able to do it, we make a canvass of the voters. We get a list of names, the poll list, from the secretaries or somebody else. We send out such literature as we feel we are able to send out. Some of us, already in the Senate, send it out at public expense, putting it in franked envelopes to send around, which reduces the cost to us but immensely increases the cost to the people. We do that. We send out the literature, our speeches; we send out such things as we think will be helpful to us. Now and then we hire some space in the newspapers and pay for it. Where the paper will not voluntarily take it and publish it for us as daily news we buy space, sometimes, and pay regular advertising rates for it. We all do that. There is no use of denying it. I think it is lawful.

There are some people who say they do not have to spend any money. Well, in the past I have been reasonably popular in my State, and did not require, perhaps, any more than the ordinary amount of advertising, but I have tried to do the best I could always to advance my cause.

What is the difference between that and the Newberry case, as I understand it? Mr. Newberry organized all of the counties in our State, save one, in that way. Instead of advertising in six or eight papers, as I did, he advertised in 300, all of the papers. He put his advertisements in all of the papers. Now, I attempted to say what I will repeat: Can we draw a moral line or a legal line, and say that the amount of advertising, the amount of publicity, the amount of canvassing, must be limited to the amount of my means, a poor man? Will that be the limit? Will it be said that if a man is worth twenty-five, thirty, or forty thousand dollars, what he can pay shall be the limit of the expense to which all can go in the way of advertising in the papers; or shall we say "It is legal to do this, and anybody can do little or much of it, as he sees fit"?

I do not believe that the State statute was violated. I believe that they had the right to hire the workers that they spoke about, unless they were within the confines of the polls or too near there, as canvassers. The statute was passed after the act of 1909, but they were workers, nevertheless.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator spoke about newspaper advertising. I want to get his view about that later; but for the present I should like to direct his attention to the subject of the paid workers. Mr. Phillips, for instance, was a paid worker.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator think it was illegal under the statute to pay Mr. Phillips?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do. There is a vast number of such cases. Every county chairman was a paid worker and was paid for his services. There was a man hired to travel around the State and go among the Masons and endeavor to persuade the Masons to support Mr. Newberry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In other words, to canvass.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We will get to that directly. Another man was employed to go about among the fraternal organizations generally to persuade them. Another man was employed to go about among the veterans of the Spanish-American War.

Another man was employed to go about among the laboring men, and so on, and so on. I am speaking about paid workers. I want to know from the Senator if it is his view that the employment of such paid workers, their activities being reported daily to Mr. Newberry in New York, is forbidden by the statute of the State?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What has the Senator to say, then, in respect to this statute which I have before me, section 45 of the laws of his State of 1909:

> Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives, lends, or agrees to give or lend, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration or office, place, or employment to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person in order to induce or have such person induce any voter to vote for or refrain from voting for, or support or oppose any candidate, or on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any primary election in this State; every person who by any means receives, agrees, or contracts for any money, gift, fee, loan, or valuable consideration, office, place, appointment, or employment for himself or any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting in a particular manner at any such primary election; or for inducing or undertaking to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner, or to do or perform any of the acts of things forbidden by this act, or on account of doing or agreeing to do, or having done any campaign work, electioneering, soliciting votes for such candidates on primary day or prior thereto, or who after any primary election in this State, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives or receives any money or valuable consideration or place, position, or employment on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting, or having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any such primary election; or having induced or undertaken to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner or for any particular candidate at any such primary election, or on account of any person having done or been a party to doing anything forbidden by this act, it being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto; also, every person who in behalf of any firm, partnership, association, or corporation gives, lends, or receives, or agrees to give, lend, or receive, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, place, position, or employment, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration, in order to aid or promote the nomination of any particular candidate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment for a period of not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

What has the Senator to say about that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I discussed that matter, too, when I was on the subject before. The act of 1913, four years after that, mentions 11 things that can be legally done involving the spending of unlimited amounts of money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I have that statute before me.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That statute mentions 11 things that can be done, practically every one of them meaning a worker that can be employed. Another thing, if the Senator please: This statute has been the law in Michigan since 1909. It was the law when this primary ended, and Mr. Ford's hired men knew it. They have known it. They have seen it violated, if the Senator's construction is right, at every election, because they do employ men to make canvasses, which includes the things the Senator has mentioned.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Upon what record does the Senator say that Mr. Ford employed workers?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Why, he has had his attorneys with him all the time, from the beginning.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Working for him? Electioneering for him?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, I am not saying that. I am talking about looking after his interests in this case and against Mr. Newberry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us not get away from the issue here. We are talking about hiring workers to electioneer.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am talking about that, too. If that is the law as the Senator reads it now, why have they not prosecuted these people in Michigan? Why was not Newberry prosecuted under that law?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, that is no answer. That is all the answer the Senator cares to make; is it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is all the answer I care to make. I insist that the act of 1913 permits the things that have been done here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have the act of 1913 before me. I shall read it, and ask the Senator to——

Mr. TOWNSEND. That has been read over and over again. It has been read by the Senator; it has been read by other Senators. I think we are all familiar with it. There is a chance for an argument as to what a worker means, and whether the statute of 1913 does permit the things that we are talking about, and which have been practiced every year since the act of 1913, at least, was passed, nobody questioning them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, but it is really no answer to say that no prosecutions have ever been had under the act. Of course, it has been repeatedly stated here that illegal acts have been perpetrated in connection with many elections, many more than have been prosecuted. That is no answer that ought to satisfy any man. We ought to have, it seems to me, from the Senator from Michigan—who is a lawyer of distinction and of reputation that is very well deserved—his construction of this statute, what it means. Apparently the Senator contends now, and his view is, that this statute of 1909 did prohibit the employment of workers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That was a criminal statute.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. The Senator's view is quite different from the view expressed by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; now, just a moment. That was a criminal statute that was passed in 1909, and it had reference, no doubt, to criminal acts or practices that had existed in the way of men going out and inducing, through money and promises, men to vote a certain way by buying their votes. There is no charge that any such thing was done in this case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh! Then the Senator agrees, apparently, with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] that the proper construction to be given to the act of 1909 is that it does not prohibit the employment of men who are simply to go out and use arguments and proper persuasions with the voters around the State, but it only prohibits the employment of men who are to go about and bribe voters. That is the construction of the statute given by the Senator from Missouri, as I understand it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I agree with that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator agrees with that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know where the Senator is going from there, too.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I want to call the Senator's attention to this part of the statute:

> It being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto.

I want to inquire of the Senator if it was the prevailing practice in his State for candidates to hire workers to go out around the State to bribe voters?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it was the practice, but I think it was indulged in in my State as it was in the Senator's State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was the practice, apparently, to hire workers, and that is the practice which was to be prohibited.

I wish to interrogate the Senator about this act of 1913. It is there provided that—

> No candidate and no treasurer of any political committee shall pay, give, or lend, or agree to pay, give, or lend, either directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing for any election expense whatever, except for the following purposes:
> First. For traveling expenses and personal expenses incident thereto.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator still addressing himself to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator still asking questions?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to find out under what law or statute of Michigan the Senator from Michigan finds any justification for the employment of this great army of paid workers. I do not refer to any particular instance in which these workers may have used what might be spoken of as corrupt means. There are, of course, instances of that in the record, but I do not refer to them. I refer to the entire system under which this campaign was conducted, the general employment of paid workers for the purpose of going out and urging other citizens to vote for Mr. Newberry, and helping to organize the counties, as it is expressed, and all that kind of thing.

I read:

For traveling expenses and personal expenses incident thereto for printing, stationery, advertising, postage, expressage, freight, telegraph, telephone, and public messenger service.

The Senator would not contend——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Anyone who was advertising would be a hired man, of course. He would be paid for advertising and under that clause he would be a worker.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Would the Senator say that this clause would justify the employment, for instance, of a man who traveled around the State securing the support of fraternal institutions?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I think he would be justified in paying him for going around and advertising.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What did the Senator say?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think he would be justified in hiring men to go around advertising, whether he went among the Masons or the seamen or the laboring men or what not. He had a right to do this, to give publicity, and he could hire men to do it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What I want to know from the Senator is whether this particular clause justifies the employment of these men?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not all of them, but read on.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read:

Second. For traveling expenses and personal expenses incident thereto, for printing, stationery, advertising, postage, expressage, freight, telegraph, telephone, and public messenger service.

Would that justify such employment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Public messenger service would cover something, but it would not cover all that the Senator has in mind.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would not cover, for instance——

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is going to read the balance of it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, certainly. Would it cover, for instance, the specific case which I have spoken of, where men traveled around among the laboring men and endeavored to secure their support?

Mr. TOWNSEND. He might be justified in going around and advertising, circulating documents, or publicity matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; but I am speaking about the general organization, the Senator understands, the men who did the general work. I do not mean the boys who were employed to scatter dodgers around.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is no distinction between boys and men in that clause.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; not at all. Of course, if a man was employed to scatter literature and that was all he was called upon to do, that would be one thing. If he was employed for the purpose of endeavoring to induce other people, by persuasion and argument, and so on, to support his candidate the Senator would recognize that that would be quite different.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Suppose he was employed in a county to organize the county for the purpose of publicity, would that be proper or improper?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That would depend on whether his duties devolved some exercise of persuasion and inducement, or whether he was merely to pass bills around. If he was to do a mechanical act, of course, he was not liable. I read further:

Second. For the dissemination of printed information to the public.

Would that justify the employment of these men?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The employment of whom?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For the dissemination of printed information.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Would it justify the employment of whom did the Senator say?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of the general run of men who were employed?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think it would justify the employment of any men who did that thing to disseminate information.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us take, for instance, a man who was employed to go around among the laboring men.

Mr. TOWNSEND. They can use literature just the same as anyone else.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is it the understanding of the Senator that those men had nothing to do except to disseminate literature?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They might have done several things under the very statute the Senator is reading.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But I mean under this particular subdivision. Would the Senator think it could be justified under this subdivision?

Mr. TOWNSEND. In doing what?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In going around among laboring men.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think so, for advertising and the dissemination of information.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, if the Senator thinks so, I need not go any further.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well; that is the way I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I do not intend to speak upon the pending resolution, but I do wish to say a word in answer to the question of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I know what a distinguished lawyer the Senator from Montana is. We might just as well fairly face the question that we have a long statute to construe, which the Senator read in its entirety and read accurately. All I want to say to the Senator from Montana is this:

The Senator from Montana seriously contends upon the floor of the Senate of the United States that the statute of the State of Michigan makes it unlawful to hire any worker on primary day or prior thereto. If the construction which the Senator from Montana puts upon that statute is correct, it means that if any man in Michigan hires a man to distribute cards or hires a man to obtain the names of voters in a precinct, or visits the people of a precinct to talk with them about the election or about the candidate—things which the Senator from Montana knows have been done in every State in the Union—if the construction which the Senator puts upon that statute is right those things are criminal——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all.

Mr. SPENCER. And the man who does them is a criminal, because that man is a hired worker——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all.

Mr. SPENCER. Working before the primary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all. He does not——

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator from Montana say why not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The distinction is clearly pointed out in the opinion of the court of appeals of the Senator's own State. The distinction is that when a man is employed merely to do a mechanical act he does not violate the statute. The statute never was intended to cover that kind of a case. It is only when he goes about to induce by persuasion or discussion or argument or other matters of that kind.

Mr. SPENCER. Let us put it the way the Senator from Montana now puts it, that the man who for hire goes among his neighbors or his associates to present the claims or the facts of a candidate, thus being a hired worker, is a criminal himself, and the man who hired him is a criminal?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. Yet those things are not only done but ought to be done in every election.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They ought not to be done for hire, however.

Mr. SPENCER. Yes; for hire.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no.

Mr. SPENCER. For hire, and it has so been done always, and always will be so done.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And the courts have always held that it is against public policy.

Mr. SPENCER. So they have; and the case to which the Senator referred in the court of appeals in my own State had nothing to do with the crime of an act. It was a civil case where a man was seeking to recover pay that he claimed was due him for some such work. The court of appeals said that that was such an employment against public policy, having to do with an election, that they would not enforce the contract. But there was nothing morally wrong about it, and there is no parallel in the case before us.

The Senator knows well enough that if the Senator and I were to have a wager of a dollar upon some event in which we were interested, and if I lost and the Senator attempted at common law to enforce that wager, the court would say, "No; it can not be enforced." But the guilt, the moral burden, would be upon myself who failed to carry out my agreement.

There are a multitude of things which, according to public policy, can not be enforced in a court of law in a civil proceeding. That is not what we are talking about. We are talking about whether the Senator from Montana really seriously contends that because, not an army—the Senator could count them in a minute so far as the record goes—but that because here and there and elsewhere in the State of Michigan men were hired to do things not regular in themselves, no bribery, no corruption, but to disseminate information and to arouse legitimate interest in the campaign, they are criminals.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The testimony is that the chairman and secretary in every county in the State was paid.

Mr. SPENCER. Paid, but not paid except for the legitimate expenses which they incurred. The Senator can not put his finger upon one line of testimony which shows the payment of a dollar for a corrupt or improper purpose or for bribery or a dishonest use.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They were paid for their services.

Mr. SPENCER. Let me finish my statement, if I may. If the Senator's construction of that statute is correct, if it is wrong to pay a man the expenses which he has incurred in a county, if it is wrong to pay a man for the time he uses and gives in disseminating information about a candidate or a cause or a principle, if those things are wrong under a statute of Michigan and are branded as criminal, why is it, as the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] intimated a moment ago, that in that State, where politics run high and where men are keen to avail themselves of every advantage which may benefit their party, that not once in the history of Michigan in a single county has there been a prosecuting officer who ever presented a charge for what the Senator from Montana now thinks is a crime in the State of Michigan?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator does not know that there was not.

Mr. SPENCER. If there had been, that fact would have been brought out on the floor of the Senate. I have examined into it myself as far as I have been able, and I make the statement from that examination that there is not the record of a single proceeding of that kind. In this case, when the activity and money and vindictiveness of Mr. Ford have been evidenced a thousand times, if there was any chance of enforcing the law as the Senator from Montana construes it, does not the Senator presume that it would have been considered by the agents of Mr. Ford and a proceeding started in every county in Michigan? If in every county the statute had been violated, as the Senator from Montana construes it, does the Senator think, from what he reads in this record, that Henry Ford would have allowed a single man in Michigan to escape the enforcement of a law which he believed had been violated in the interest of Truman H. Newberry?

There is no argument which is conclusive in that state of facts, but it must be persuasive to a fair mind that the Senator's interpretation of that law may be unwarranted. With deference to the Senator's judgment as a lawyer, I differ with him in toto in the interpretation of that law. I challenge the Senator to read again the opening sentences of that law, which clearly stamp its purpose that runs like a scarlet thread through the whole section. It has to do with the giving of money or position to induce a voter to vote a certain way. I say that it is a strained construction which the Senator from Montana seeks to give to the law when he says that because a man is hired to do a legitimate thing he becomes a criminal under that construction.

The Senator from Montana has forgotten, too, in his construction of the law, which construction, I think, is strained, what he is seeking to establish, that a Senator of the United States shall be unseated because of a failure of whom? Of some men in the State of Michigan whose names, so far as the record goes, are unknown to Senator Newberry, with whom he had no connection, with whom there is not a word of evidence to show that he ever held a word of conversation.

The Senator from Montana contends that because some man in some county hired a man to do a perfectly legitimate thing, for that reason the junior Senator from the State of Michigan ought to be expelled from his seat in this body.

I say it is atrocious in its brutality. I say that the great facts of the case are forgotten. The Senator knows that a man might start out to view the great Pikes Peak of Colorado and, looking at a single spot with a microscope before his eyes, see nothing but a puddle of mud. Yet the Senator from Montana, of all men, for he lives in the West, where men look upon mountain tops, knows that if such a man, who would come back and say, "Yes; I have seen Pikes Peak, I watched it this morning, it is nothing but a puddle of mud; that is the way it looked through a microscope," had looked at the mountain top would have seen it in all its majestic grandeur.

I say to the Senator from Montana, with all the conviction I can put into it, that the big things of this record, the vital, crucial things that would determine the case before a judge, are all one way, and that a microscopic examination into details, with which there is not the slightest evidence to connect Truman H. Newberry, is not fair in any proceeding before this body.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I derive a great deal of satisfaction from the fact that this able disquisition upon a simple proposition of law, namely, the construction of a statute, was listened to by the distinguished senior Senator from the State of Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], long a judge, called upon to determine questions of that character. I submit that if that kind of an argument were made before him as a judge of his court upon the construction of a statute it would not, as I think, be very persuasive.

Neither do I think he would find much force in the contention that a certain construction of criminal statutes was not correct, because if it had been correct prosecutions would have been instituted under it. That kind of talk may do very well in some places, but it would not have any persuasive force with a body of lawyers nor with a body of intelligent men who are endeavoring to seek what the statute means. The statute expressly prohibits paying for electioneering. What does that mean? Everybody understands it. The boy who goes about the street distributing cards or newspapers or periodicals or the billposter who posts up bills upon a board does not engage in electioneering. Electioneering means something else; it means the use of persuasion, the use of argument, the use of the arts that are ordinarily employed to induce a man to accept one view or another.

Mr. President, there is no way of getting away from this. The statute of 1913, to which the Senator from Michigan has referred, expressly provides, in subdivision 7, that money may be used "for the payment of public speakers and musicians at public meetings and their necessary traveling expenses." That means that money may not be legitimately paid in the State of Michigan to private speakers who do not address public meetings, but who speak privately to the voters.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have the Senator's construction of the ninth subdivision of the act, which reads in this way:

> For making canvasses of voters.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to give the Senator my construction of that language.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from Montana as to what that language means.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am perfectly satisfied as to what that means. I have heretofore given the dictionary definition. It means ascertaining how the voters will vote.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Montana again state the provision of the law?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The ninth subdivision of the law reads:

> For making canvasses of voters.

"Making canvasses of voters" means exactly the same as making canvasses of Senators. I dare say that some one is now engaged in making a canvass of the Senators upon the question which is before us. A Senator goes around upon the other side to ascertain how Senators are going to vote in the Newberry case. One Senator says, "I shall vote for the resolution to seat him," and another Senator says, "I shall vote against it." When the task is completed he says, "This is a canvass of Senators which I have made." The Senator understands that that is an ordinary part of a political campaign. I have paid men in my State for a list showing how the voters in certain localities were going to vote, one way or the other.

The man who does that work may possibly be a partisan, and while he is going around doing the work he may possibly use some persuasion; but that is another thing. The statute refers to the man who is employed to canvass the voters and does not do anything else but merely ascertains mechanically how the voters are going to vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator think that if a man who is going around ascertaining how the voters will vote should go further under his instruction and use arguments in order to convince the voters how they ought to vote, that would bring him within the penalty of the statute?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would if he were employed to do it. The manager of a campaign might very properly employ a man to go around and make a canvass of the voters, stating, "That is your job; that is what I am going to pay you for." Of course, if he was employed to do that, and he went beyond that and used persuasion, he would not have been employed for that purpose, and therefore neither he nor the other man could be subject to the penalties of the act.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator from Montana construe the testimony here as showing that the men, for instance, those to whom he has referred, were not employed primarily to make a canvass of votes but to go about and influence the voters?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly. For instance, it is in the testimony in this case that Paul King wrote to Mr. Newberry "we do not intend to get the ordinary fellow; we intend to get the leaders in every community," for the purpose, of course, of influencing the community in that direction. Why employ the leading man in the community—the banker or the lawyer or the leading merchant—to go around and ask Jones and Smith how they are going to vote? Of course, anybody could do that, but that was not satisfactory. They were employing the leading man in every community, the men of influence.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just one moment. To illustrate, I call attention to the case of the Hansons. They said, "We need the Hansons. We can not carry their part of the county without them. We could get other men, of course, but we can not accomplish much unless we get the Hansons." And they proceeded to get the Hansons. It is shown that they came and slipped them some money, but the Hansons were good enough to return it; they did not want the money; they worked without it. So, Mr. President, it is not conceivable that we can read this evidence as signifying that all of the men who were employed were employed merely for the purpose of getting a list of voters and showing whether or not they would vote for Newberry or for Osborn, as the case might be.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. Can the Senator point anywhere in the testimony to a case where any man was hired to influence the voters or to persuade the voters to vote in any way, either for or against Newberry?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can do so in innumerable instances.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator be kind enough to point to one?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I shall be very glad to do so, but I have not the testimony at hand. However, I shall be very glad before we get through with this discussion to supply to the Senator from Missouri a list of such cases.

Mr. SPENCER. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so from the testimony.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I could easily turn to my notes and find such cases.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator from Missouri really wants the information for which he asks, I desire to say that if he will read the minority report he will find most of it there.

Mr. SPENCER. I have read the minority report with care and with very great pleasure, because it was prepared by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Missouri while he was reading the report must have been preoccupied with some other subject, otherwise he would have had the information for which he has asked the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SPENCER. It would be difficult to be preoccupied to any such extent when reading anything which had been produced by the Senator from Ohio. My question, however, was as to whether or not there is any evidence to show that men were hired to induce or to persuade voters. I do not now yield to a construction that would make such an act criminal along any ordinary lines, but because of the point which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has just so clearly made, I desire to say that I doubt if there is one word of testimony to show that any man was hired to persuade or induce voters. There were men who were hired to organize counties.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us understand the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. I am trying to make myself understood.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us understand the Senator from Missouri. When a man is employed to organize a county, is he not employed to endeavor to induce the voters of that county to vote for some one?

Mr. SPENCER. By the methods, of course, which are provided by law; he is not presumed to be employed to do an unlawful thing. There are many ways of organization—by public meetings and by publicity, for instance—that are expressly authorized by the statute of Michigan; but I asked the Senator a question. He said—and he was quite right—that where a man is employed to canvass there was nothing illegal in that, but if in the canvassing he should happen to make an argument to a voter, and should do it for hire, at the suggestion of the man who hired him, that then, in the judgment of the Senator from Montana, there was a criminal act instantly committed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Under the plain language of the statute.

Mr. SPENCER. Under what the Senator thinks is the plain language of the statute. Now I raise the point that, so far as I remember, there is no testimony to show that men were hired with instructions to do even what the Senator from Montana complains of. The testimony shows that when they were hired the law was before them, and they were hired to organize, as they had a right to do, even under the Senator's interpretation, for they were doing things that were permitted under the laws of Michigan.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, if I read the record aright, they were all hired to electioneer, to induce their fellow voters to vote for Newberry.

Mr. SPENCER. That is the Senator's inference, but I am asking him if there is any evidence to sustain that contention?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think it is in the testimony.

I very much regret that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is not here, for I really had intended to get his view about the matter of advertising. If I gathered the position of the Senator from Michigan aright, he takes the view—and I do not controvert it—that advertisements may be placed in any number of newspapers if it is a mere matter of bargain and sale affecting the advertising space without any understanding, express or implied, that the editorial policy is thereby to be controlled. I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from Missouri on that subject.

Mr. SPENCER. I think that any amount of money spent for advertising is permitted by the law of Michigan. I agree with the Senator from Montana that money spent under the guise of advertising but indirectly for the bribery of the editor of a paper is unlawful in Michigan and in every other State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator think there was not anything of that kind in the Michigan case?

Mr. SPENCER. I do not think there was. I know what the Senator from Montana has in mind. I think he has in mind an instance referred to in the record, and I can quite understand the inference which the Senator from Montana may draw from that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to read, then, some excerpts from the testimony.

Mr. SPENCER. I will be glad to hear them again, although the Senator has read them heretofore.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator might go out among school children and get them to believe that in the Newberry campaign money was spent for mere advertisements such as the grocery man and the dry goods man put in the paper; but the conclusion that the influence of the newspaper through its editorial columns and otherwise was expected, just exactly the same as the influence of the man who was employed to organize a county was expected, is irresistible from the record. However, there is more specific proof than that. I have collated some matters from the record. I refer, first, to the testimony of James Haskins, which is found in the record on page 872. He was one of Mr. Hopkins's assistants, Mr. Hopkins being the director of publicity. Mr. Haskins testified as follows:

> The original intention of Mr. Hopkins was to spend about $130,000 on the publicity work, but that of course $130,000 did not begin to cover it. He said also that he and Mr. Hopkins both, in the beginning, supposed that it was to be mainly a publicity campaign, and they afterwards found out that large sums of money were being spent, and Mr. Haskins spoke to Paul King about it, and he did not seem to like the statements that were made, but he did not deny them.

I refer next to the testimony of Fred D. Keister, found on pages 507 and 656 of the record. Mr. Keister asked for an automobile to do Newberry work, but he was paid $250 instead. He testified that he was the publisher of the Elsie Sun and also a paper at Pewamo and editor of the State Journal at Lansing. His testimony in the record is as follows:

That at the time Mr. Floyd talked with me he said it was not necessary for me to state my connection with the work, as they did not want to antagonize Mr. Fehling; also that the work would be more efficient, or more effective, rather.

James Fisher (record, p. 507), a banker, who was active in Newberry's support, testified as follows:

He stated that he hired men to distribute literature; that he hired some boys whom he paid one or two dollars apiece for distributing literature, but where he could he hired men, for the reason that they probably would have more influence. He also stated that he gave $80 to a Finnish paper and $40 to Polish paper; that he paid a couple of Frenchmen for work; also several men in and about Larium amounts from ten to fifty dollars; one man, I think he stated, he paid $50 to. * * * Mr. Fisher also stated that he received $500 from Mr. McGregor as a gratuity. * * *

Paul Woodworth (record, p. 888), a prosecuting attorney in Huron County and secretary of the Newberry organization there, testified:

Newspaper men in county all got money. I received a letter from Newberry during the campaign thanking me for my services, and after the primaries I received a telegram and a letter from him.

Edward A. Nowack (record, p. 875, and bill of exceptions, p. 221), editor of the Kalkaska Publishing Co.—and this is a matter that I encountered the other day while going through the record again—testified:

He said that the advertising amounted to about $56 and this was paid from the Newberry headquarters at Detroit. He said that they also furnished him a ton of newsprint paper from the Central Michigan Paper Co. at Kalamazoo.

Bear in mind that he received his pay for advertising by check and got a ton of newsprint paper in addition.

He said it was plain paper. He said Floyd promised to send this to me. This was in June, shortly after I went to Kalkaska. * * * He told Charles Floyd he did not care to work for Mr. Newberry just for the advertising, and so they sent him a ton of paper to use for my paper for Newberry. He said the value of the paper was about $125. He said that he also received $50 from Charles Floyd at Grand Rapids on one occasion.

Dr. James B. Bradley (record, p. 652) in charge of the Newberry campaign in Eaton County, among other activities, testified before the grand jury as shown by the record as follows:

He also stated that he saw Mr. DeFoe, editor of the Charlotte Republican, in an endeavor to purchase the support of that paper for Mr. Newberry, and that Mr. DeFoe asked him $250 for the support. He afterwards saw him again and he had raised the amount to $500 which he wished for the support of the paper. He talked it over with Mr. King, and Mr. King told him to use his own judgment. He told Mr. King he did not think it was worth $500.

It was not a question of buying the paper, but it was a question of the price.

Another witness named King (record, p. 618) testified on this point as follows:

Mr. DeFoe wanted a larger sum for the advertising than Dr. Bradley thought was fair, and I believe volunteered to throw in the editorial support of the paper. Dr. Bradley spoke to me about it and wanted to know if we would pay any such sum.

* * * * * * *

I have forgotten whether it was $500 or more. It was something like that. I told Dr. Bradley that we were not buying editorial support of the Charlotte Republican or any other paper, and I would not consider it, and that he should tell Mr. DeFoe that it was entirely improper and we would not do it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator read the last sentence again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to do so. It is as follows:

I told Dr. Bradley that we were not buying editorial support of the Charlotte Republican or any other paper, and I would not consider it, and that he should tell Mr. DeFoe that it was entirely improper and we would not do it.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you not tell Dr. Bradley that you would leave it to his judgment whether he should pay $500 or not?

Mr. KING. I do not recall that I did.

Mr. President, if they were absolutely not doing business of that kind, why should he not recall that he had not said anything of the kind. The answer of Mr. King was, "I do not recall that I did."

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did he not so testify?

Mr. KING. I do not know.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And that he thought that it was not worth it? Is not that the truth about it?

Mr. KING. I do not know about that.

A telegram dated August 19, 1918 (bill of exceptions, p. 356), from Dr. J. B. Bradley to Paul King, at Detroit, reads:

* * * I tried to get the other Charlotte paper to-day but he turned me cold.

J. B. BRADLEY.

A witness by the name of E. C. Goodman (record, p. 890, and bill of exceptions, p. 538), a newspaper owner in Oscoda County, who was made secretary of the local Newberry county committee, testified:

He said that with the $100 we paid for advertising in my paper, one display advertisement and one reading notice marked advertising, and I also used my editorial column. He said I received a total of $170; the other $70 came from Detroit. * * * He stated that his advertising amounted to about $188 and that he had a circulation of his paper of about 900 copies weekly. He said the advertising ran throughout the entire campaign. He said that after his transaction with Prescott he entered into a contract with the Newberry senatorial committee—that is, for the advertising; that out of the $170 his expenses were paid; * * * that he went to Roscommon, and cost about $10 on that trip, and he went there to interview the editor of the paper in that town, but that the editor had already been taken care of.

A man by the name of Toaffer (bill of exceptions, p. 532), testified as follows:

I live in Detroit and am advertising man for the Abend Post, a German daily paper. During the 1918 primary the Abend Post carried Newberry readers—no display advertisement—only readers, written articles marked as advertising. * * * Our total bill for the Newberry advertising in the primary was $200. * * * I was shown this morning a certified copy of the Blair report. I did not discover the item there. * * * I received pay for that advertising from Mr. Oakman. * * * This advertising was not charged to the Newberry committee, but to Mr. Oakman.

That is a side issue.

John B. Mulder (bill of exceptions, p. 535) testified:

I live in Holland, Mich., where I publish the weekly newspaper called De Grandwet, published in the Holland language. I had an arrangement by which my paper published the Newberry advertising during the primary of 1918. * * * A part of this advertising was sent me by Mr. Hopkins. Mr. Floyd, of the Grand Rapids headquarters, had an arrangement for "readers." This reading matter which I call "readers" amounted to about sixty-odd dollars. I have looked through the report filed by Mr. Blair twice, but I could not find any name or the name of the paper. I received this $160.80 in different payments.

For advertising that was worth $60 at the regular rates.

I think one or two bills were sent to the committee just before the primaries. I received one payment in August, the balance of the payments in September.

George R. Murray (bill of exceptions, p. 195) testified:

I am the president of the Railway Men's Relief Association, whose headquarters are at Muskegon. * * * We publish a monthly magazine in connection with our work, of which I am the editor. * * * In the spring of 1918 I saw Mr. King and Mr. Floyd together at the headquarters of this relief association in Muskegon, where I had a conversation with them. They stated they were there in behalf of Mr. Newberry's candidacy for United States Senator, and they asked me if I was going to support Mr. Newberry, and I told them yes. They asked me if there was anything I could do to help to get the railroad men lined up for him, and I assured them I would give them my support. * * * Before leaving they said anything I could do along the line they would take care of me. Later I was given $300 for attending meetings, and then incidental expenses, such as postage and mailing out the Relief Signals. This $300 included the incidental expenses. * * * I got no money from Floyd beside the $300; $400 was paid to the magazine that we published. * * * In the month of July a display advertisement was published in this railway men's relief magazine, and then in the month of August there was a personal letter direct from me to the railroad men. There were no other display advertisements besides the one month of July. I think our bill for the one display in July was $150.

And so on, and so on. I refrain from reading further; but it is perfectly evident from all of this that the advertising was a mere cover for the purchase of the editorial influence of the paper.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has read a list, which might have been much longer, of money that was paid to newspapers for advertising. The report shows that out of the whole expense more than three-fourths of the money was paid to newspapers for advertising. The Senator has shown that the first and only time the matter came up to anyone in control he said that he would not buy the editorial policy of a paper; that paper or any other. I submit to the Senator that any attempt to deduce or infer or suspect because newspapers sold their advertising space that they thereby became corrupted is unwarranted, and that there is not the slightest evidence in this record to show the purchase of newspaper editorial policy.

[Mr. TRAMMELL addressed the Senate. After having spoken for nearly an hour he yielded the floor for the day.]

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator from Missouri going to move to adjourn?

Mr. SPENCER. I was going to move to adjourn, but I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not care to have it read, but I should like to have inserted in the RECORD an article which appears in the New York Herald of this morning, which is entitled "Senator Newberry's opportunity." The New York Herald is a great Republican newspaper and has indorsed the policies of the administration. The editorial which I desire inserted is very illuminating.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator will be granted.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

SENATOR NEWBERRY'S OPPORTUNITY.

The United States Senate, which by virtue of the Constitution is the judge of the election and qualifications of its Members, is expected within a few days to come to a vote on the question of whether Truman H. Newberry, of Michigan, who defeated Henry Ford in the election of 1918, is to retain his seat.

To some statesmen and newspapers this matter appears in the light of a considerable issue within the Republican Party. Others regard it as an issue chiefly of importance to the Senate itself.

Both of these angles may be visible to Senator Newberry; probably they are. But there is a third and very important angle, and this is the issue between Senator Newberry and himself.

Putting aside the honesty or falsity of the charges of corrupt practices which were made against the Newberry campaign and assuming that Senator Newberry was personally guiltless of any conscious violation of law or ethics, the fact remains that Ford's persistent charges for three years have raised the Newberry case to the dignity of a real issue.

The case has reached a stage when, no matter what the weight of evidence for or against, the vote in the Senate will be regarded as a political vote.

Under those circumstances, even if Senator Newberry's right to his seat should be sustained by the Senate, he would inevitably be handicapped by the incessant war that has been made on him for the last three years. The very fact that he is a member of the political party dominant in the Senate would be a matter of embarrassment.

Some of the best friends of Senator Newberry, jealous for the preservation of the good record he made in his country's service, believe that under the circumstances it would be the brave thing and the wise thing for him to resign his seat and submit his case to the people of the State of Michigan by standing for reelection.

In that course lies the only way to that clear-cut vindication which a man of Truman Newberry's character must desire far more than he desires mere continuance in the Senate.

MOTION-PICTURE INDUSTRY IN POLITICS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, one of the most powerful influences in America is the motion-picture industry. I do not know how many billions of dollars are now invested in it, but the sum is very large. Hundreds of thousands of men and women are employed in it. It touches every part of the United States and its influence is second only to the press. It has grown by leaps and bounds. Persons have entered into it, at first making only small salaries, who now receive, in some instances, hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. It is a popular industry. Old men and old women attend "the movies" in order that they may be inspired and amused. Young children go, so that they may not only be amused but educated in current events. That industry, so far as I know, has never entered politics. Censorship has been attempted to be imposed in various States—censorship in one form or another—but the industry has been reckoned to be clean, and has not attempted to control elections, and, so far as I know, has held itself aloof from even the suggestion of playing politics.

I read the other day with a great deal of interest and some disappointment an article stating that one of the great leaders of the dominant party in this Chamber has been offered a place, or that he is considering a place—whether it was offered or whether it was sought I do not know—by means of which he is to be at the head of the whole motion-picture industry of this country, and is to receive a salary, some papers said, of $100,000 a year, others $150,000 a year.

In yesterday morning's Post I read this. It is headed:

HAYS IS TO ANSWER FILM OFFER JANUARY 14.

"It is not true," the Postmaster General said. "There is nothing further to add to my statement made in New York last Monday, and there is no change in the situation as then indicated."

Mr. Hays, on that occasion, admitted he had received a business and legal offer from the moving-picture people, but added that he could not give the matter the thought and consideration it deserved. He said, however, that he would meet the moving-picture representatives in Washington January 14 and announce his decision. Until then the Postmaster General will have nothing to say about his remaining in the Cabinet.

It is believed, however, that Mr. Hays will retire from his present position to become the general arbiter of the associated motion-picture companies, and their business and policy director.

Their business and policy director!

The Postmaster General, it is understood, has made known to the President that he has under consideration the offer made by the motion-picture industries.

Mr. President, if the United States Steel Corporation or the American Woolen Co. should come to Washington and make an offer of one hundred or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year to one of the Cabinet members to direct its policies, and he should accept it, not only would the person accepting it be condemned, but the administration to which he belonged would be reprimanded. It was not long ago when the baseball trust, so to speak—and I have no fault to find with them, because I am a baseball fan—invaded the bench and offered some fabulous sum to a judge to play the part of an arbiter and policy director. Now, why is Mr. Hays selected by the motion-picture industry to be its policy director and to receive therefore such a fabulous sum? What is the purpose of the motion-picture industry in making him this tender and entering into a contract for that sum?

Is it because he is close to the "powers that be?" Is it because he to-day controls the mails and four or five hundred thousand post offices throughout the country? Is it because he has the ear of the President of the United States, and sits in the family circle determining administration policies? Is it because he helped to elect the Republican House of Representatives, whose duty it is to consider censorship legislation and to frame the tax and tariff laws? Is it because he played such a large part in the selection of Senators who control policies and pass legislation for the administration in this body?

I know not what influenced the motion-picture industry, after scanning the whole country, to choose as the most qualified man in it for its head the present Postmaster General.

Accept? Why, of course he is going to accept. He is now receiving $12,000 a year. It is to be increased through this offer, as some say, $138,000 a year. I imagine that they are not offering it because they want the Postmaster General to play as a motion-picture star and show himself on the screen with Doug. Fairbanks or Fatty Arbuckle or Mary Pickford. I have never heard of his talents along that line. They have chosen him because they think he can do their work.

It is not because of any exceptional ability along business lines that the Postmaster General may have shown in the past. It is not because they think he can exert more influence than anyone else in the United States in elevating the motion-picture industry to a higher standard of morals. No, Mr. President, those are not the reasons that have prompted the motion-picture industry to make this very tempting offer to Mr. Hays.

More significance attaches to the offer being made to the Postmaster General than it would be to any other Cabinet official. It would be wrong, and should be condemned, if it were made to Mr. Hughes or to Mr. Weeks or to any other of the Cabinet members; but more so for Mr. Hays. He is the politician of the President's Cabinet. He came into prominence because of his qualifications as an organizer and an astute politician of rare force and energy. He is the late chairman of the Republican national committee; and it was under him that the Republicans obtained control of the House and Senate three years ago.

Mr. President, many questions come up in the Senate and in the House that affect the motion-picture industry. It was only recently that the question of imposing a tax upon entrance into motion-picture shows was discussed and acted upon in this body. That tax was removed. There is now before the Finance Committee of the Senate the question of imposing a tariff or retaining a tariff upon films imported into this country. The Federal Trade Commission is now threatening an investigation into some of the motion-picture concerns. Is it because the motion-picture industry might have a weather eye out on that tariff proposition or the Federal Trade Commission's investigation and they think that he might be influential because of his closeness to certain Senators here, or to Representatives in the other body, or to certain members of the Federal Trade Commission, or to the present President of the United States, that he is selected?

It is currently rumored that we are going to have another tax bill. So many people, so many Members here, are disgusted with the recent one that was passed that now they say we will have a supplemental tax bill; and the question of the imposition of taxes on the motion-picture industry may come up in the consideration of that bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Gladly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. While the Senator is in the field of speculation, he might also speculate why it was that the same industry selected Mr. William G. McAdoo, took him out of the Treasury Department, and put him in a similar position—the man who was son-in-law of the then President of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator would ask that question. The Senator knows that Mr. McAdoo resigned the office of Secretary of the Treasury because he said that he could not make a living on the salary that was paid him. He had given some of his best years to the public service, and he felt it was his duty to self and family to retire and practice his profession. It was after he had resigned as Secretary of the Treasury that the offer came to him as an attorney to represent four persons in the motion-picture industry. I forget those four—Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford and two others. This, however, is quite a different case. Mr. McAdoo had resigned as Secretary of the Treasury and had started the practice of law when the offer came to him; and he represented only four actors in the industry.

Here is a Cabinet member who now sits around the table advising and promoting the policies of the administration, an ex-chairman of the Republican national committee, who is dickering with these motion-picture industries to enter into a contract for $100,000 or $150,000, to represent not four actors or actresses in the industry but all the amalgamated interests of the motion-picture industry. He is to be the head of every motion-picture concern in the country that belongs to the motion-picture organization. His will will be the law, just the same as Judge Landis's will is now the law in baseball. He will direct the policies of the industry.

Mr. President, I believe that the motion-picture people are taking a very false step. They are deceived. Their movement is prompted by bad advice. If Mr. Hays wants to resign his place because of the small salary that is coming to him, in order to take this very remunerative offer, that is all right. That is a matter for Mr. Hays to decide; but when the motion-picture industry attempts to procure as its head the biggest politician in the Republican Party we on this side must look upon it with suspicion.

I know the adroitness of this man. I know that he is smart and he is a good organizer; but as one of the minority party who has very much desired to see the motion-picture industry kept out of politics and exert its influence for high morals and good government, I regret to see it employ a man who, they think, can control the Republican majority in the Senate and the House and the administration in the White House and thereby obtain favorable legislation. May I suggest to this great industry that the party in power is of short duration, and so far as the House is concerned you will have need to get rid of Mr. Hays after the coming election?

I am not unmindful of the fact that Hays when he came in as Postmaster General removed and condemned censorship.

As an official, he may have thought that was a correct policy; but I am a little bit fearful, if he becomes the head of the great motion-picture industry, that he will believe in employing a censorship against the Democratic Party that will react against the industry and meet the condemnation of its patrons.

Why, when you go into one of the motion-picture houses now, and they throw the face of the present President of the United States on the screen, people hang their heads in disgust; but when they throw on the screen the picture of that man whom you criticized, condemned, and maligned, that one who is rapidly coming back in the high respect and esteem of the people, the applause in the theater is so deafening that the rafters shake and the building trembles. It may be that Mr. Hays, should he become director, might desire to change his policy of censorship and invoke censure against such exhibitions. If they think that Mr. Hays can be of great force and influence down in some States or over in some States or up in some States that are controlled by Democratic legislatures in preventing censorship or modifying censorship they are just mistaken. This man has not the influence that the motion-picture industry thinks he has. Why, you Senators are sore at him because he to some degree has winked at civil-service requirements in the selection of postmasters. There is a big howl in the Republican cloakroom at the other end of the Capitol over the way he is selecting postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; gladly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Mississippi desire to leave the impression that under the present administration postmasters are being selected according to civil-service rules and regulations?

Mr. HARRISON. Indeed, I do not. They are working the thing around so that if it is possible they can get a Republican in; but they are trying to tell the civil-service people in a hypocritical way—the same tactics that they have always employed—that they have some kind of civil service, but the kind Mr. Hays has imposed is not satisfactory to any Senator nor to Republican Congressmen generally.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield further for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does not the Senator from Mississippi know that under the Executive order issued by President Harding the President is at liberty to select any one of the highest three on the eligible list, and that in many instances persons who have not, under the examination, succeeded in getting on the eligible list have been arbitrarily declared or made eligible, either by a change of the rating or by some other process, and appointed?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I think, in fact I know, that there is instance after instance of that being shown.

Mr. President, I have nothing more to say about this matter now. I had hoped that this great industry, which we are all glad has developed and succeeded so well and which when conducted on high moral ground and free from politics, rendered a high source of amusement, education, and service to the people, would continue aloof from politics. I am sorry to see them now begin to enter the Cabinet and procure one of the Cabinet members and ex-chairman of the Republican campaign committee to mold and direct its policies. If this is the beginning of any such policy, then I serve notice that we watch their step and see to it that public opinion will rise up and disapprove such methods.

POPULATION AND SELECTIVE DRAFT STATISTICS.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, in the interval since adjournment last night I have given myself the pleasure of reading the speech delivered by the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], in the course of which I notice that he expressed the hope that I had listened to him. I wish to assure him that I did, and to assure him further that I never leave the theater when the star comedian holds the floor.

I also wish to compliment the Senator upon the high average literary quality of his speech, largely made up of quotations from my oral utterances and from the writings of Henry Lincoln Johnson; but particularly I wish to call attention to the challenge which the Senator made to me regarding a statement which I had made here some days previously to the effect that the last administration had increased the population in Northern or Republican States and had decreased the population in Southern or Democratic States for the purposes of the conscription law.

I hope the time will never come in this body or elsewhere when I shall be making unsupported statements. I have gone to the official record, and I wish to say now that in January, 1917, the Census Bureau under the last administration compiled for public information a careful estimate of the population of the several States. In July, 1917, it issued an entirely different estimate of population as the basis for the conscription law. I have had these figures tabulated and ask that they may be printed in the RECORD. I will not comment upon them. They tell their own story.

It is sufficient to say that according to these official figures of the estimate of population put out by the Census Bureau in January, 1917, and the estimate put out by the same bureau for purposes of conscription in July, 1917, 14 Southern States benefited by a decrease in population of 3,716,000, while 14 Northern and Western States suffered through an increase of 5,970,000.

I commend the study of the table to the Senator from Arkansas, who challenged my statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 9, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, Thou hast continued to us Thy mercies. We are here the recipients of Thy goodness. As the day opens before us with its responsibilities, we ask the guidance of Thy Spirit and Thy help in all the decisions that may be rendered. So direct the affairs of our country that the highest welfare of the people may be conserved and the glory of Thy name advanced among us. We ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY, a Senator from the State of Michigan, appeared in his seat to-day.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

REPORT OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting, pursuant to law, his annual report for the year ended October 31, 1921, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 2914. An act to add certain lands to Minidoka National Forest;

H. R. 5700. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old Subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.;

H. R. 6380. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended;

H. R. 7204. An act to provide a Government-owned water-service system for the Fort Monroe Military Reservation;

H. R. 8344. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes;

H. R. 8401. An act to transfer the custody and control of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department; and

H. R. 9021. An act to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America.

HOSPITAL TREATMENT OF EX-SERVICE MEN IN THE SOUTHWEST.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have within the past year addressed the Senate a number of times, pointing out the necessity for additional hospitalization of ex-service men who are now and for a year past have been pouring into the Southwest trying to find relief from tuberculosis in the hope that in the Southwest the progress of their disease may be arrested. I have delivered and certainly I have received some hard blows in my contest to secure proper hospitalization for these ex-service men. Inasmuch as my charges against the Public Health Service and the Veterans' Bureau were made here on the Senate floor, it would be contemptible in me to suppress or conceal the reply or decision of the Veterans' Bureau on this subject. Although I am not in accord with all the views expressed in this letter or reply, nevertheless, out of a spirit of fairness, which should characterize our contest, I ask unanimous consent that the letter from Mr. C. R. Forbes, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the subject matter of the letter is evidently important; but if the letter is a long one, I ask the Senator from Arizona to consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well. I ask that it be printed in the ordinary 8-point RECORD type without reading at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 6, 1922.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: The policy of the United States Veterans' Bureau as to the treatment of its beneficiaries in the State of Arizona suffering from tuberculosis is depicted in the following paragraphs:

A brief presentation of some of the statistics and facts on which the policy is predicated is obviously essential to proper understanding of the problem; these will now be reviewed. December 15, 1921, 11,947 beneficiaries of this bureau were being hospitalized on account of tuberculosis; of this number, 987 were in hospitals in Arizona, in round numbers 8 per cent of the total. Approximately 11,500 men were accepted for service in the World War from the State of Arizona, or about three-tenths of 1 per cent of the total accepted.

The medical profession has recognized for a number of years that many cases of tuberculosis, particularly incipient ones, convalesce promptly in the dry and elevated regions of Arizona. This view became so prevalent, even among the laity, that thousands of invalids have yearly hastened to the Southwest oblivious or ignorant of the fact that many other factors, as proper medical supervision, adequate facilities, especially as to rest, food, nursing attention, etc., were equally if not more important than climate in promoting a cure.

It is now an accepted view of the National Tuberculosis Association and most tuberculosis specialists that under proper medical supervision and adequate facilities as to food, nursing, sanatorium care, etc., equally good results can be obtained in many States of the Union as in the Southwest with the majority of tuberculous invalids.

Out of deference to the opinions of the above-mentioned high authorities and in order to obtain the manifest advantages of hospitalizing as many patients as close to their homes as possible, the bureau is now operating or has under construction 10 hospitals east of the Mississippi River.

A large tuberculosis hospital is now being operated at Whipple Barracks, Arizona, by the United States Public Health Service for this bureau. December 15 there were 631 patients and 131 vacant beds in this institution. Upon the completion of the extension now under way, it will accommodate close to 1,100. About 250 patients are also in a more or less temporary hospital at Tucson and over 100 patients are in contract hospitals in the State. These figures are of December 15, 1921.

At the present time over 2,300 vacant beds exist in Government tuberculosis hospitals throughout the United States. At the same time, there are still more than 3,000 in contract hospitals.

In the spring we estimate that over 3,000 additional beds will be available in tuberculosis hospitals, of which 422 will be at Whipple Barracks, 250 in New Mexico. Six hundred additional beds have just been made available at the Fitzsimons General Hospital, Denver, Colo. We believe this program will satisfactorily provide for the 1,000 beneficiaries of the bureau said to be now in Arizona, who have not yet been hospitalized.

In view of the above, we do not believe it wise or expedient to buy or construct additional hospitals in Arizona at this time. Should the need be shown to warrant it later I would advocate further additions to the already existing hospital at Prescott.

It is the opinion of this bureau, a view concurred in by the National Tuberculosis Association, that the cities of Tucson and Phoenix are not desirable sites for tuberculosis hospitals. On the other hand, the climate of Prescott is admirable for such purposes. This stand is strongly supported by meteorological data obtained from the United States Weather Bureau which shows that the average maximum temperature at Phoenix, Ariz., annually is as follows:

April	81
May	89
June	100.6
July	100.4
August	100.8
September	96.4
October	85.4

The mean maximum temperature even in January is 64. The highest temperatures reported by months are, as follows:

January	81
February	91
March	94
April	102
May	114
June	116
July	117
August	113
September	112
October	105
November	92
December	80

Average for the year, 83.5.

The same source of information shows that during the hottest months of the year at Phoenix, Ariz., namely, May, June, July, August, September, and October, the temperatures are much lower at Prescott, Ariz. I contrast the temperatures for these months at these two places in tabular form for the purpose of comparison:

	May.	June.	July.	August.	September.	October.	Annual average.
Phoenix	89	100.6	102.4	100.8	96.4	85.4	83.5
Prescott	57.4	66	72.7	70.7	63.9	53.9	52.7

Great heat is absolutely detrimental to the favorable treatment of tuberculosis. Therefore there is no question that the climate of Prescott, plus its elevation, is infinitely superior to that of Phoenix for the treatment of tuberculosis.

The elevation at Prescott, Ariz., is 5,320 feet.

The elevation at Phoenix, Ariz., is 1,108 feet.

It is obvious from the above that if additional hospital facilities are provided at Phoenix or Tucson an equal number of beds should be furnished at more suitable sites during the hot summer months—in brief, duplicate institutions. This policy would also involve expenses incident to closing or materially curtailing hospital activities at one place during the summer and at another during the winter, as well as heavy transportation charges for patients and personnel between the points involved.

The bureau stands ready to transport any of its claimants suffering from tuberculosis who may require hospital treatment now in Arizona either to Prescott, Ariz., to Denver, Colo., or to Camp Kearney, San Diego, Calif., where there are available beds in Government hospitals, and to provide necessary attendants to care for those who require such assistance.

From the foregoing you will see that there is no justification for providing additional hospital facilities either at Tucson or Phoenix, Ariz. When the bureau offers to transport claimants of the bureau to modern well-equipped tuberculosis sanatoria located at points climatically suitable for the treatment of tuberculosis I do not believe that it is right or the intention of Congress that Government money should be expended in the construction or purchase of hospitals at points unsuited for the care of such patients simply because the patients themselves desire to have the facilities furnished to them at the places which they happen to have chosen as suitable for the treatment of their disabilities in their own opinions.

The bureau in its desire to provide proper care for the beneficiaries of this bureau seeks and has sought the best professional advice obtainable in the country, and its policies in this respect are indorsed by the National Tuberculosis Association.

Your activity in presenting to this bureau the needs of its claimants residing in Arizona as you see them is fully appreciated. The reasons given herein are those which have convinced me that my original statement to you that I desired to purchase the Deaconess Hospital, Phoenix, Ariz., had not been given sufficiently careful consideration by me.

It is hoped that what I have said in this letter presents the subject to you in such a way that it will also convince you that the action of the bureau is correct in this respect.

Very truly, yours,

C. R. FORBES,
Director United States Veterans' Bureau.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution adopted by the Commercial Club of the city of Sheridan, Wyo., protesting against the proposed removal of the Forest Service from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior or to any other department, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Wilder, Idaho, and vicinity, December 19, 1921, favoring the enactment of Senate bill 2604, the so-called Ladd honest money bill, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Chico, Calif., remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 1948, providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Current Events Section of the Town and Country Club, of Woodland, Yolo County, and the executive board, First District California Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations, of South Pasadena, both in the State of California, favoring the enactment of legislation to create a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the California Cattlemen's Association, of San Francisco, Calif., protesting against transfer of the Forest Service from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Presidio Parlor, No. 194, Native Sons of the Golden West, of San Francisco, Calif., favoring the establishment of a naval base at Alameda, Calif., which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the San Diego Natural History Society, of San Diego, Calif., favoring the enactment of legislation providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, game refuges and breeding grounds for migratory birds, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of sundry members of Wadsworth Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Middletown, Conn., praying for the passage of Senate bill 1967, proposing to make a national military park at Yorktown, Va., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by employees of the William L. Gilbert Clock Co., of Winsted, and the American Fabrics Co., of Bridgeport, both in the State of Connecticut, favoring inclusion of the American valuation plan in the permanent tariff bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Fowler & Huntling Co. (Inc.), of Hartford Conn., protesting against the proposed increased rates of import duties on shelled almonds, shelled walnuts, and shelled filberts as contained in the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by members of Wheeler-Young Post, No. 201, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the the United States, of Waterbury, Conn., favoring removal from office of Dr. Edmund Spicer, United States Public Health (reserve) officer in Waterbury, Conn., and the appointment of a local physician qualified to hold the office and sympathetic with the needs of ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Walter J. Smith Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of New Britain, Conn., praying for the enactment of the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented three telegrams in the nature of memorials from the Connecticut Department, American Legion; David E. Fitzgerald, mayor; and the Connecticut State tuberculosis commission, all of New Haven, Conn., protesting against the proposed transfer of reserve officers, United States Public Health Service, to civilian status, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry members of Wadsworth Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Middletown, Conn., protesting against the proposed dispossession of Mojave-Apache Indians from their reservation in the Verde Valley, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Employers' Association of New Haven County, of New Haven, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office so as to more adequately safeguard the issuance of patents, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the committee on forests and parks by the Connecticut State Chamber of Commerce, the New Haven Chamber of Commerce, and the Connecticut Forestry Association, of New Haven, all in the State of Connecticut, protesting against the proposed transfer of the United States Forest Service from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2736) providing for the conveyance to the town of Marblehead, in the State of Massachusetts, of Fort Sewall Military Reservation for public use, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 392) thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which had been referred the following bills, asked to be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which was agreed to:

A bill (S. 2689) making additional appropriation for improvement of the channel from Clearwater Harbor through Boca Ceiga Bay to Tampa Bay, Fla.; and

A bill (S. 2699) providing for a lightship at Grays Harbor.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 140) for the relief of Peter Shell, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 393) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2498) to correct the military record of Alonzo C. Shekell, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 394) thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2810) to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, as amended and reenacted by an act approved the 22d day of August, 1914, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2319) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, which was agreed to.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 994) for the relief of Henry von Hess, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

INVESTIGATION OF EXAMINING DIVISION, CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, with an amendment, the resolution (S. Res. 199) to appoint a special committee to investigate the proceedings of the Examining Division of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanmous consent for the present consideration of that resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to ask the Senator if it will take any time or lead to any debate?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it will require only a few moments to dispose of it. If the Senate proceeds to consider it and it appears that debate will result, I shall be glad to have it lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the information of the Senate, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A resolution (S. Res. 199), submitted by Mr. ROBINSON December 20, 1921, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, who shall be members of the Committee on Civil Service, be appointed by the President of the Senate, and the said committee is hereby authorized and instructed to investigate the proceedings of the Examining Division of the Civil Service Commission, and particularly to ascertain whether political influence has been used in said examinations and in the making and alteration of grades relating to the same, and whether the act of Congress giving preference to ex-service men in appointment to office under civil-service regulation has been observed and executed.

Said committee is empowered to sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as by it may be deemed advisable, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, and such clerical assistance as may be necessary. All expenses of the committee incurred under this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers authorized by the committee and signed by the chairman thereof.

Said committee shall report its proceedings and findings to the Senate within 90 days.

The committee reports the following amendment: After the word "documents," in line 16, page 1, insert:

Except those that have been received by the commission under pledge of confidence.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has explained to me the purpose and effect of the amendment which the committee proposes. I understand that it is suggested at the instance of the Committee on Civil Service or some of the members of that committee, and I shall be glad if the Senator from New York will make a brief explanation of the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I was occupied at the moment and do not quite understand how the resolution has been brought up at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asked unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which the Secretary has just read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Under the circumstances I feel constrained to object.

Mr. ROBINSON. It will only require perhaps one or two minutes more to dispose of the resolution. It has come before the Senate upon a report of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That committee has reported an amendment to which I have no objection. The entire resolution, with the amendment, will be disposed of in a moment, in my opinion. I have already stated that if it requires prolonged discussion I shall make no objection to the resolution lying on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know what the resolution is. I have no doubt that I shall not object to it, but I wish to understand it better. It will require some discussion, and I think in the present stage of affairs before the Senate this matter can certainly wait for a few days. I shall have to object to taking up any matter at this time which will lead to any debate. This resolution will require some explanation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. In view of the objection of the Senator from Michigan and in conformity with my statement made at the beginning, I ask that the resolution may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 2944) for the relief of Nelle S. McDonough (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2945) to enlarge the United States post office at Laramie, Wyo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2946) for the relief of D. C. Darroch; and

A bill (S. 2947) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense and for other purposes," approved June 4, 1920; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 2948) to appropriate money for the erection and equipment of a Government hospital for disabled former service men at Elkhorn Hot Springs, in Beaverhead County, Mont.; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2949) granting an increase of pension to Lucious O. House; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2950) to authorize the establishment of a game sanctuary within the Wasatch National Forest, Utah; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

A bill (S. 2951) for the relief of the Uintah and White River Tribes of Ute Indians of Utah; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SHORTRIDGE:

A bill (S. 2952) granting a pension to Ovid B. Orr; to the Committee on Pensions.

IMPROVEMENT OF SIUSLAW RIVER, OREG.

Mr. STANFIELD submitted an amendment proposing that $35,300 be authorized to be appropriated to improve the Siuslaw River, Oreg., Acme to entrance, in accordance with report submitted in House document No. 173, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2881) authorizing appropriations and contracts for the prosecution and maintenance of public works on canals, rivers, and harbors, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate resolution 172.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 172, submitted by Mr. SPENCER November 15, 1921, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan.

Mr. TRAMMELL resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on Saturday last. His entire speech is as follows:

Saturday, January 7, 1922.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to go into specific incidents of the use of money for the purpose of influencing the electorate; but I will state that upon a scrutiny of the record it will be found that money was used from the beginning to the conclusion of this campaign, not for the purpose merely of hiring people to do legitimate work as authorized by the statute but for the purpose of hiring and engaging them to go out and do work that was forbidden by the statutes of Michigan.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] says there was nothing wrong in morals or in law about the manner in which this campaign was conducted, and he gives it the stamp of his approval. Upon this question I disagree with the Senator from Missouri. The record discloses that it was wrong, according to my opinion, in law, and my conception of good morals convinces me that it was disgraceful in morals. I do not approve of the idea of those representing a candidate for office selecting some man in a community whose influence they desire, but who they understand is probably favorable to another candidate, and laying their plans with a view to obtaining his support, not by legitimate arguments in favor of the candidate they are supporting, not upon the basis of the principles and the policies which that candidate is advocating, but by a little shrewd piece of corruption.

This is about the way it was done in that campaign. The record is full of it, and I challenge the Senator from Missouri to deny it.

They picked out Mr. Brown, as an illustration, of a certain community. He was leaning toward Gov. Osborn for the Senate. "We have got to get Mr. Brown." One of these hirelings representing Mr. King, and Mr. King representing Mr. Newberry, goes to Mr. Brown and talks around a little with him. Mr. Brown says, "Well, I had been looking with a little favor upon Mr. Osborn." They discuss the matter a little more, and it has been heralded all around the community that "the lid is off" and "the sky is the limit," as stated by their man that they now want to repudiate, Mr. Cody. This hireling talks along with Mr. Brown a little while and says, "Of course we appreciate patriotic citizens. We appreciate the efforts of our friends. We will give you about $75 or $100 a week to go out and corrupt somebody else." They did not say "to go out and corrupt somebody else," but that was what it meant, or else practice deception upon their friends, as was practiced in a great many instances by nothing but hirelings, men whose influence had been bought. They were bought and paid for absolutely. So this fellow falls under the influence of the glittering dollars, and he decides that he will work for Newberry.

In some instances it was a man who was a secretary even of a fraternal organization. They go and buy him. He had not been leaning toward Mr. Newberry. He cared nothing for Mr. Newberry; but they go around there talking about money, $75 or $100 a week, and they buy him. They were buying everybody that they could buy in that campaign.

Then there was the man occupying a position of confidence in connection with some fraternal organizations. There are a number of them mentioned. After being bought in a rascally, scoundrelly, misrepresenting, and misleading way to those that are associated with him in that fraternal organization, he by deception goes out and represents that he is for Mr. Newberry, and writes letters appealing to them to support Mr. Newberry. Does the Senator from Missouri approve of any such conduct as that in good morals, whether it is against the law or not? The record is full of such corrupt methods.

The Newberry workers select a railroad man, an engineer who is prominent in his brotherhood. They go around and pay him about $50 a week for his influence. He draws his $50 a week, and goes ahead engaging in his usual work, and yet it is claimed that that is not using money for any illegal or any immoral purpose! It is using money to buy voters—that is what it is using it for—pure and simple.

King and other Newberry workers went to fraternities; they went to the ministry; they went into the official life of the State. They bought county officers. They were hiring them under some pretext or other, but the main object and purpose of the expenditure of the money was to buy their influence. That is the reason why rather rapid progress was made in this campaign.

I knew an old fellow once in my State, a very kindly and agreeably disposed man, who came into my office one day—this was just when I was starting out as a young lawyer—and said that he had been a local county officer. They seem to like to get hold of these fellows, you know, if they can. That seemed to be the way with them in Michigan. They wanted to get hold of all of them that they could. He said—this old man—"You know, for a while I felt disposed to support Mr. A." I said, "Well, he is a good man. I am glad you feel that way." Now, this actually occurred. This is no fiction. "But," he said, "do you know, I had a letter the other day," or else "I saw somebody"—I will not be sure as to that detail—"and he told me that if I would take my horse and buggy and drive down through the county and talk in the interest of Mr. B, and distribute literature for Mr. B, he would pay me $50 a week; and," he said, "I have decided that Mr. B is the best candidate." He said, "At first I thought Mr. A was the best man for the office, but I have been persuaded that Mr. B is the man who should be elected to this office." I said, "Yes; they have bought you. That is all there is to it. Now, if I were you, representing yourself and posing as an honorable man, I would tell those people that I would not sell my birthright for $50 a week—and that is what it means."

I am thankful to say that that practice never prevailed much in my State; but that was the common, customary, ordinary way of going out and buying people and getting men to represent the Newberry interests in this campaign.

We find that in some instances they had county judges, in some instances sheriffs, and in some instances State senators; and it is conspicuous in most or all of these instances, as far as the record discloses, that these men were not active until they had been persuaded by a pretty liberal contribution of the "long green"; yet they claim they were not trying to corrupt! Yet that is all in keeping with good morals—going out and spending money in that way. Not according to my idea.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], for whom I have a great deal of respect and whose friendship I appreciate, touched upon the question of the connection of this man Cody with the Newberry campaign and rather repudiated Mr. Cody. Now, I never saw or heard of Mr. Cody until I saw his name connected with this case. I do not know anything about him and I do not care anything about him; but the record discloses that Mr. Cody was the emissary of Mr. Newberry, who came to Washington first for the purpose of trying to get Mr. Hayden to become the campaign manager for Mr. Newberry. That is uncontradicted and undisputed by the testimony which was before the courts and which was before the investigating committee of the Senate. I will read, in order that it may again appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the testimony bearing upon that question.

On page 58 of the bill of exceptions Mr. Jay G. Hayden made the following statement:

> Just before Christmas I had a conversation with Mr. Cody in the press gallery of the United States Senate. Mr. Cody said that he came representing Truman H. Newberry. He said that Mr. Newberry was considering becoming a candidate for United States Senator. He said that he had told Mr. Newberry that I was the man that he should secure as campaign manager. He said Mr. Newberry told him that he did not know me, but that he would like to have him come and talk with George Miller, and if George Miller agreed with him to go and see him. Mr. Miller was at that time the Washington correspondent of the Detroit News and I was his associate in the office. Mr. Cody said that he had been to see Mr. Miller and that Mr. Miller had agreed that if they could get me I would be a good man for the job.

That testimony is uncontradicted—that Mr. Cody came here as the representative of Mr. Newberry, with a view to interesting and engaging or having Mr. Newberry engage Mr. Hayden as his campaign manager. The statement of Mr. Hayden is also corroborated by letters which passed between Mr. Newberry and Mr. George Miller. It seems that Mr. Newberry and Mr. Miller were old friends, having been associated together, I believe, in the Navy Department at a previous time. Right along about the same time Mr. Newberry wrote Mr. Miller here in Washington and told him that he had matters of a confidential and personal nature that he wanted to discuss with him, and the correspondence following the first letters demonstrated that it was the question of his candidacy for United States Senator that he desired to discuss. That was about Christmas of 1917, preceding the primary of August 27, 1918.

Mr. Hayden explains in the record, upon the page already referred to, that he did not want the job—that was his language—because it would be more or less of a temporary nature, and that he had seen some other newspaper men who had given up their newspaper connections and become campaign managers, and he did not think much of it. Hayden said that during this conversation—using his language:

> Mr. Cody at some time in the conversation mentioned the sum of $500 a month as compensation that might be paid me.

Now, understand, he had come here as a representative of Mr. Newberry, not as the representative of any committee. No committee was in existence at that time. There had been no committee organized, no committee suggested. Mr. Hayden further said:

> I don't know that Mr. Cody said anything specifically about money in the campaign during the conversation. He mentioned the fact that Mr. Newberry was very wealthy.

Some more moral persuasion!

> He, Mr. Cody, stated: "Mr. Newberry wanted me [Mr. Hayden] to come to New York to see him. * * * He said that Mr. Newberry wanted to advise with me respecting the campaign, whether I took the job or not; that they were not going to take 'No' for an answer; and that I would hear from him again."

That is the substance of the conversation between Mr. Cody and Mr. Hayden, Mr. Cody having visited here for the purpose of seeing Mr. Hayden and representing that he was here on behalf of Mr. Newberry.

Mr. Cody returned to New York, and on the next day after returning to New York, found on page 59 of the bill of exceptions, Hayden says—I am quoting from Hayden's testimony:

> On the last Friday of 1917 Mr. Cody called me on the telephone. He said that Mr. Newberry was tied up in his Navy job in New York and it was absolutely impossible for him to come to Washington and that he was very anxious to see me and asked me if I could not come over the following afternoon, Saturday afternoon, and see Mr. Newberry on Sunday. I finally told him I would come.

Hayden, according to his agreement, went to New York, and after spending part of the morning with Mr. Cody he then visited Mr. Newberry at Mr. Newberry's hotel; and he says that in the conversation there with Mr. Newberry, Mr. Newberry, in substance, made the following statement. M. Hayden says this, in substance, was the conversation:

> Mr. Newberry * * * said that I had been suggested to him as a man who should be associated with the campaign. He said he realized that the position for the mere term of the campaign was not very desirable, but that he expected that Theodore Roosevelt would be a candidate for President in 1920 and that he wanted to take a greater interest in politics than he had in the past for a period to and including that campaign and that he needed a political secretary to look after his interests. I told him, as I had told Mr. Cody, that I could not consider the proposition.

Then more or less conversation ensued and Mr. Newberry asked Mr. Hayden for suggestions, according to the statement of Mr. Hayden, which is uncontradicted. Mr. Hayden ventured one suggestion. On page 61 of the bill of exceptions Mr. Hayden said:

> I said to Mr. Newberry, "If you permit me to offer one word of personal advice, do not attempt to make a barrel campaign in Michigan."

It is rather significant that they keep thinking about the boodle campaign. They discussed that more or less and Mr. Newberry said that he, of course, did not agree with the idea, and specific reference was made in the conversation to approval not being given to a campaign in the nature of that which had been carried on in the Mitchel campaign in New York and the Herrick campaign in Ohio. I do not know which suggested the conversation on that particular point, but anyway they both agreed that they should not have a boodle campaign such as had been carried on in Mitchel's campaign in New York and Herrick's campaign in Ohio. A report of this conversation is found in the record at the page to which I have just referred.

I make specific mention of the Herrick campaign in Ohio and I will connect it up with a little more testimony just at this time. We find Mr. King, who was the campaign manager for Senator Newberry, engaged by him, called into the service by him, directed by him throughout the campaign and not by anybody else, in a letter which he addressed to Mr. Newberry on March 8, 1918, wrote as follows:

> I am going to Cleveland to-night for the purpose of talking with the man who successfully managed Herrick's campaign for the senatorial nomination under conditions very similar to ours, and I think I will be able to pick up some good pointers.

Only two months prior to this letter of King's, Mr. Newberry, in conversation with Mr. Hayden, who seemed to have an aversion to a money campaign or barrel campaign, as he described it, had joined with Mr. Hayden in expressions of condemnation of such a campaign, referring specifically to the Mitchel campaign in New York and the Herrick campaign in Ohio; but within 10 days or 2 weeks after King became the manager of Mr. Newberry, within 3 or 4 days after they had opened campaign headquarters, we find King, Newberry's campaign manager, hiking off to Cleveland, if you please, to see whom? To see some manager who had successfully managed the Herrick campaign for the primary nomination in Ohio. We witness King going to the very source to get his information that presumably his principal, Mr. Newberry, especially when talking to Mr. Hayden, had disapproved and had condemned.

I think King must have gotten some valuable information and some valuable pointers. He stated in the letter that "they were carrying on their campaign under similar conditions." I do not know anything in detail about the Herrick campaign or what was done by him, but evidently Mr. King thought he could get some very good pointers because the Herrick campaign and the Newberry campaign were carried on "under similar conditions." I have heard that there was a barrel of money turned loose in that Ohio campaign. I have heard that they employed workers scattered around over the State, and very likely there was a considerable similarity in the conditions surrounding the two cases and the expenditure of money. The Newberry campaign was a "boodle campaign" anyway. This is clearly established.

Did Mr. Newberry disapprove of the idea of his campaign manager, Mr. King, going to confer with the successful manager of the Herrick campaign, which Mr. Newberry had previously apparently disapproved? We have nothing to indicate his disapproval. Certainly Mr. Newberry cooperated with Mr. King and approved of the manner in which the Newberry campaign was conducted. In my opinion, from the record and the testimony of the witnesses, Mr. Newberry knew as well what Mr. King was doing as any candidate ever knew of the activities of and what was being done by his campaign manager. It is a reflection upon the intelligence of men of ordinary minds for the chairman of the subcommittee to suggest in his report that Mr. Newberry had nothing to do with this campaign and financing it or directing it or supervising it in any respect.

We find that Mr. Cody came here to see Mr. Hayden. Hayden suggested that he could see Mr. Newberry some time when he came to Washington. Immediately upon returning Cody found that Mr. Newberry did not want to come to Washington, could not come on account of his duties, so Mr. Cody called up Mr. Hayden the very next day after he had returned to New York and asked Mr. Hayden to come there to see Mr. Newberry, and he went there and saw him and had a conference, and the conversation, as heretofore related by me, took place at that time.

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] would seem to cast aside this man Cody as though they had not had anything particular to do with Cody. The testimony in the case shows that Cody was one of the close, bosom, confidential friends, personal and political, of Mr. Newberry, as far as this campaign is concerned, and I am surprised that the senior Senator from Michigan should come in here and repudiate him now. He was a mighty good man before the primary, but he does not count for very much now. I do not know whether Senator Newberry shares that view in regard to Mr. Cody or not; I do not know Mr. Cody myself.

Let us see whether he was a friend and representative of Mr. Newberry or not. I do not mean to attach too much importance to a question of this kind, but this argument and this character of logic is about the only kind that we have found in the speech of the senior Senator from Michigan in defense of his colleague, trying to make it appear that whatever Cody said did not amount to anything in particular because he was no particular friend of Mr. Newberry.

Cody was one of the men who went out in Michigan and reported back to Newberry, and he and Templeton suggested that they should have Paul King for campaign manager. In fact, it was Cody who first made the suggestion. It was Cody who arranged for the first conference with King. What did he have to do with that? The record states most emphatically, and it is the testimony of Mr. King himself, that when he went to New York for the purpose of seeing Mr. Newberry in regard to whether or not he would become the campaign manager, Mr. Cody and Mr. Newberry were the only two present except himself. So I think Cody did have something to do with the matter of assisting Mr. Newberry in arranging for his campaign manager.

The record further discloses that Mr. Cody, in so far as Mr. Hayden going to New York was concerned, had paid Hayden's hotel bills, returned him the money for his fare from Washington to New York, and had purchased a ticket for him to come back to Washington. So Mr. Cody seems to have been a very good man during the campaign.

Of course, I understand why the senior Senator from Michigan wishes to repudiate Mr. Cody now. It is because Mr. Cody had not been quite as successful as some had hoped he would be in keeping from the record some testimony which might be used against Mr. Newberry. Of course, there is nothing in the record to show that Mr. Cody is not still the good friend of Mr. Newberry that he was previously.

Furthermore, on this question of Cody, whom the Senator from Michigan claims was not representing Mr. Newberry—that is really the statement of the senior Senator from Michigan—the testimony absolutely contradicts what he had to say upon the subject. Let us see who it was by whom the order was placed for the service of the same clipping bureau that was furnishing clippings with regard to the campaign to Mr. Newberry.

We find in the record that Mr. Fred P. Smith, the confidential secretary of Senator Newberry and the whole Newberry family, addressed a letter to the clipping agency in New York, in which he requested that that agency furnish to Mr. Cody at his New York address the same clipping service which was being furnished to Mr. Newberry and that the bill for this service should be sent to Mr. Truman H. Newberry. That order was placed in that way. Now, if Mr. Cody was not in the confidence of Mr. Newberry and was not representing Mr. Newberry, why was it that they selected Mr. Cody to have him furnished with the same service from the clipping agency in New York that was being extended to Mr. Newberry?

Mr. Fred P. Smith also requested that the bill for this service should be sent to Lieut. Truman H. Newberry. Of course, we know why Mr. Smith requested that. Mr. Smith requested that because Mr. Newberry had asked him to request it. After the campaign was over we find in the record that Mr. Newberry, along about the latter part of August, sent a notice to this agency, stating that they should discontinue sending this service to Cody, "as per your bill number," giving the number of the bill. The campaign was over then and, of course, they had no further use for the clipping service. There is an abundance of evidence to show that Mr. Cody was really one of Mr. Newberry's right-hand men. There is no question about that.

The senior Senator from Michigan very touchingly spoke upon the question of having come to the United States Senate as a poor man, and that he would probably remain poor. I do not know whether he made the latter statement or not, but most of us who come here poor remain poor. This has been my experience, I am sure. I am very glad, indeed, that in the State of Michigan, at the time the distinguished senior Senator from that State aspired first to represent his State in the United States Senate, it was possible for a poor man to be elected to one of the highest offices within the gift of the people of his State.

But, Mr. President, if we are to approve of the conduct which brought about the nomination of Mr. Newberry in the case now before the Senate, then the door of opportunity to fill the highest office within the gift of the people, so far as it might otherwise stand ajar to the poor young men of the country, as the Senator said it did when he first was elected to the Senate, will have been closed and they will have no such opportunity.

In this campaign there were two hundred-odd thousand dollars expended. That much was proven to have been expended. What could a poor man do, especially if a new man in public life, running against that kind of a proposition? The Newberry organization looked out upon the field and they saw a county they wanted. They went out and hired people to work for them, presumably just hired them to work for them, and that is the way they influenced them.

If such methods are to control in our elections and if the Senate of the United States is to approve of a campaign conducted in such manner, no man in this country would be able to be elected to office unless he had a barrel of money and was willing to expend it for the purpose of corrupting the electorate.

I have always been very proud of the fact that I lived in a Republic where the youth of the land would grow up to young womanhood and young manhood with the hope and promise from the conditions which existed throughout the Nation that they might achieve success in the commercial world or that they might occupy prominent stations in civil life or in statesmanship, and that the question as to whether or not they should achieve such positions of eminence should not be governed by their ability to buy their way or to go out and purchase them.

Personally I feel kindly toward Senator Newberry, but I very much condemn the conduct of the campaign which made it possible for him to come to the Senate. In this instance I dare say that Mr. Newberry would never have been nominated had it not been for the excessive use of money in connection with his campaign. All the indications, however, were that it was fully realized by Mr. Newberry, Mr. King, and everybody else connected with the campaign that they had to spend a lot of money; that that was the only way they were going to get Mr. Newberry nominated for the Senate.

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] may think that a campaign of this character, in which money was expended in an amount of over $200,000 in order to obtain a seat in the United States Senate, is conducive to the perpetuation of the opportunity for the young manhood of this country to attain prominence in affairs of state, in the affairs of commerce, and in the social life of this country. He may think it will be encouraging to the poor man or even to the man of moderate means, but, so far as I am concerned, I consider it most destructive to the opportunity of those who are not so fortunate as to have wealth.

But, Mr. President, the question of the opportunity of a poor man or a rich man to get into the United States Senate is not the greatest one involved in this controversy. The great question is the preservation of the purity of our elections, the maintenance of our institutions, and of our form of free government. If we are going to make the dollar superior to manhood, if we are going to put offices up for purchase by the highest bidder, then this body and every other legislative body in the country will be dominated and controlled by the few who are able to buy their way into office if the policy approved by the Senate prevails. It will not long prevail, however, because the voters, a very large majority of whom are honest, will go to the polls and sweep out of public life those who believe in office buying.

If the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and the senior Senator from Michigan desire to approve of a policy which will lead to a condition of that kind, we have reached a parting of the ways on that particular subject.

There has been quite a good deal said here as to the relation of Mr. Ford to this contest. The Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the committee, in his opening speech delivered some weeks ago endeavored to excuse excessive expenditures made in the Newberry campaign by reason of the fact of Mr. Ford's candidacy. The Senator from Missouri said Mr. Ford was a man well known in Michigan and all over the country, that his name was a household word—I think that was probably the expression—and that Mr. Newberry, of course, when he went into the race knew that he labored under that handicap. If the facts had sustained such a contention as that, then, of course, it might have had a little more force, even if no merit, but the facts do not sustain any such contention. I can not approve of Mr. Newberry or any other man going out and spending money in the way in which he spent it in connection with his campaign, whether he was running against Mr. Ford, whose name was a household word, or against any other man. However, what are the facts? Mr. Newberry began his activities in connection with his aspirations to become a Senator of the United States States long before Mr. Ford's name was ever even mentioned. The Senators who think that they are going to take refuge behind the argument that it was necessary because Mr. Newberry was running against Mr. Ford to make these large expenditures are going to find themselves driven from that harbor of refuge.

I notice that one Senator has already given that as an excuse for his intended vote in an interview given some time ago to a newspaper in his home State. He used the line of argument that Mr. Newberry was running against Mr. Ford, and so on, but the people in his State are going to find out some day, if they have not already found it out, that, according to the evidence, Mr. Newberry was a candidate for the Senate, or he was carrying on his activities just as though he were a candidate, at least two and a half or three months before Mr. Ford's name was ever in anywise even mentioned in connection with the campaign. The record discloses that Mr. Newberry's idea and that of his campaign manager, Mr. Paul King, was to put on all steam and speed and pressure possible for the purpose of discouraging the candidacy of Gov. Osborn and also for the purpose of frightening Senator William Alden Smith, who was then in the Senate, and ex-Gov. Warner.

There were also two or three others whom they were interested in keeping out of the race. So we find in the correspondence of Mr. Newberry to Mr. King and of Mr. King to Mr. Newberry that they had an eye single at that time to bringing about such a condition as to discourage the candidacy of Gov. Osborn, a Republican, and the probable candidacy of William Alden Smith, a Republican; two or three others who were then mentioned, notably ex-Gov. Warner, who, the record discloses, had been governor of the State three times and was a Republican, not a Democrat. He was another one whom they were after and anxious to brush off the track. He was trying to get into the race, or there was some talk and some discussion, at any rate, of his doing so. Mr. Newberry and his managers were not thinking about Mr. Ford. There is no Senator who is going to vote to seat Senator Newberry who, if he will study the record, can defend or justify himself upon the contention that it was for the purpose of defeating Mr. Ford that this boodle campaign was carried on in the interest of Mr. Newberry. The Newberry campaign was under full headway for months before Ford's entrance. They had already spent $40,000 or $50,000 before the name of Mr. Ford was suggested; they had largely perfected their entire organization; they had made their plans for publicity through the newspapers at a cost which was at first estimated as being from $25,000 to $30,000. The record establishes the fact, and it is uncontroverted, that their publicity man had planned a series of campaign advertisements, covering a period of 13 weeks, which should be published in all the newspapers of the State, except Democratic newspapers; and such newspapers are very few in Michigan, I understand. That had all been done prior to the time that Mr. Ford's name was mentioned; prior to the time that Mr. Newberry or Mr. King either had given any thought or any consideration whatever to Mr. Ford, so far as the evidence discloses.

About the first evidence of any notice having been taken of Mr. Ford's candidacy was in letters passing between Mr. King and Mr. Newberry along during the first week or 10 days of April of that year. Mr. King in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Newberry said something about somebody trying to get Mr. Ford to run—I do not now remember the name of the person who was trying to get him to run—or that some company had proposed that he should run, or something to that effect. It did not frighten Mr. Newberry much. Mr. Newberry in reply said he did not give much thought or consideration to the question of Mr. Ford's candidacy.

Mr. Ford's probable candidacy, which was at that time just developing, did not seem to worry either one of them very much; but prior to that time the expenditures had begun; the barrel had been opened, and every pressure possible was being put forth to keep Gov. Warner out of the race, to keep William Alden Smith out of the race, to get a lead on Gov. Osborn. So the Senator who thinks that he can shelter himself under the idea that the expenditure of this money was made to defeat Ford, and that some people who do not like Ford would excuse him on that account, is going to find that the informed and intelligent public is going to ask the question, "When did these excessive expenditures begin? When did this plan of corrupting the electorate of Michigan begin? Was that corruption carried on only for the purpose of defeating Ford, whom some people dislike?" The Senator might say, "Yes; that seems to have been about the truth of it." But the questioner is going to say, "Yes; but if you read the testimony and study the case, you will find that Mr. Newberry's campaign was being carried on in that corrupt way long prior to the time when Mr. Ford's name was mentioned; you will find that they were expending excessive amounts; that they were buying up influence; that they were laying all the plans for spending a barrel of money not for the purpose of defeating Mr. Ford," for Mr. Ford was not known in the campaign at that time, but for the purpose of winning the nomination over Osborn, over Senator Smith, over ex-Gov. Warner, all of whom, so far as I know, stand very high in the State of Michigan. I have never heard of anything to indicate that all of them did not stand quite high in the State and very high in the Republican councils of the State of Michigan. So there is nothing in the excuse about the question of trying to defeat Ford. The alleged expenditure for the purpose of defeating Mr. Ford is not established, and if it was it should not receive the stamp of approval by this body. We should not vote to seat any man in the Senate whose election has been obtained by corrupt methods.

Monday, January 9, 1922.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, as I understand, the position of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which has recommended that Mr. Newberry shall be exonerated and that he shall retain his seat in the Senate, is that Mr. Newberry had no knowledge whatever of his campaign, either upon the question of financing it, in the matter of directing it, or in incurring the expenditures. That seems to be the contention of the majority of the committee, including its chairman, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], who addressed the Senate. I find on page 6 of the majority report this statement by the committee in its effort to exonerate Truman H. Newberry. The committee states:

> Truman H. Newberry was absent from the State of Michigan continuously during the entire campaign and until long after the election had been held. He took no part whatever either in the financial or other features of the primary campaign or its direction or control. Nor did he take any part in the general election.
> Forty-four witnesses were examined under oath by the committee in this hearing.
> The inevitable conclusion of all the testimony is that there is no evidence whatever to sustain the charge of improper use of money at the primary or the general election.

Mr. President, I submit that any fair-minded man, any man who does not desire to whitewash Truman H. Newberry, could never have written those words into this report if he had given any consideration to the testimony which was before the court which tried Mr. Newberry, and if he had given any consideration to the testimony which was presented before the Senate investigating committee. I will read that statement again. Its absurdity, its ridiculousness, its misleading quality should be called to the attention of the Senate and to the attention of the Nation. The report, as I stated, was presented by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and opens up with this bold, daring statement in defense of Mr. Newberry:

> Truman H. Newberry was absent from the State of Michigan continuously during the entire campaign and until long after the election had been held. He took no part whatever either in the financial or other features of the primary campaign or its direction or control. Nor did he take any part in the general election.
> The inevitable conclusion of all the testimony is that there is no evidence whatever to sustain the charge of improper use of money at the primary or the general election.

Mr. President, if the record establishes that the majority of the committee were in error when they took that position, then Mr. Newberry is not entitled to a seat in the Senate.

Another defense that is offered by those speaking in behalf of Mr. Newberry, and it is one which is rather inconsistent with this bold statement of the committee that Mr. Newberry had nothing to do with the campaign, is that if there were large and excessive amounts of money expended in that campaign, it was made necessary because Mr. Newberry was in a contest with the well-known Mr. Ford, whose name was a household word not only in Michigan but throughout the country. Mr. President, again I say that if the evidence produced at the trial and the evidence presented before the Senate committee disproves that such was the real motive and the real object and purpose of the excessive expenditures, then again those who are presenting Mr. Newberry's claim for exoneration fail in their contention.

I lay down two propositions in contradiction of the contention made by the majority of the committee: First, Mr. Newberry did take part in the campaign from beginning to end; second, that the evidence establishes that of the more than $200,000 that was expended in the campaign, a large part of it was corruptly and improperly expended.

In my opinion, the evidence establishes that Mr. Newberry knew all about his campaign, knew all about its management, knew all about the excessive expenditures; that he was the supreme power in directing the campaign; and that he participated in financing his campaign. I assert also that these excessive expenditures, this corrupting of many of the electors of Michigan and buying of influence had begun long before Mr. Ford's name was even suggested or considered in connection with the senatorship.

Let us consider for a few moments, Mr. President, Mr. Newberry's activities and his connection with the campaign. What is about the first written page upon that subject? We find, first, that prior to Christmas, 1917, Mr. Cody, a friend of Mr. Newberry, came to Washington as a representative of Mr. Newberry for the purpose of endeavoring to obtain Mr. Hayden as his campaign manager. The record proves and establishes beyond any question of doubt, and it has not been denied by anyone that Mr. Cody came here upon such a mission and that Mr. Cody came to this city as the representative of Mr. Newberry. I would not heckle Mr. Newberry, as has been suggested, when he comes before this body to make a statement to-day, but if he desires to deny that Mr. Cody came here as his representative, then in all courtesy I ask him when he addresses the Senate to-day to state whether or not Mr. Cody came here representing him upon that occasion.

Everyone knows that there could be no heckling about that; everyone knows that there is nothing improper or discourteous in an inquiry of that kind, which merely seeks to get at the very basic facts in connection with this case. So in all courtesy I ask Mr. Newberry when he comes before the Senate to state whether or not Mr. Cody was his representative when he came to Washington to see Mr. Hayden and told him that they desired to get him for Mr. Newberry's campaign manager. Of course, I know Senator Newberry is not going to deny that.

Why is he not going to deny it? Because there is conclusive evidence in the record to establish that he did send Mr. Cody here, and that Mr. Cody came representing him in the matter of trying to get Mr. Hayden for his campaign manager.

We find on page 640 of the bill of exceptions that Mr. Newberry, who was at that time in New York, under date of December 18, 1917, addressed this letter to Mr. George Miller, in Washington:

MY DEAR GEORGE: I am sure you will realize that my duty here absolutely prevents my getting to Washington, and as I can not see you in person, I am asking Mr. Fred Cody—

This is a letter, if you please, Senators, addressed by Mr. Newberry to his friend, Mr. Miller—

I am asking Mr. Fred Cody, who is going down to Washington, to have a talk with you on some confidential matters, and I am hoping that you have not as yet gone home on your Christmas vacation, so that you will arrange to meet him.

With kind regards, and wishing you all the compliments of the season.

Sincerely, yours,

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY.

That is the Mr. Cody that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] sought to impress upon the Senate was in nowise connected with Mr. Newberry, and he said, "Oh, well, he is rather a talkative fellow; rather a talkative fellow." That shows how much the senior Senator from Michigan knows about the record in this case. The record is full of evidence to show that Mr. Cody was connected with Mr. Newberry in this campaign.

Mr. Cody came just as Mr. Newberry said he would. He visited with Mr. Hayden. He visited with Mr. Miller. The evidence establishes that beyond question. What does Mr. Hayden say upon that subject?

Mr. Cody came here as the emissary of Mr. Newberry about Christmas of 1917 and saw Mr. Hayden for the purpose of getting Mr. Hayden to become Mr. Newberry's campaign manager. That is uncontradicted. We find, on page 58 of the bill of exceptions the testimony of Mr. J. G. Hayden, who testified as follows:

Just before Christmas I had a conversation with Mr. Cody in the press gallery of the United States Senate. Mr. Cody said that he came representing Truman H. Newberry. He said that Mr. Newberry was considering becoming a candidate for United States Senator. He said that he had told Mr. Newberry that I was the man that he should secure as campaign manager.

Then he goes on further about Mr. Newberry saying he did not know Mr. Hayden.

In the same testimony Mr. Hayden said Mr. Cody informed him as follows:

That he had been to see Mr. Miller, and that Mr. Miller had agreed that if they could get me, I would be a good man for the job.

Corroborating absolutely my position that when Mr. Newberry addressed this friend Miller, telling him that Cody was coming here upon confidential matters, he was sending him here for the specific purpose of conferring with Mr. Miller in regard to Mr. Hayden for his (Mr. Newberry's) campaign manager.

At that conference Mr. Hayden talked as though he could not take the management of the campaign, because it would be rather in the nature of a temporary appointment. Mr. Cody returned to New York. He reported to Mr. Newberry, because there was no one else to whom to report. There was no committee of any description at that time. He had come here as the representative of Mr. Newberry. Then, immediately, the next day after Mr. Cody left Washington and returned to New York, he called Mr. Hayden over the long-distance telephone and told him that Mr. Newberry would be unable to see Mr. Hayden in Washington, and that they desired him to come to New York.

It was on the Friday before Christmas that that communication took place by telephone. Mr. Hayden agreed that he would go to New York. He did go to New York. He had a conference with Mr. Newberry. If anyone on the committee wants to challenge that statement, let them show the proof that that is not positively the assertion in the evidence, uncontradicted in any respect.

Mr. Hayden discussed the matter with Mr. Newberry, and after some discussion he did not accept the management of the campaign. When Mr. Newberry found that he could not obtain him as campaign manager he then asked him for some of his ideas in regard to the campaign, and so forth, and the one note of warning that Mr. Hayden gave to Mr. Newberry was that he should not have a barrel campaign. Mr. Newberry acquiesced in the idea, and said that he did not think they ought to have a barrel campaign; and in that conversation he condemned such campaigns as the Mitchel campaign in New York and the Herrick campaign in Ohio. Mr. Hayden returned, and by his refusal of the offer Mr. Newberry had not succeeded in getting a campaign manager.

What is the next step showing the activities of Truman H. Newberry in his own behalf and in his own candidacy? Cody—this man Cody whom the senior Senator from Michigan would repudiate—is found out in Detroit in February. What is Mr. Cody doing in Detroit? Mr. Cody is in Detroit seeking to arrange to obtain Mr. Paul King as the campaign manager of Mr. Newberry. He arranges a conference with Mr. Paul King. To that conference Mr. Templeton, the business associate and partner of Mr. Truman H. Newberry, was invited.

Why do you suppose that Mr. Templeton was invited? He was invited because he was a business associate. He was invited because Mr. Newberry had told him, not very long before, that if he got into the campaign he wanted Mr. Templeton to be the manager of a business men's committee. So the conference was arranged. I shall read from the testimony touching upon that question.

I know that the reading of testimony and the quoting of evidence is rather tedious and wearisome, and I would not go to the extent that I am going to do in presenting this case along that line if it were not for the fact that Senators here representing the cause of Mr. Newberry like to shout that those who are opposed to Mr. Newberry's retaining his seat are not confining themselves to the facts. With all courtesy I say that the Senators who take that position are not confining themselves to the facts in connection with this case.

Here is the testimony of Mr. Templeton in regard to the first step initiating the employment of Mr. Paul King as campaign manager. I read from page 413 of the hearings, from the testimony of Mr. Templeton. Mr. Lucking was the lawyer propounding the interrogatories:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. How did you come to get into the committee? Who got you into it?

Mr. TEMPLETON. I think Mr. King made me general chairman. I never knew how it happened. The first I knew of it I saw my name in the letter book.

Think of that, will you. They are trying to make it appear that it was a voluntary committee, a committee of friends to carry on this campaign; and here the man who was put at the head of the committee as its chairman said he did not know how he got to be chairman, and the first that he knew of it was when his name appeared in the letter book. What have Senators to say who try to make it appear that this was a voluntary committee? Do you not think Mr. Templeton was drafted by some one? Do you not think it was merely a piece of fiction, and an effort to evade the law, that they ever had a so-called campaign committee?

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you not have something to do with getting him in?

He is referring now to Mr. Cody getting Mr. King as campaign manager.

Mr. TEMPLETON. I think I suggested that he would be a good man for the job.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you not see him in connection with it?

Mr. TEMPLETON. I saw him once in connection with it.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. With whom?

Mr. TEMPLETON. With Mr. Cody.

Mr. Cody being the same Mr. Cody who had come to Washington as the representative of Mr. Newberry for the purpose of trying to interest Mr. Hayden in becoming campaign manager for Mr. Newberry.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Fred Cody, of New York?

Mr. TEMPLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Who suggested to you that Paul King would be a good man?

Mr. TEMPLETON. I think Mr. Cody.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You personally did not know Mr. King before that, did you?

Mr. TEMPLETON. I had met him two or three times when he was receiver for the Pere Marquette.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Had you had anything to do with him in a political way at all?

Mr. TEMPLETON. Not at all.

That is what Mr. Templeton says about it. Mr. Templeton said that Mr. Cody came to Detroit, that he arranged a conference with Mr. Paul King, that he went to the conference and met the gentlemen at the hotel in Detroit, and that prior to that time he had had nothing at all to do with the campaign of Mr. Newberry. He afterwards qualified that by making this statement: He said that when he was in New York, a short while prior to that, Mr. Newberry had brought up the subject with him; and here is what Mr. Templeton said that Mr. Newberry stated, or his reference, at least, to their discussion of the matter. He says, in his statement on page 414 of the testimony, quoting from Mr. Newberry—that is, I am quoting from Mr. Templeton's testimony in regard to this conference—

He—

said, "If I should decide to go, I hope you will interest yourself in my candidacy." I said, "I do not know anything about politics. I would not know what to do. If you decide to run and there is anything that I can do to assist you, I would be glad to do it, as a business associate and a friend." He said if he decided to run he hoped

I would help, and I said, "In what way am I to be of assistance?" He said he was very anxious that if he should run to have a business man's campaign and that perhaps I would be willing to have a business man's committee in Detroit. I said if that was all there was to it, I saw no objection. That ended the conversation.

This took place a few weeks prior to February 20, 1918, when he and Mr. Cody saw Mr. King at the Statler Hotel in Detroit. I read a question asked by Mr. Lucking of Mr. Templeton, page 415:

Then, you and Cody sought to have King manage the campaign? Was that the idea?

Mr. TEMPLETON. I would not put it that way. I had nothing to do with it. But Mr. Cody invited me and Mr. King to come to the hotel. We met at the hotel and the suggestion was made, as I remember it, by Mr. Cody to Mr. King that he become active in the Newberry campaign, and I acquiesced.

How about your man Cody having nothing to do with this? Who was Mr. Cody? Mr. Cody was the man whom Mr. Newberry had sent out upon the very first mission in connection with this campaign. He was the man he had sent to Washington for the purpose of interviewing his close friend Miller in a confidential matter, and that matter was the question of obtaining Hayden for campaign manager. Cody was the man whom he had sent to Washington for the purpose of seeing Mr. Hayden as far back as during the Christmas season of 1917 in regard to becoming his campaign manager. He was still representing Mr. Newberry when he went to Detroit for the purpose of seeing Paul King and endeavoring to get him to become Mr. Newberry's campaign manager. If that is not true, in all courtesy I ask Mr. Newberry to state that it is not true when he appears upon the Senate floor to-day. I ask of Mr. Newberry to state whether or not he sent Mr. Cody out to Detroit, representing him, for the purpose of endeavoring to get Mr. Paul King to become his campaign manager.

Even a knave or a fool can get no other construction from the testimony in this case, and if it is not true I would like to have some light from Mr. Newberry upon that question.

What was the outcome of that conference in Detroit in which Mr. Cody importuned Mr. King to become Mr. Newberry's campaign manager? Within a very few days thereafter Mr. King went to New York to see Mr. Newberry. They met in New York; and who was present, corroborating the idea that Mr. Cody was representing Mr. Newberry? At that conference Mr. Cody, Mr. King, and Mr. Newberry were present, and no one else. None of this mysterious business men's committee were present. None of these people who were seeking to have honor thrust upon Mr. Newberry, and who wanted him to run for the Senate when he was in an apathetic and don't-care attitude, were present. Who was present? Mr. Cody, Mr. Newberry's confidential agent, who had come on that mission to Washington to get Mr. Hayden, and who had gone upon a similar mission to Detroit for the purpose of obtaining Mr. Paul King as his campaign manager.

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] would try to make it appear that Mr. Cody had nothing to do with the campaign. I would like to know what Mr. Cody was doing in Washington, what Mr. Cody was doing in Detroit, what Mr. Cody was doing in conference with Mr. Newberry in the important negotiations of the employment of his campaign manager, if he had nothing whatever to do with this campaign. The most important and vital question to be determined by a candidate, as far as his future success is concerned, is that of selecting a suitable and capable campaign manager.

As a result of that conference Mr. King became the campaign manager of Mr. Newberry, and only a very few days after he was in New York he entered upon his duties as campaign manager.

Mr. President, to show that Mr. Newberry was directing his own campaign, he not only started out with Mr. Cody as his representative for the purpose of carrying on the preliminary negotiations for the obtaining of a campaign manager, but all throughout the campaign Mr. Cody frequented his office, as is shown by the testimony. All during the campaign Mr. Cody was frequently found at his office with Mr. Newberry's campaign manager, King, having gone there for conferences. Mr. Cody was the one man who was so near to Mr. Newberry that Fred P. Smith, the confidential agent and attorney for Mr. Truman H. Newberry, had requested of the clipping bureau that he be furnished with the same newspaper clippings that were being furnished to Truman H. Newberry and that the bill for those clippings should be sent to Truman H. Newberry. I can cite the testimony showing that if necessary. Do not Senators think Cody was representing Mr. Newberry? Was not Mr. King Mr. Newberry's campaign manager? He unquestionably was. Furthermore, at the close of the campaign, Mr. Newberry himself notified the clipping agency to discontinue sending clippings to Mr. Cody "as per your bill number so-and-so."

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] tried to make it appear that Cody was not representing Mr. Newberry, that he was not in his confidence, that he was not one of his friends, and that he was not one of the moving spirits in connection with the campaign. Why did he want those clippings to go to Mr. Cody if Mr. Cody had nothing to do with it? Of course, the natural conclusion in the mind of any reasonable man would be that Mr. Cody and Mr. Newberry were in frequent conference and that Mr. Cody was assisting and furnishing suggestions in regard to the direction of Mr. Newberry's campaign, and for that reason Mr. Newberry wanted him well posted as to what was going on.

I never saw a case in which there was such effort to depart from the ordinary, natural conclusions and constructions which would be arrived at by sensible and fair-minded men, from the evidence, as there has been in this case. I say that courteously, but it is a fact, and anybody will see it if he will read the record and study the testimony in this case. Yet Senators talk about the men who are opposing this man holding his seat in the Senate being actuated by any principles other than those of the protection of their Government, the preservation of its institutions, and the stamping out of corrupt practices in connection with elections. That is the intimation that has been made by several who have spoken on the other side. I say, Mr. President, that it appears to me that the effort of those who are defending Mr. Newberry is to uphold an attempt to evade the law, uphold one of the most corrupt, one of the most brazen and bold endeavors to purchase a seat in the United States Senate that has ever been recorded in the annals of the political history of this country.

As for my part, I shall take my stand in opposition to them at the peril of being charged with being actuated with motives other than honest and patriotic and a desire to preserve my country, to preserve its institutions which were handed down to us by our immortal forefathers, and to perpetuate our system of free elections in the Nation.

Mr. President, Mr. Templeton also wired Mr. Newberry at the time Mr. Cody was in Detroit, and I ask to have that telegram inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Western Union Telegram.]

DETROIT, MICH., 13.

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Hotel Gotham, New York, N. Y.:

Have spent past two days in conference with Cody men from out in the State and city, and everyone thinks, including Frank Blair, that Paul King quite necessary. King will be in New York Saturday and Sunday this week; Mr. Blair next week. Report satisfactory progress.

A. A. TEMPLETON.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In view of the contention of those who are attempting to have Mr. Newberry retain his seat in the Senate, is it not rather strange that they would even have wired Mr. Newberry? Why did they wire Mr. Newberry, if his candidacy was thrust upon him? Why should they have wired him if this was the spontaneous efforts of his friends to bring him into a campaign?

That is not all. There is testimony to show that Paul King was obtained through the instrumentality of Mr. Cody, the representative of Mr. Newberry, and King himself testified. I ask to have his testimony printed in the RECORD at this point without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I went to New York to see him. When I got to New York I saw Commander Newberry and had a short conference with him at his apartment in the Hotel Gotham. Later he went to the Biltmore. Mr. Fred Cody, the commander, and I were present at the conference. Mr. Newberry met us at the door and shook hands, and he said, "Well, young man, I have not seen you since the day over in Bay City, when you made me sit on the church steps across the street from the armory." I said, "Well, that is quite a while ago; I had forgotten about it myself"—something of that kind. The conference, if you might call it that, was very brief. He was about to leave for the hospital to see Col. Roosevelt, who was ill. We discussed generalities, political conditions generally in Michigan, and Mr. Cody said that some of Commander Newberry's friends were anxious that he should be a candidate for United States Senate and that the matter had been mentioned to me, and that I was considering whether or not I would take an active part in the campaign, but that I wanted to know what Commander Newberry's personal feeling was toward myself individually before I decided the matter.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. King stated that Mr. Cody invited a Senator Scott, a State senator, and himself to the Statler Hotel in Detroit for a conference, that they went there for the conference, and that Mr. Cody mentioned the question of him becoming campaign manager for the Newberry campaign, and that they had dinner in Mr. Cody's room.

Mr. Cody was the representative of Mr. Truman Newberry in trying to obtain Mr. Hayden. He was his representative in obtaining Mr. Paul King. That was the outcome of the negotiations which he brought about.

We find, up to this point, that Mr. Newberry had taken the first step in his campaign. Those who like to talk about committees can not say that a committee had taken the first step in the campaign, because there was no committee at that time.

I challenge the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], who has been so earnest in his defense of Mr. Newberry, to point to the testimony, if there is any, disclosing that up to the time Mr. King was engaged as campaign manager there was any campaign committee whatever.

So whose agent was Mr. Paul King? Mr. Paul King was Mr. Newberry's agent. He had been secured by Mr. Newberry.

We find up to this stage of the campaign the conspicuous and outstanding figure in connection with it is Truman H. Newberry, the candidate himself, with Cody assisting him. Paul King returned from New York to Detroit and opened up campaign quarters there immediately. What were Mr. Paul King's assurances as to campaign funds? He did not know anything about that, if we believe Mr. Templeton, because what did they say on the question of campaign funds? That is a very significant phase of the evidence in this case, Senators.

The only evidence in regard to Paul King's claimed knowledge of the source from which the campaign fund was to be obtained was that Mr. Templeton told him that it was to be raised by the friends of Mr. Newberry. King said no one else had said anything to him about campaign funds. What did Mr. Templeton say on this subject? Mr. Templeton said most emphatically, when he was first questioned upon that subject, that he did not tell Mr. King that. That was his testimony. If it is not his testimony I desire to have some Senator when he speaks in behalf of Mr. Newberry refute it by facts contained in the record.

Then he began his explanation. When he found out that Mr. King had said that he was the man who told him they would get it through friends, Mr. Templeton said, "I do not remember anything about it whatever, but if Mr. King said I told him, I must have done it." Now, just think of that. He said, "I must have done it." Mr. Templeton was further questioned upon the subject, and those further inquiries developed the fact that he stated that if he did tell Mr. King that, he had no authority to tell him, and that nobody had told him that the friends of Mr. Newberry were going to finance the campaign. That is the evidence. He had not told him how they were going to finance it.

What is the situation with regard to financing the campaign? The only effort which Mr. King made to establish that he had any knowledge of where the funds were coming from for the campaign has been absolutely exploded by the testimony of his so-called campaign committee manager, Mr. Templeton. Of course, as reasonable men with average intelligence we would naturally believe that Mr. Templeton was talking with Mr. Newberry in New York prior to the time when King had been engaged to act for Mr. Newberry, the business friend and associate of Mr. Templeton, the personal friend of Mr. Templeton, who was importuning Mr. Templeton to become manager of his business committee. Mr. Newberry would very probably have imparted to his friend Templeton, whom he had asked to become manager, the fact that his friends were going to finance the campaign, if this was true, but Templeton said that no one ever told him that the friends of Newberry were going to finance the campaign.

Mr. King having been employed, he opened up campaign headquarters. Then the campaign manager began to connect up with the politicians and the people throughout Michigan. We find that from the beginning of the management of the campaign of Mr. Paul King for Mr. Truman H. Newberry to its conclusion Mr. Newberry was as intimately in touch with the campaign as it would be possible for any candidate to be in touch with his campaign. Does anyone say he knew nothing about it and had nothing to do with it? The record refutes that a thousand times.

One of the first things after he went out was to begin to address letters and telegrams to Mr. Newberry and make reports to Mr. Newberry, and Mr. Newberry communicated with him, and the whole situation was well in hand by Mr. Newberry from the day he engaged Mr. Paul King until the day next following the primary, when he began to send out his telegrams of thanks and congratulations to his friends, most of whom, according to the telegrams that are in the record, were the hired workers who had been employed by his organization. We find telegram after telegram in the record where Mr. Newberry, the very next day after the primary, said: "I wish to congratulate you upon the results in your county and to thank you for your noble work in my behalf," or something to that effect. There are many of these telegrams that were addressed to men who had been working for so much per month or per day, some of whom had been corrupted themselves and who had corrupted other people as far as it was possible for them to do so with their influence and their money. He knew their names; he knew they had been at work; yet Mr. Newberry knew nothing about his campaign, so contended by some Senators.

On July 4 Mr. Newberry, writing to Mr. King, said among other things:

> I acknowledge your two letters of the 30th and your letters of the following dates: June 27, June 28, June 28, June 28, June 28, and June 30—

He got five or six letters from him dated June 28—

> all of which have been greedily devoured.

That looks like he knew a little about the campaign. But, Mr. President, I have known of no one who said that he had nothing to do with the campaign except the majority members of the committee in their report. Of course, they tried to make it appear that he was in New York, having nothing in particular to do with the campaign, but I do not believe any Senator has tried to make it appear that he had nothing to do with it, except the committee, who try to create that impression.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida will suspend for a moment. The Chair will rule that each Senator is entitled to speak one hour on any pending question. The Chair does not know what the intention of the Senator who now has the floor will be, but his time will expire at 1 o'clock and 19 minutes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KING. As I understand the situation, practically two questions are now before the Senate. May not the Senator, anticipating the chronological presentation of each of those questions, continue addressing himself, theoretically at least, to the second proposition?

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the second proposition comes up he will then have an opportunity to discuss it if he desires. Of course, there can be but one question pending at a time, and there is now but one question pending.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I hope this time will not be charged to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will not be charged to the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think the ruling is contrary to the rulings heretofore made, but I accept it out of respect to the Chair. Heretofore any measure pending might be discussed when a Senator was discussing the main question, and very properly so. The idea of a Senator being precluded from the privilege of discussing a substitute to the main proposition until it comes up is something new. It is up now; it is pending. Both questions are the main question and the substitute. I accept the decision of the Chair respectfully, but I expected to have two hours at this time. I was going to put in a lot of testimony, but I shall not have the opportunity now to do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. My time is so limited now, that I do not like to yield.

Mr. KING. It may be taken from my time. I am speaking in the interest of the Senator now occupying the floor. It occurs to me that the Senator now occupying the floor, if he desired, or any other Senator, might suggest a substitute or indicate that he intended to offer as a substitute some proposition to take the place of the recommendation of the majority members of the committee and address himself during the second hour to that and to cognate questions. I suggest that for the consideration of the Chair when the matter shall finally be presented to the Chair for a ruling.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will have an opportunity to speak when any other question arises. There can be but one question pending at a time, and there is now but one question pending.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I appreciate the courtesy of the Chair, but it would have come at a more opportune time when I began speaking than to have waited until I had only seven or eight minutes remaining of the hour which the Chair now allows me. I appreciate the courtesy of the Chair, however. I would have arranged my address quite differently had I known in advance I was going to be limited to one hour.

I can not conclude, as I had expected, in seven or eight minutes, but I lay down the proposition that the testimony shows that Mr. Newberry largely directed his own campaign; that he engaged his own campaign manager; and that he at least contributed a part of the money that was expended, and in addition to that he had knowledge of the expenditures that were going on. He had conferences with his manager almost weekly; he had conferences with the publicity men, and helped to plan the movie advertising. He knew all about the publicity work; he knew all about the field operations, because he received reports weekly from Mr. King. There are letters in the record showing that conclusively.

Mr. Newberry thanked Mr. King for his field reports, covering the weekly activities, and said it was a good idea that he had his field agents come in every Monday.

Who were the field agents? The field agents were men who were employed and paid so much per week for their services. Some of them were not for Mr. Newberry until they had been employed and paid for their services. On the question of whether or not he had anything to do with the expenditures, Mr. Newberry, in a letter which he wrote to his friend Mr. Miller, in response to some condemnation which Mr. Miller had uttered against "barrel" campaigns, I judge, stated that he agreed with everybody else that there should not be any improper use of money in connection with his campaign. It is a significant feature of that letter of Mr. Newberry that in it he said that neither Paul King, Templeton, nor Oakman are to receive "one cent (except actual travel and publicity costs) from me." He did not say from somebody else, but he said "from me." That letter is set forth in the record a number of times. Those were the men with whom he had been in touch; they were the men who were his representatives. When he had received some statement, probably of disapproval, from Mr. Miller, either through his paper or by private letter, Mr. Newberry wrote that none of the gentlemen mentioned were to receive "one cent from me, except actual travel and publicity costs." His letter bears no other construction than that he was to pay their "actual travel and publicity costs."

We find an item of $146,000 for publicity. The methods for obtaining field and other workers in this campaign were most reprehensible. The campaign was carried on primarily by Mr. Newberry and Mr. Paul King. Then came in the field agents, the intermediaries; then came in the county campaign committees. Field agents, county committee chairmen, and secretaries were practically all paid salaries. It was a very common thing, I understand from the evidence, for them to go and talk with a man, asking him to support Mr. Newberry. In many instances the voter they approached was for some other candidate.

They would talk along a little while and then the Newberry agents would say, "Well, of course, we did not expect you to work for nothing," and some weak fellow frequently would give way, and before the conference ended they would have bought that man by paying him $75 or $100 or perhaps $30 a week for his services. They would go and interview railroad engineers; they picked men in all vocations of life. I never heard of a campaign that was any better systematized or which was carried on with any more shrewdness and ability if one were going to buy his way into the United States Senate. They bought off men occupying such confidential relations as the heads of fraternal organizations. They went into industrial organizations, and they would persuade a man either by holding out the glittering coin to him or they would get him up by other methods. They went after newspapers, and, as stated in a letter by Paul King, on one occasion, when a newspaper that had been supporting Osborn was weakening, "this week I am sending a man to put a page advertisement in his paper." We all gather the significance of that; that a page advertisement would probably finish the job and that that newspaper would support Mr. Newberry.

Those were the methods employed. Mr. Paul King reported to Mr. Newberry constantly, daily, by telephone and by letter. He also sent him a copy of the report of his weekly meetings with his field agents; he sent him a list of the field agents. Mr. King sent Mr. Newberry a list of his supporters, and Mr. Newberry, according to the testimony, would write them a personal letter, thanking them for their support. And yet some Senators say that he had nothing to do with the campaign! The cost of stamps alone for the letters which Mr. Newberry himself signed and mailed out from New York would no doubt exceed the amount which he was permitted to expend under the law. So certainly Mr. Newberry knew something about that expense. He knew that money was being expended by the tens of thousands of dollars.

Mr. President, it is an absolute subterfuge to talk about the reason for these expenditures arising out of the necessity of defeating Mr. Ford, because the testimony is full of instances from beginning to end showing that Mr. Paul King, Mr. Newberry's manager, and Mr. Newberry were concerned for months, during which they were expending money, long after the "barrel" had been opened, not in regard to the candidacy of Mr. Ford, for Mr. Ford had not then appeared upon the horizon, but the names mentioned in the telegrams and letters which passed between Mr. Newberry and Mr. King were those of ex-Gov. Osborn, ex-Gov. Warner, Senator William Alden Smith, and one or two others who were also on the list. Mr. Newberry, in referring to ex-Gov. Warner, as my recollection is, stated that he does "not think there is any probability of him coming in now that we have advanced so well, and with continued heavy pressure of publicity we shall keep him out of the way." This expenditure was not caused by the candidacy of Mr. Ford, but from the time the campaign was begun the large and excessive expenditures were made with a view to defeating ex-Gov. Warner, ex-Gov. Osborn, and others. It set out with Mr. King in the very first instance having told Mr. Newberry that the campaign would cost probably $50,000. The testimony shows that, and such an expenditure was in violation of law. The corrupt methods were continued after Mr. Ford entered the race, but this was only a continuation of what had been going on from the opening of the Newberry campaign months before Mr. Ford's entrance into the contest.

An expenditure of $50,000 was in violation of the law of the United States and was in violation of the law of Michigan. In good conscience, Mr. President, while I feel kindly personally toward the junior Senator from Michigan, I can not vote to exonerate him, and I believe that he should not be permitted to retain his seat in this body. I will never give my approval to the purchase of a seat in the Senate at $200,000 or for any other sum. I would be untrue to my State, the Nation, and myself if I should give the stamp of approval to the "boodle" campaign which resulted in Mr. Newberry's election to the Senate.

Mr. NEWBERRY obtained the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	McKinley	Shortridge
Ball	France	McLean	Simmons
Borah	Frelinghuysen	McNary	Smith
Brandegee	Glass	Moses	Smoot
Broussard	Gooding	Nelson	Spencer
Bursum	Hale	New	Stanfield

Dillingham	Keyes	Pittman	Watson, Ga.
du Pont	King	Poindexter	Watson, Ind.
Edge	Ladd	Pomerene	Weller
Elkins	McCormick	Ransdell	Williams
Ernst	McCumber	Robinson	Willis
Fernald	McKellar	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Michigan proceeds, will he yield to me for a moment, so that I may make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement limiting debate that was adopted by the Senate some days ago may be modified so that it will not apply to the Senator from Michigan, so that he may proceed as long as he desires.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the suggestion, but my remarks will not occupy more time than allowed under the agreement already in force.

Mr. President, I can not remain silent any longer during the consideration of my right to represent the State of Michigan as one of its Senators. I did not volunteer to appear before the committee of the Senate which took testimony in this matter because I really had no information that would assist in the investigation of the charges filed by my opponent. It seems to me that the time has come to speak, because my silence may be misunderstood by my friends.

As my colleagues in this body know, and as is also well known by my associates and constituents in the State of Michigan, I am not accustomed to public speech, and whatever service I have been able to render to my country or to others has been entirely along lines remote from oral debate. Therefore, I earnestly request my associates in the Senate to permit me to proceed with my statement without interruption. I shall state the whole case as I know it——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for one preliminary question, so that there may be an understanding?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I will, if the Senator will please let me proceed thereafter without interruption. For this time, I will.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. I simply desire to ask the Senator from Michigan whether, after he has concluded his statement, he will then be ready to answer some interrogatories?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I shall try to cover the whole case, as far as I know it, in my statement; and before I leave the floor I will yield for any reasonable question that is asked for information. I do not propose to take part in discussions of the law, for which I am not qualified, nor to comment on the opinions or testimony of others. I am here in my right as a Senator to give the facts, and nothing more.

I shall state the whole case as I know it, fully, frankly, and honestly, as in the presence of God and before my fellow Senators in this great tribunal; and I shall do this just as completely as I am able to do it. I can add absolutely nothing to what I am about to state to the Senate. I must abide by whatever effect it may have upon the conscience and the judgment of the Members of this body.

It is perhaps unnecessary for me to say that I shall confine myself strictly and entirely to the facts as I know them to be and shall not attempt in any sense, either by argument or by appeal, to affect in the slightest degree the judgment of this body. As far as I am concerned, I desire that the facts as they are shall determine this matter.

On the 6th day of June, 1917, I was commissioned a lieutenant commander in the United States Navy, and on the 23d of the following month—that is, July 23, 1917—I was assigned to the third naval district, with headquarters in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, which were some months later moved to Chambers Street, New York City. I immediately took up my duties there; and from that day, July 23, 1917, until after the signing of the armistice, November 11, 1918, I was never in Michigan a single hour. To be exact, I never put foot in Michigan again until the holidays following the armistice. The primary election and the general election of 1918 occurred during my absence from the State of Michigan.

In the early fall of 1917 I began to receive visits and letters from men active in public and political affairs in Michigan urging me to become a candidate on the Republican ticket for United States Senator. I was not unmindful of the suggested honor, and yet I fully realized that I certainly would not resign my commission in the Navy to become a candidate for any political office, and that I could not take any personal, active interest in a campaign while I continued to be an officer on duty in the United States Navy.

While I was considering whether or not it was my duty to become a candidate for the United States Senate at the November election of 1918 I said to Mr. Allan Templeton, a citizen of Detroit, who was actively engaged in a large industry in which I was a stockholder and who was also president of the Detroit Board of Commerce, that if I should decide to become a candidate I hoped it would meet with the approval of my Detroit business friends and associates and that I trusted that the campaign might be looked after by business men of that description. This is as far as I had any direct connection with the selection of the committee of business men, whose management of the campaign I shall remember with gratitude as long as I shall live.

Mr. Paul H. King was induced to accept the active management of the campaign. The selection of Mr. King did not originate with me. It was not in any way arranged by me. I knew Mr. King but slightly. My last contact with him had been in 1912, when we were political opponents. I was a supporter of Theodore Roosevelt and Mr. King was a supporter of William H. Taft in that campaign. Mr. King was successful in keeping me and the Roosevelt delegates entirely out of the famous Bay City convention that year, of which I had been invited to be chairman by the State committee.

In my judgment Paul King is a man of the highest character and sterling integrity, and when he had been selected as manager of the senatorial campaign in Michigan, which was done without the slightest knowledge on my part, he insisted that before he would even accept, much less undertake to enter upon the work of the campaign, he should and must learn for himself, because of our differences in 1912, whether or not his management of the senatorial campaign would be entirely acceptable to me.

He came to New York and we had a brief interview there. We did not discuss, even indirectly, a single detail of the campaign. I recall that during the conversation had at that time Mr. King, in answer to a question as to how much it had cost the friends of Senator TOWNSEND, whose campaign Mr. King had managed, said it had cost approximately $20,000, and added that in view of the situation then existing in Michigan he thought it would cost my friends approximately $50,000 to make a comprehensive and successful campaign. This is the only amount of money which, directly or indirectly, I ever heard mentioned in connection with the senatorial campaign in Michigan until after the primary election and the report of the committee was filed.

I did not solicit or expend, directly or indirectly, one single dollar in the campaign for Senator in Michigan in 1918, nor did I know of the contributions made until afterwards. The two statements which I made under oath to the Senate are absolutely and wholly true. The first is dated August 14, 1918, and, omitting the printed form with which you are all familiar and to which I sincerely subscribed, I wrote in my own hand as follows:

> The campaign for my nomination for United States Senator has been voluntarily conducted by my friends in Michigan. I have taken no part in it whatever, and no contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge or consent.

In the second, dated August 28, 1918, with the same omissions as to the printed form and in addition to the printed form, to which I sincerely subscribed, I wrote with my own hand as follows, under the head of "Contributions":

> None with my knowledge and consent.

And under the head of "Disbursements"—

> None with my knowledge and consent. I have read a general public statement of Paul H. King concerning expenditures made by a voluntary committee of my friends, but these were made without my knowledge or consent.

As every Senator knows, this form refers only to campaign contributions, disbursements, and promises, and I think other things of value, and to nothing else.

I had not the slightest intention of misleading anyone in making this statement, nor do I believe that any fair-minded man was in the least deceived thereby.

The form of report furnished by the Senate under the act of Congress then supposed to be in force—but which has since been declared to be void—called for a full, correct, and itemized statement, under oath, of all campaign contributions, names of contributors, all expenditures, and the purposes for which the expenditures were made.

I had not the knowledge required to make such a verified report. Had my affidavit so stated this fact, all criticism would have been avoided. I made the statement in the form it was made in, without consultation with anyone, and it was literally true. I had taken no active part in the campaign. I had not even been in Michigan. I had neither received nor expended any funds and had no personal knowledge to enable me to make the report called for.

In my statement filed with the secretary of the State I did call attention to the report of the campaign committee at Detroit, which report, as called for by the Michigan law, includes a full statement of receipts and disbursements, as reported by the treasurer of that committee.

After our interview in New York, Mr. King went back to Michigan and prosecuted a campaign, conducting it entirely in his own way. He managed a campaign of publicity and organization which was most effective and for which I have frequently expressed to him the gratitude which I feel. I have to-day, as I always have had, a personal admiration for Paul King's character as a Christian gentleman, for his honesty and integrity as a man, and for his splendid ability as an organizer and campaign manager. I am proud of the friendship of Paul King. Not more than a half-dozen times did I see Mr. King throughout the campaign, and each time it was in the city of New York. He kept me constantly informed as to the progress of the campaign, in which I was, of course, keenly interested. On one or two occasions questions of policy were discussed between us, and in each instance the judgment of Mr. King controlled.

As I recollect the facts, in one or two instances his action was the exact opposite of what I felt was the best thing to be done. I do not mean to say that I did not know generally what was going on in Michigan. I had constant knowledge, as far as information was concerned, regarding the progress of the campaign, but I had no direct participation in it.

I knew, as a matter of fact, that a campaign of publicity was being extensively carried on, and I realized that such a campaign must necessarily cost a considerable sum of money; but I did not have the faintest idea as to the amount of money that actually was expended until after the report was made public. The cost of the campaign was about $195,000, according to the report, and when I learned of this amount I was at once filled with amazement and regret.

I have no criticism to make of those who managed the campaign which resulted in my election to the United States Senate. Whatever may happen, it is a gratification for me to remember that in the examination before the grand jury in New York City, in the diligent and detailed examinations which were made by numerous agents of the Department of Justice from Washington, in all that was brought out in the minute investigation of every step in the campaign in Michigan, in all that was presented to the grand jury at Grand Rapids, and before the petit jury who tried the Grand Rapids case, there was not the slightest evidence which involved moral turpitude in the remotest degree, nor was there any evidence, so far as I have been able to learn, of a single dollar that was spent dishonestly for corruption or bribery. The amount expended was large, more than I had any idea was being expended, and more than ought to be necessary to expend in any ordinary campaign. But this was not an ordinary campaign.

I shall not dwell upon the reasons which the committee thought imperatively demanded a campaign of newspaper publicity involving this expenditure of money. I can only say that I regret exceedingly the fact that so large an amount of money was necessarily expended. I can further say that in the acquisition of that money, in the solicitation of that money, in the collection of that money, in the use of that money, I had nothing whatever to do. I knew nothing whatever about it—not even the amount of it.

I make this statement not to escape any responsibility but in order that the actual facts in the matter, as I know them, may be presented to the Senate. How the money was spent in the State of Michigan, how the books of account were kept, who were engaged in the work, or what they did, I did not know. I do not know now, except from the accounts of the hearings which have been held, and the report filed after the primary.

It is and always has been my understanding that in so far as the primary in Michigan is concerned, if the cost is not borne by the candidate himself, the committee in charge of the campaign may spend whatever amount it pleases for the 11 enumerated objects which are set forth at length in the Michigan primary law. I, therefore, assumed from the start, and I still believe, that the law was carefully obeyed by this independent committee, which had the campaign for my primary election in hand.

The testimony shows that after the report of the campaign committee had been filed, an amount of money aggregating ten or fifteen thousand dollars was still due, largely for advertising bills which had not been sent in. This fact I did not know until Andrew H. Green testified before the Senate committee here in Washington, nor did I know until that time of his generosity which made the payment of these bills possible. I made my statements under oath to the Senate, as provided by law, in the firm belief that they were full and fair statements of the absolute truth, and I so believe to this hour. I made them without consultation and without legal advice; and with only the same facts before me, I would make exactly the same statements to-day that I made then.

As to the campaign fund, the question of its acquisition or of its expenditure was never called to my attention by anyone connected with me or the campaign committee; and when I stated that no money was spent with my knowledge or consent, I endeavored to convey the same impression which I now endeavor to make clear, namely, that as for myself, I was spending no money, and that I knew nothing about the expenditure of money in the campaign. I want to make this point just as strong as I am able to do, because it has been hinted that money which was contributed, without my knowledge or consent, by relatives and friends of mine, was subsequently, in some way, directly or indirectly, repaid by me, or was to be repaid by me. There is not even a shadow of truth or the slightest foundation for any such statement. I did not know what amounts were given to the campaign. I did not know by whom these amounts were given. I did not know either their source, their amount, or their use. I have never agreed, either directly or indirectly, to repay, or in any way to reimburse such contributions, either in whole or in part, nor have I, directly or indirectly, repaid or reimbursed such contributions, in whole or in part. I have never made any agreement to do so, nor have I any intention of so doing.

So far as I am personally concerned, I did not spend in the primary campaign in Michigan a single dollar, directly or indirectly, and with the exception of a personal contribution of $1,500 to the Republican State central commitee, this is equally true of the general election. In spite of the fact that the whole people of my State were bombarded from every side by every means of publicity and appeal, with every detail of every charge made against me in connection with the primary, I was elected fairly and honorably a Senator from the State of Michigan.

The people of my State knew the whole story from beginning to end, and whatever action the Senate of the United States may take, I shall remember as long as I live the staunch loyalty of the people of Michigan, who, with complete and full knowledge of every allegation made against me, and of the charges that were made and placarded throughout the State in connection with the primary campaign, held me in such confidence and believed in me sufficiently to elect me one of the Senators from Michigan.

I can add nothing to this statement to which the Senate with so much patience and courtesy has listened. It presents fully and frankly all the facts in the case as I know them to be.

As God is my witness, I am not to this day and hour conscious of having done in connection with either the primary campaign, or the general election of 1918 in the State of Michigan, a single act that was, or is, in any way unlawful, dishonorable, or corrupt, and this I say to the Senate of the United States, without reservation or qualification.

Upon these facts, as I then believed them to be, and as I now believe them to be, I shall abide the result with a clear conscience.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWBERRY. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Pursuant to the very frank and courteous statement made by the Senator from Michigan, to the effect that he was quite willing that he should be interrogated with a view to eliciting any facts, I desire, if he will permit me, to address a few questions to him in entire conformity with the spirit of the suggestion made by him and without any disposition whatever to engage in any discussion or attempt to heckle him.

I desire to refer the Senator to the proceedings at the trial at Grand Rapids. I note from the record that witnesses were interrogated in behalf of the defendants in that case, but that the Senator himself, a defendant in the case, did not go upon the stand. Is that correct?

Mr. NEWBERRY. It is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Other witnesses were examined, however, for the defendants. The Senator did not appear as a witness either before the Senate committee investigating this matter, did he?

Mr. NEWBERRY. The Senator is perfectly familiar with the facts. Please state them and ask the question. I do not wish a running examination or a cross-examination. I appreciate the kindness with which the Senator started out, and I wish to respond in exactly the same spirit. If the Senator will ask directly what he wishes to know, and if the facts are within my knowledge, I shall be delighted to tell the truth.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to pursue that course. In view of the fact that the Senator did not appear as a witness in the Grand Rapids trial, although other defendants were interrogated, in view of the fact that he did not appear before the committee as a witness, nor make any public response to the letter of Mr. Vandenberg, the editor of the Grand Rapids Herald, who addressed him upon the subject that is under consideration here, I wish to inquire of the Senator why he did not make before the statement which he has made this morning?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I did not appear on the stand at Grand Rapids because I was what lawyers might call a good client. I followed the advice of the lawyers in charge of the case, who said that I had no information to give. I did not volunteer before the Senate committee for the reasons I have given in my statement to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator tell us why he did not make the statement that he makes this morning in answer to the letter of Mr. Vandenberg, which was given publicity in Michigan?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I did not see any reason why I should encourage my political critics in their efforts to defeat me. I did not do more than that with Mr. Vandenberg because I thought I had done all that was right and proper at that time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has referred in his very succinct statement to a number of interviews that he had with Mr. Paul King during the course of the campaign in the city of New York. Were there any other gentlemen connected with the campaign in any way in consultation with the Senator in New York during the primary campaign?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I think there were others from time to time. I referred to Mr. King because he was the man who was in charge of the campaign.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is not associated in any business way with Mr. King?

Mr. NEWBERRY. None whatever.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the Senator stated he had some business relations, however, with Mr. Templeton?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I had for many years.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But none with which Mr. King and he are jointly associated?

Mr. NEWBERRY. None with Mr. King.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that if he and Mr. King and Mr. King's secretary, Mr. Sibben, and Mr. Andrews were in New York at one time it was presumably upon some matter connected with the primary campaign during that period?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Probably if they saw me they talked about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the record, which discloses that on March 24 Mr. King and his wife; Mr. Andrews, of Menominee, Mich., I believe, or some place in the northern part of the State; Mr. Templeton, and Mr. Sibben, were in New York in consultation with the Senator, I take it, in relation to the primary campaign. Does the Senator recall?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Yes; I think they were.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read from page 227 of the bill of exceptions:

On March 24, 1918, Roger Andrews and his wife registered in room 432; Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Templeton in room 332; Mr. and Mrs. Paul King in room 334; and C. L. Sibben in room 447. Mr. Truman H. Newberry did not register there on that occasion. Mr. and Mrs. Roger Andrews departed March 26. Templeton and wife, Paul H. King and wife, and C. L. Sibben departed on March 25. Their bills in the following amounts, A. A. Templeton and wife, $13.90; Robert Andrews and wife, $41.10; Paul King and wife and C. L. Sibben, $19.20, were charged to the account of Truman H. Newberry. He also registered in rooms 340 and 342 the same day. He had the use of those rooms for the day, presumably for a couple of hours, and departed the same day.

Do you recall having paid those bills, Mr. Newberry?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I do not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Do you assert that you did not?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I do not understand the question. Will the Senator ask it again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Do you assert that you did not?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Did not what?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That you did not pay those bills.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I have no knowledge of having paid those bills. I do not know anything about paying those bills.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read further:

On April 20 Allan A. Templeton, of Detroit, registered in room 1917; Paul King, room 1919; C. L. Sibben, room 2017; and Bert D. Cody, room 262. Their bills, in the following amounts, C. L. Sibben, $4.80; Bert D. Cody, $9.85; Allan A. Templeton and Paul King, $12.11, were all charged to the account of Truman H. Newberry. H. A. Hopkins was registered on April 21 in room 2025, and he departed on April 23. His bill on that occasion, amounting to $23.33, was charged to Truman H. Newberry. A. A. Templeton, of Detroit, was registered May 31 in room 1043, and he remained until June 1. The account, amounting to $5, was charged to Truman H. Newberry. He, Truman H. Newberry, resided at the Biltmore from June 1 to September 18, 1918. Thomas P. Phillips was there from June 2 to June 5, and his account was paid by Truman H. Newberry. Mr. Phillips was registered again in room 725 and departed on June 3. On June 1 a Charles Keiser was registered in connection with the Newberry party in room 1046. I believe he is Mr. Newberry's valet. He was registered during all the time that Mr. Newberry was there.

Mr. NEWBERRY. It might throw some light on the situation if I stated that at that time and during the war I had no home except two hotel homes—one at the Gotham, where I stayed when Mrs. Newberry was at home, and one at the Biltmore, where I spent the summer when my wife was away. For a great many years—I think it must have been from the day the Holland House was opened in New York—I have had a continuous bill at the Holland House and its successor, the Biltmore. I have numerous friends, and I have always permitted and encouraged my children, when they travel, when they were going to the theater in New York, to go to the hotel and charge their accounts to me.

I can not say those bills to which the Senator refers were not paid. I say I have no knowledge of their payment, nor would I have knowledge of the detailed statements coming from the Biltmore Hotel that were paid in my office and included my children and friends and theaters for myself or for them. If those were charged there, I say on my honor as a Senator they were not charged by my direction, with my knowledge, nor so far as I know did I pay them, and still they might have been paid.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator know who did authorize the clerk to charge them to the account of Truman H. Newberry?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I do not; and I was a little worried when I found that anybody charged anything to me without my knowledge. We may all of us have enthusiastic friends who think we are more generous than we are, and somebody overtrained on my generosity. That is my theory.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator, of course, knows Mr. King, and I suppose probably Mr. King would not be one of those who would thus presume upon the generosity of the Senator. I read further from the testimony of the clerk of the Biltmore, as follows.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Does the Senator object if I sit down for a moment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I am willing to be questioned, but would like to get as much rest as I can.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read further from the testimony of the clerk of the Biltmore:

On July 14 Mr. Paul King, of Detroit, and Mr. Sibben were registered in room 1018. They departed on the 15th. Their accounts were charged to Truman H. Newberry.

Can the Senator tell us who authorized the charging of that account to Mr. Newberry?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I have no further answer that I can make about those charges. I have tried to be frank and fair and tell all I know about them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the course of the remarks of the Senator he told us he knew nothing about the contributions which had been made until some time afterwards. I dare say the Senator's attention has been called to the testimony of Mr. Fred P. Smith in the record concerning the telegram and the conversation he had with the Senator in which he said the Senator was "kicking about the balances." I read the testimony——

Mr. NEWBERRY. I recall it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read the testimony to the Senator for the purpose of refreshing his recollection.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I recall it. If that is the purpose of the reading, it is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Apparently a telegram was sent by Fred P. Smith to yourself under date of July 28, 1918, reading as follows:

Lieut. TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Third Naval District, 280 Broadway, New York:
I misinformed you this morning the date of close of regular expenses. Should have said August 27. The circular work, advertising, clerical help, postage, and all regular overhead expenses will naturally continue until primary. Have written.

FRED P. SMITH.

Mr. Smith testified that he was in conversation with you over the telephone. He said that you, Commander Newberry, wanted to know when all this was going to end, and the question was asked:

Is that the idea?
Mr. SMITH. I think that is right.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You got the date wrong in your talk, and so you sent this telegram to him?
Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; that is right.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And you say:
"I misinformed you this morning the date of close of regular expenses. Should have said August 27."
In other words, you should have said that the expenses would then be cut off?
Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING (reading):
"The circular work, advertising, clerical help, postage, and other regular overhead expenses will naturally continue until primary?"
Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And that is what he had been talking with you about over the phone?
Mr. SMITH. He was kicking about the balances.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Yes; the drain was pretty heavy, and he wanted to see it stopped?
Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; that is true.

Do you care to say anything in respect to that matter?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. Smith's recollection and my recollection are quite different, so far as the inferences which may be put on his answer are concerned. My recollection of that incident is that my inquiry was caused by the newspaper criticism of the expense of that campaign. It disturbed me and I expressed the hope that the time had come when it was over. Senators may get the idea of what a fine politician and candidate I was when I did not even know and Smith did not know within 30 days of when the thing would be over. I wanted the thing over and I hoped that the newspaper criticisms would come to an end, and this harping about expenditures, which I hated then and hate worse now, and I was asking "When, for goodness sake, will this thing stop?" And Mr. Smith answered, as the Senator from Montana has read, that expenditures for this, that, and the other were to go on for another 30 days. When, however, he states that I was "kicking about the balances" his statement is unintelligible to me. I was not kicking about the balances, and I did not know anything about any balances.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What reason had you to suppose that the expenditures were running high?

Mr. NEWBERRY. The newspapers were my advisers as to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Did Mr. Fred Smith have anything at all to do with the making of these expenditures?

Mr. NEWBERRY. His testimony is in the record, and he has testified that he did not have.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. These expenditures were all incurred by Mr. Paul King, were they not?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I will not comment on Mr. King's testimony. I do not think they were. The statement I have made covers everything that I know about the matter. As to how the expenditures were made and who made them, I knew nothing, and I can not here reply intelligently to questions except as to the facts within my knowledge, and as to such facts I am prepared to answer if I know how to answer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well.

Mr. NEWBERRY. But I do not want to impute motives to others or to construe their ideas or their testimony.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. All I desire to ask is why you complained or called the matter to the attention of Fred P. Smith, who had absolutely nothing whatever to do with the running of the campaign, instead of Mr. King or Mr. Templeton or Mr. Blair?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I have already answered the question as to why I called up Fred Smith. I did not want to call up the others because I did not want to criticize their campaign, if there was anything to criticize. It was an inquiry that I was trying to make, and I thought some fellow on the outside could find out something about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Really all that Fred Smith had to do with the matter was to draw checks, was it not?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I am not prepared to discuss Mr. Fred Smith's position.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Senator NEWBERRY, I want to call your attention to the fact that the record discloses, in the bill of exceptions, at page 281, that the first contribution made by John S. Newberry was a thousand dollars, which was made on March 22, 1918. This is from the official report which is filed by the committee. It also appears, at page 117 of the record, that on March 6 Mr. Paul King opened an account under the heading of "Paul King, Chairman," and deposited $2,000 in the bank. Mr. John S. Newberry's first contribution, according to the report and according to his own testimony, was on March 22 of $1,000. Mr. Paul King deposited $2,000 on March 6, 1918. Do you know where that money came from?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I do not know. I know nothing whatever about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me remark in that connection, the account thus opened by Mr. King was closed out on May 7, 1918, at which time Mr. Blair was appointed treasurer of the committee. Up to that time the committee operated without a treasurer. What part, if any, did you have in the selection of Mr. Blair as treasurer?

Mr. NEWBERRY. None whatever.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Did you know when he began to act as treasurer?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I do not think so. No; I did not know.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That fact was not reported to you?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I do not recall when he began to act or whether it was reported to me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Were you familiar with the provision of the Michigan law that not a dollar could be paid by a committee that had not a treasurer?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I can not say that I am very familiar with it, although I generally know what the law is in the State in which I live.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There are a few expressions in some of your letters to Mr. King which I should like to quote.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I desire to say to the Senator from Montana in advance that I am not prepared to defend every sentence in each letter I ever wrote. I ask the indulgence of the Senator in asking these questions that he will kindly consider that when those letters were written we were in the midst of a war, and I was in the midst of the busiest part of war in the United States in the harbor of New York. I wrote those letters in a hurry, without any study and without any knowledge and without any thought that each and every word could be picked up here by lawyers of the highest standing in our country. To split hairs and quibble over the use or the omission of words in the letters which I wrote at that time I consider distinctly unfair.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We will have the circumstances in mind.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I do not think the Senator from Montana is going to be unfair, but somebody might be unfair. Now go ahead and shoot, and I will try to do the best I can. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have in mind the statement which was made by the Senator in the course of his remarks that he had nothing whatever to do with the expenditure of this money. I call attention to a letter appearing in the record at page 704 from you to Mr. King, in which you say:

> I am glad Mr. Warner is scared out for the present, and as long as we keep up our publicity work at full pressure it will be harder and harder for any new man to get any kind of a start that will make it seem worth while for him to be a serious candidate.

Just what did you mean by "our publicity work" to be kept up "at full pressure"?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. President, in those letters which I wrote, and in that letter in particular, I was trying by every means in my power to encourage and to cheer on the men who were undertaking this work. My position might be compared to that of a man watching a contest, athletic or otherwise, and, because of heart interest, I was on the side line, howling and yowling for my side as loud as I could to encourage them whenever I could in every way.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to a similar expression in a letter under date of May 23, 1918.

> MY DEAR PAUL: I return herewith the draft letters with a few notations. Please be assured that these were made with no intent to criticize, and only as a suggestion.
>
> When you finally settle on the forms, please send me an index descriptive of the people to whom the various letters are intended to be sent, together with clean copies of the forms you finally decided to use.
>
> If, in your opinion, I should, by the use of these letters, now declare myself to be a candidate under the primary law, would it not terminate our present plan of publicity?
>
> Sincerely, yours,
> TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY.

Did you intend by that to signify that you were an integral part of the organization that was carrying on this publicity?

Mr. NEWBERRY. No; I did not. I have tried to cover that point heretofore.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to call your attention to just one other letter appearing in the bill of exceptions at page 651. It is a letter which you wrote to Mr. George Miller under date of April 6, 1918. It is rather lengthy, and I shall not undertake to read it all, but I dare say that you have the letter in mind.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I have; yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read the following extract from it:

> Every intelligent person whole-heartedly agrees with your four negative reasons, and no one is more opposed than I to any improper or even questionable use of money, and not one cent will be spent by me or in my behalf with my knowledge and consent that can not be published to the world, and this keystone principle of my candidacy I wrote out and delivered months ago to those concerned. Neither Mr. Templeton, Mr. King, nor Mr. Oakman have ever or expect ever to receive one cent (except actual travel and publicity cost) from me.

Did you pay any of the traveling expenses of Mr. Templeton, Mr. King, or Mr. Oakman?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Not that I know of.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Well, what did you mean by saying that none of them ever expected to get a cent from you except for travel and publicity expenses?

Mr. NEWBERRY. What I tried to convey in that letter, Senator, was the fact that none of those men was to receive anything from me. It would have been more intelligent, my idea would have been better expressed, if I had added "by me or the campaign committee," because I was not going to pay anything to anybody.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But you did not say campaign committee; you said "from me."

Mr. NEWBERRY. I agree with you that that letter might have been better expressed; I am telling you what I tried to say.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Really what you meant was that they could not get anything from the committee except traveling and publicity expenses?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I did.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But you did say "from me"?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I have stated what I meant.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That reminds me of something else. The Senator spoke about the business men's committee. What business men of Detroit were members of that committee?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I can not recall the names of all the members of the committee. There were quite a number in the organization. I think Mr. King testified to that, probably, and that is in the record.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. King was a resident of Detroit?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I think so; yes.
Mr. WALSH of Montana. Was he a business man there?
Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. King was a lawyer.
Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was Mr. Templeton, who was a business man in Detroit.
Mr. NEWBERRY. Yes.
Mr. WALSH of Montana. And Mr. Blair?
Mr. NEWBERRY. Yes.
Mr. WALSH of Montana. Was there anybody else?
Mr. NEWBERRY. I do not know with whom they consulted from time to time; they never told me; but that there were others I know.
Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is all.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I feel confident that no one could listen to the frank and manly statement of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and to his cross-examination on the part of the distinguished and able lawyer, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and have any doubt whatever as to his sincerity and as to his honesty. It seems that one of the points brought out in the cross-examination, which required some passage back and forth, was that friends of the junior Senator from Michigan had registered at prominent New York hotels, and there was a possibility that hotel bills contracted in that manner might have been paid by the Senator from Michigan. While I am not a lawyer, as all my colleagues thoroughly understand, nevertheless it seems to me, Mr. President, that only by a very wide stretch of the imagination could it be held to be a violation of the corrupt practices act even if the Senator from Michigan, when the accounts were rendered by the hotel, had finally paid for the board and lodging or other expenses in New York of friends of his from Michigan, New York being 1,500 miles away from the campaign. I am going to speak very briefly, principally because I served as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, on which committee devolved the responsibility of investigating this case.

Reams of print paper have already been consumed for the purpose of recording fiery and mostly partisan speeches demanding the unseating of Senator Newberry. If anyone takes the time to look over most of these speeches he will find that they do not attempt to deal with the evidence adduced in the investigation, but for the most part they consist of partisan demands and statements that the moral conscience of the American people has been so shocked that, irrespective of the legal facts, the Senator from Michigan must be sacrificed and disgraced, and his seat declared vacant.

Frankly, Mr. President, some of the denunciatory expressions that have been used by Senators on the other side, usually speaking in generalities and not in any way referring to the actual evidence and facts in the case, would be far more fitting if delivered in a night police court before a police magistrate trying some criminal case than in this Chamber, where it is at least expected by the country that calm consideration of facts and evidence shall alone influence the mind and votes.

It was my privilege to serve as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which subcommittee was charged with the important responsibility of investigating this case and reaching a conclusion. Therefore, Mr. President, I feel that in the few moments of the time of the Senate I shall consume I am equipped to talk from a standpoint of familiarity with evidence and facts, rather than inspired by partisanship or prejudice.

In my judgment no question of more serious import can come before this body for a decision than that which decides a man's honor, and particularly that of a Member of this body.

I have heard Members on the other side, in hurling their invectives, frequently make the statement that if Senators on this side would read the testimony they were positive the result would be a vote to unseat Senator Newberry. I join with them in the devout wish that not only Members on this side but Members on the other side as well will read the testimony, as I had the opportunity of hearing the largest portion of it; and then, Mr. President, I am quite positive that there would be less denunciation and implied criminal action and more adherence to facts.

I always endeavor to be fair and considerate of others' viewpoint, and I have no criticism to make of the action of those Senators, either on this side or the other side, who have made up their minds as to their vote in this case if their conclusion has been arrived at and formulated through a careful analysis and study of the evidence and facts. But, equally, I have no patience with efforts being made to inflame the minds and judgments of Senators on either side by simply discussing election corruption in general terms, and practically assuming, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, that the Senator from Michigan is guilty of all of the crimes possible against the sacredness of the franchise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Mississippi?
Mr. EDGE. If the Senator will permit me to finish this very short statement, I shall be glad then to yield.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.
Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to ask the Senator a question there, because he referred to the decision of the Supreme Court.
Mr. EDGE. I shall refer further to that in what I am about to say.
Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the Senator mind telling me what was the decision of the Supreme Court? I understood it to propound a case of nonjurisdiction in that particular case.
Mr. EDGE. I can not discuss the legal features of the decision of the Supreme Court; I would not attempt to do it for one moment; but, in a general way, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States certainly reversed the decision of the lower court in Michigan, not only as to jurisdiction, but it at least stated in effect that the lower court in Michigan had no power or right under the law to indict and convict, or I assume it would not have reversed its decision.
Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but upon the ground of a lack of Federal jurisdiction in the particular case.
Mr. EDGE. I can not undertake to discuss the technical features.
Mr. WILLIAMS. I will withdraw the question and let the Senator go on, because it is very necessary that he should complete what he is reading.
Mr. EDGE. I am entirely ready to answer the question.

Now, Mr. President, what are the facts? I am not going to make any effort—I thought I would reach what the Senator from Mississippi has in mind, to some extent—I am not going to make any effort to discuss the legal side of the question. I am not capable of entering into such a discussion. I was the only layman who served on the subcommittee, and to a large extent I must reach my conclusion from the layman's viewpoint. So far as the legal standpoint is concerned, it seems to me that that was well and ably and properly disposed of when the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decision of the court of Michigan, and in effect declared that the indictments and convictions there were contrary to the law and should therefore be reversed. Perhaps that is not the exact language that the learned Senator from Mississippi would use, but the effect, I contend, is just the same.

So far as concerns the moral crime involved, or an analysis such as a layman must necessarily make, I think I can sum up my view in a very few sentences.

In the first place, the subcommittee was confronted by two general charges on the part of Henry Ford designed to bring about the unseating of Senator Newberry—one that he did not receive a majority of votes cast, and the other violation of the election statutes.

The first charge has been dropped. After the expenditure of much time and considerable money on the part of the Government of the United States, a complete recount of the ballots was carried out, and it was proved beyond the doubt of any member of the committee, either Democrat or Republican, that Senator Newberry had received a clear majority of the votes cast at the election; so this charge was dropped and is no part of the final conclusion of either a majority or minority of the committee.

So much for that.

The general charge of violation of the law, of course, was tried in the Federal court in Michigan, and indictments and convictions secured; and, as I have already stated, the entire proceedings were reversed by the highest court in the land.

Now we come to the moral side as it would naturally be viewed by a populace inflamed by denunciation and partisanship. True, the expenditure of approximately $200,000 by the Newberry committee shocked the morals of the public, and properly so; and your committee clearly expressed this view in the report before you, and it is at this expenditure that most of the criticism and denunciation seem to have been leveled.

But, Mr. President, a solemn consideration of our oath and the exercise of our high privilege and what it means to an honored fellow citizen would not for one moment justify us in voting to unseat Senator Newberry if he has committed no crime; and I contend it has been proven by the evidence that Senator Newberry violated no law of the State of Michigan or of the United States, and that he stands to-day absolutely innocent of any crime against society or the Government. The fact that the moral conscience of the public has been aroused because of this huge expenditure—and it has been—is, however, in itself no justification for disgracing Senator Newberry if he be innocent of wrongdoing and was not in any sense a party to either the acquisition or the expenditure of this campaign fund which had its origin and its use in a committee independent of Mr. Newberry. Out of the hundreds of pages of evidence taken before the committee I defy anyone to point to one line which proves that Senator Newberry violated any law.

There was no denial on the part of his committee that this large sum of money was expended in his campaign. As required by the laws of Michigan, a complete statement of these expenditures was filed with the proper State official; and, as I recall the figures, three-fourths of the large sum was spent for the entirely legitimate purpose of advertising, in order to offset to some extent the propaganda of years before which had advertised his opponent, Mr. Ford.

Do not misunderstand me, Mr. President. I am not endeavoring to condone for one moment the absolute evil of spending these large sums to elect men to office, whether spent legitimately or otherwise; but when it becomes our duty and our responsibility to decide by our votes whether a fellow Member of this body shall be disgraced for life or otherwise, then I think it becomes our first duty to decide for ourselves, irrespective of other conditions, whether or not this man has violated his oath or the laws of the land.

The laws of Michigan do not prohibit the spending of money for the purpose for which this sworn report demonstrated this money was expended. The laws of Michigan, as I understand them, place no limit upon the amount of money that can be expended for these purposes. I consider such lack of limitation very unfortunate, but you can not blame or hold up to public disgrace Senator Newberry because Michigan does not so limit the expenditures.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. EDGE. I do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Is not the Senator mistaken when he says that the laws of Michigan do not prohibit the expenditure of this amount of money by the candidate himself?

Mr. EDGE. I have not referred, either directly or indirectly, to the candidate spending it. I am referring to a committee spending it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does not the law say that for the specific purposes which this report covered—of course, I take it that other purposes, as well, were covered under these heads—the candidate himself can not expend or have expended exceeding, I think, $3,700? The law states that that amount can be expended for those purposes, and it does not allow the expenditure of anything whatever for other purposes by the candidate, and yet this man's campaign manager expended two hundred and odd thousand dollars, and in my opinion Mr. Newberry knew of it.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator has asked me a question entirely apart from any statement that I made. So far as the contributions from the candidate himself are concerned, my recollection is that the law permits the personal contribution to primaries of $3,750; and as I recall further, and also from listening to the statement of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], he did not contribute one penny to the primary, but did contribute $1,500, I believe, to the general election; so the expenditure of the candidate does not enter into the argument at all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It does not come in——

Mr. EDGE. Just a moment. The Senator has asked me a question, and I will try to answer it. As far as the committee is concerned, as I recall the evidence, the corrupt practices statute of Michigan does not place any limitation upon the expenditures of a committee for advertising purposes. I have not a copy of the act before me, but if there is a limitation it certainly was not exceeded, by the sworn statement of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There is no limit on the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. EDGE. I will answer the question of the Senator from Mississippi, if I can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it or is it not true that the contestant from Michigan swore in the office of the Secretary of the Senate that he had not spent a dollar, and, so far as he knew, nobody else had spent a dollar in his behalf, or with his knowledge, in order to secure his nomination and election? Is that true or not?

Mr. EDGE. That is another legal question which the Senator has propounded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it is not a legal question; it is a question of fact.

Mr. EDGE. Senator Newberry is not the contestant in this case, to start with.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did make a little mistake in the last syllable. I should have said the "contestee."

Mr. EDGE. The Senator honors me by considering that I can even discuss legal questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it or is it not true that the contestee made oath in the office of the Secretary of the Senate that he had not spent a dollar, and that nobody else, to his knowledge or with his consent, had spent a dollar in his behalf for the nomination or for the election? Is that true or not, as a matter of fact?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I can only answer the Senator from Mississippi by referring him to the language of the Senator from Michigan, in what I think was a very comprehensive explanation of the words.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not asking about the language of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator must permit me to answer his question in my own way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did he or did he not make that statement under oath?

Mr. EDGE. He made a qualifying statement, that no additional money, or words to that effect, had been spent with his knowledge or consent, and he described that in his statement a few moments ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How was the statement qualified? I have seen the affidavit. There is no qualification accompanying it that I remember.

Mr. EDGE. I can not repeat the statement. I do not remember the exact words of the statement. I can simply refer the Senator to the Secretary's office, and he can discuss the statement, and if he considers that it is an illegal statement that is a matter for his judgment. I think the statement was made as a statement would be made by an honest man who realizes and recognizes, as he stated frankly, that a committee of his friends in Michigan were endeavoring to elect him Senator, or nominate him as Senator, and in order that there should be no misunderstanding of the affidavit required to be filed with the Secretary of the Senate he carefully wrote out in his own handwriting his position in the matter. I can not discuss it any further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator will pardon me a moment, because he and I are trying to arrive at the truth of this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield further?

Mr. EDGE. No, Mr. President; I have only a little more to say, and I desire to conclude.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I take it for granted we are trying to arrive at the truth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey declines to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Michigan either made the affidavit or he did not. The Senator from New Jersey declines to answer my question.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the Senator may put it that way if he wishes. I had just stated that I considered the lack of limitation a very unfortunate one, but you can not blame or fairly hold Senator Newberry up to public disgrace because Michigan does not so limit these particular expenditures.

Again, while I thoroughly appreciate that much has been made of the fact that a large proportion of the money raised for this campaign was contributed by members of Senator Newberry's family and close personal friends, still I again contend that outside of the moral effect that this fact excites Senator Newberry violated no law, and there is not one iota of testimony adduced before our committee that proves that Senator Newberry personally contributed one dollar for the primaries. He has taken his oath that he did not. No man brought before the committee in any way proved that this oath was false. The brightest lawyers representing Mr. Ford made every effort to infer that contributions from relatives and friends were in fact from Senator Newberry, but inferences can not and should not convict.

Mr. President, while I am in no way attempting to minimize the natural moral effect of such a situation, still again I must emphatically and unhesitatingly state that as the law did not prohibit it and no evidence in any way proves the guilt of Senator Newberry, then any Senator who feels under such circumstances that he is justified in unseating him is, in my judgment, taking a position—well, of course, he must and will be responsible to himself.

Mr. President, when I have the opportunity to vote for the retention of his seat by the Senator from Michigan I will do it with a clear conscience that I am performing my duty absolutely as I should perform it. Under all the conditions and circumstances, whatever the feeling may be against these large expenditures—and I thoroughly appreciate its justification—there is no reason, in my judgment, why we should disgrace a man who has been held to be, in the decision of the highest court in the land, and who from every particle of testimony brought out at our hearings is, innocent of crime.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I respectfully ask that I be allowed to proceed without interruption in the course of my remarks.

I am free to confess that for a time the question of Senator Newberry's right to retain his seat as United States Senator from the State of Michigan gave me much concern. The amount expended in behalf of his candidacy for the primary nomination is inordinately large, according to the majority report, about $195,000; according to the minority view, about $263,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator stated he did not care to be interrupted, and I do not care to interrupt him, but he has referred to the minority report.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I have.

Mr. POMERENE. The minority report stated that the minimum amount expended, as conceded, was $188,000. They only referred to the fact that it was claimed by the Ford interests that the amount was two hundred and sixty and odd thousand dollars. We made no finding on that.

Mr. STERLING. Very well. It was hard for me to conceive of the necessity of spending so large a sum in a fair election, and I was led to wonder whether or not it might not be a plain and logical inference from the amount, in connection with other evidence which the record might disclose, that the election had not been a fair one and that some part of the very large sum expended had been used unlawfully to prevent a fair and honest expression of the people's choice.

I yield to no one, Mr. President, in the contention that our elections must be free; free from bribery, free from corrupting influences, from intimidation or coercion of any kind. The voter at the primary, or at the general election, or in the making up of his mind as to how he shall vote at either, must be free to exercise his own individual choice, without fear of evil consequences to himself, without reward or promise of reward for himself.

Such freedom on the part of the electorate is necessary to the life of the Republic. The man who knowingly, by any of the means mentioned, interferes with, hinders, or prevents the exercise of that freedom, is an enemy of the Republic.

If Truman H. Newberry procured or sought to procure the Republican nomination for United States Senator at the primary election in the State of Michigan, in August, 1918, by interfering with, hindering or preventing the free choice of the people of that great State, or any number of the people—the electorate—then he should not be permitted to represent that State or its people in this body. But, Mr. President, his unfitness for a seat in this body must, I think, be shown by other evidence than proof simply that $195,000, or even $263,000, was spent in behalf of his candidacy in that primary campaign.

To illustrate, suppose Mr. King did tell Mr. Newberry that his primary campaign for Senator would cost "his friends" at least $50,000. I admit that he did. The contribution of that amount by "his friends" was, according to the opinion of Chief Justice White, the very thing "his friends" might do or make. And they might make the contribution with Senator Newberry's knowledge. Further, the contributions and expenditures need not be limited to $50,000; they could be made in any amount.

The fact that the contributions were made, and the fact that he knew they were made, if such be the fact, did not require him to withdraw his candidacy for the nomination. Nor did the contributions by his friends make them liable; they violated no law, State or Federal. Under the view that they did violate the law, the words of the Chief Justice become, indeed, pertinent, for he says:

> Under this view the greater the public service and the higher the character of the candidate, giving rise to a correspondingly complete and self-sacrificing support by the electorate to his candidacy, the more inevitably would criminality and infamous pulishment result, both to the candidate and to the citizen who contributed.

To same effect is the opinion of Mr. Justice Pitney, concurred in by Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Clarke.

Mere knowledge on the part of the candidate that he can not succeed unless more is spent in his campaign than the specified statutory limit does not come within the inhibition of the statute. While his candidacy may be the "occasion" of the expenditure, the fact of his knowledge does not make the candidate the cause of the expenditure.

These opinions, Mr. President, were delivered in criticism of the charge of the presiding Federal district judge to the jury before whom was tried the Newberry case. The statute under which Mr. Newberry and his codefendants were tried provides in terms, as follows:

> No candidate for * * * Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election any sum, in the aggregate, in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides: Provided, That * * * no candidate for United States Senator shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding $10,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election. * * *

The trial court having laid down certain rules for the guidance of the jury, proceeded with his instructions, as follows:

> (c) To apply these rules to this case: If you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant, Truman H. Newberry, at or about the time that he became a candidate for United States Senator, was informed and knew that his campaign for the nomination and election would require the expenditure and use of more money than is permitted by law, and with such knowledge became a candidate, and thereafter, by advice, by conduct, by his acts, by his direction, by his counsel, or by his procurement, he actively participated and took part in the expenditure and use of an excessive sum of money, of an unlawful sum of money, you would be warranted in finding that he did violate this statute known as the corrupt practices act.

Commenting on the instructions just quoted, the Chief Justice goes on to say:

> I see no escape from the conclusion that the instructions marked (c), which made application of the view of the statute stated in the previous passages (a) and (b), were in clear conflict with the text of the statute, and were necessarily of a seriously prejudicial nature, since in substance they announced the doctrine that under the statute, although a candidate for the office of Senator might not have contributed a cent to the campaign or caused others to do so, he nevertheless was guilty if he became a candidate or continued as such after acquiring knowledge that more than $3,750 had been contributed and was being expended in the campaign. The error in the instruction plainly resulted from a failure to distinguish between the subject with which the statute dealt—contributions and expenditures made or caused to be made by the candidate—and campaign contributions and expenditures not so made or caused to be made, and therefore not within the statute.

And that, Mr. President, would seem to be this case. The fact that there has been an investigation by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections and that we are acting on the report of that committee does not change the essential features or issues involved. Five of the Supreme Court justices held in the Newberry case that the Federal corrupt practices act which I have quoted, and for conspiracy in violating which Mr. Newberry and others were tried, is unconstitutional. Had they not reached this conclusion, had they had the occasion to examine the whole record, is there any question but that a majority of the court would have joined in a reversal of the judgment of conviction because of the obvious error in the instructions to the jury? Is there any doubt that the court would have been unanimous in their opinion that the charge was erroneous and prejudicially so?

I submit, is there any doubt that the court would have been unanimous in their opinion that this charge was erroneous and prejudicially so?

The charge to the jury was given on the trial for conspiracy to violate the Federal statute. The Michigan statute here invoked is hardly susceptible of a different interpretation than that given the Federal statute by these justices of the Supreme Court, so far as Mr. Newberry is concerned; but if it were susceptible of a different interpretation—one under which the principal defendant in the Newberry case would have been held liable—I should say without hesitation that the Michigan statute should, in our consideration of the pending question, be ignored. The Senate being the judge of the qualifications and election of its own Members, we have the undoubted legal right to ignore it. But I would place disregard of that statute on higher ground, and that is that the fitness or unfitness of any candidate should be made to depend upon contributions and expenditures made or caused to be made by the candidate, and not upon contributions or expenditures not so made.

Much stress is laid by the minority report upon the activities of so-called "hired workers," whose employment by Mr. King or the senatorial committee and the work done by them, it is alleged, was in violation of section 45 of the Michigan statute set out in the report. The names and the testimony of a number of workers are also set out in the report. On examination it will be found that much of, though not all, the work they did was work permitted under section 3830, which makes 11 different exceptions to the prohibitions against the payment out of money by the candidate himself or by the treasurer of any political committee. Among these exceptions is the one "for traveling expenses and personal expenses incident thereto, for printing, stationery, advertising, postage, and so forth; second, for dissemination of printed information to the public." Advertising is a comprehensive term. One definition is "to inform or notify, give notice or advise." If we accept that definition as applicable, advertising may be by word of mouth as well as by the printed page. Section 45 does not, of course, prohibit advertising or the work of disseminating printed information to the public. And my view is that it does not prohibit the creating of county or township or precinct organizations or organizations among particular nationalities, and an inspection of the record will disclose that this was a large part of the work in which the so-called hired workers were engaged, and for this they received expenses and compensation against which there was no prohibition. I grant there were some excesses in expenditures for and on behalf of hired workers; that Mr. King in his zeal did not guard as carefully as he should have done these outlays of money; but the men who were thus engaged and paid were not thereby bought or bribed to support Newberry. They were Newberry men to begin with. Moreover, I do not believe the entire record will show that any of the so-called hired workers ever gave, loaned, or paid, or promised to give, loan, pay, or deliver to a single voter any money or any other thing of value to secure his vote for Newberry or as a consideration for his refraining to vote for any other candidate.

There is then this outstanding, if not determining, fact, that great as was the amount of money expended, this campaign in behalf of Mr. Newberry seemed to be absolutely free from bribery or corruption or any attempt to bribe or corrupt any voter or class of voters. Mr. King was probably the master spirit in directing the campaign. I give him credit for putting it on a plane above methods which involved the corruption of the electorate.

A tremendous sum was spent in advertising and publicity—according to the majority report, $147,860.16. But the name of his opponent was a household word in every Michigan home. Mr. Newberry, although he had been Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Secretary of the Navy under President Roosevelt, held these places when the activities of the Navy were hardly in evidence. It had escaped my mind that he ever had held these positions. He was comparatively little known, and there was reason for thorough advertising and publicity. It was essential to the success of his campaign against at that time so formidable an opponent, and formidable largely because that opponent had been so thoroughly advertised throughout the length and breadth of the State. But the law fixed no limit on the amount that might be spent in advertising and publicity, and the only possible interest we can have in that question is as to whether it could have in any way interfered with the freedom and purity of the election. Suppose literature went to every home, office, shop, and store, to men in the fields; that the Senator's picture was on every billboard in every town, on every telegraph or telephone pole; who can say that it affected the free and untrammeled choice of the voters? Imagine the ridicule which would greet the man who charged that the advertising was a false and fraudulent pretense whereby his vote was secured, or that because of the advertising he voted under duress.

The minority lay stress upon Mr. Newberry's alleged part in the organization and activities of the committee. Mr. President, I see nothing in this to reflect upon the motives or integrity of the candidate. If he decided to run, he wanted Mr. Templeton, his business associate, to assist in the organization of a business men's committee in Detroit. What was there sinister about that?

Mr. Floyd was chosen secretary of the committee. Has anybody questioned the fitness of that selection or the character or veracity of Mr. Floyd?

Mr. King, as manager, wrote Mr. Newberry every day. That was natural. But when Mr. King wanted him to issue a declaration of views prepared by King, he declined on the ground that he thought it might be incompatible with his position as naval commander and that it might displease the Secretary. Was there anything reprehensible in that?

I pause to mention one feature of this contest and one feature of the cross-examination by the able and distinguished lawyer, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], whose integrity and ability I indeed esteem very highly. They dwelt on the expression used in one of Mr. Newberry's letters, "our publicity." What is there sinister about that? Of course, he knew that publicity was going on. He knew that it was occasioned by his candidacy, and it was entirely appropriate for him to speak of it as "our publicity," which did not at all involve any knowledge on his part of who was contributing to the campaign funds to pay for the advertising and publicity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I stated at the beginning that I would decline to yield. I asked that I should not be interrupted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask merely for information——

Mr. STERLING. I shall have to decline to yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The Senator from South Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Newberry gave positive instructions that no attack whatever was to be made upon Mr. Ford. Was this not praiseworthy on his part—an attitude not always assumed by candidates for the United States Senate even?

The minority must know that these incidents by themselves are of no consequence so far as the issues are concerned, but from them they would have us draw the wholly unwarranted inference that Mr. Newberry personally exercised control over the committee and personally knew all methods used in the solicitation and use of funds for his campaign. His own statement, the statements of King and others, Mr. Newberry's own position and duties in New York are a complete answer to this position of the minority.

In this effort to make Mr. Newberry the directing force of the primary campaign itself, his opponents put themselves into conflicting positions in regard to Mr. King. From one standpoint they see Mr. Newberry as supreme dictator, controlling and directing all, with Mr. Paul King as the subordinate, receiving and obeying orders, but from the other standpoint they view Mr. King—and I quote from page 13 of the minority report—as Mr. Newberry's "astute political manager, who had had as much political experience in campaigning as any other resident of the great State of Michigan."

Mr. Newberry is nowhere referred to as a politician nor did he have that reputation nationally or in the State. King was right when he said, "I ran that campaign." He consulted, as he says, with Commander Newberry from "time to time upon various matters connected with the campaign, but I did as my judgment dictated." Under the admissions of the minority report, Mr. King kept from Mr. Newberry knowledge of the financing. I read from page 13 of views of the minority, as follows:

> We have already pointed out his part in the organization, his intimacy with everything that related to the campaign excepting only knowledge of the financing, which Mr. King and his associates purposely, we think, kept away from him, because once it appears that he has participated in this financing, his is the responsibility, and he could not have made that campaign and kept within the financial limitations which are placed upon him or upon any other candidate by the primary statutes of Michigan.

Mr. President, this admission, I contend, is absolutely fatal to the case of the opposition. It first admits that knowledge of the financing was kept from Newberry by King and his associates; and, second, by giving the reason for withholding the knowledge of the financing from Newberry, the admission shows that it was deliberately done and in furtherance of what was considered a wise policy. It is the intrinsic evidence of the truth of the admission, and I say under that admission, Mr. President, for all there is in this record and for all we are trying Truman H. Newberry for, he stands exonerated. He did not know how the campaign was being financed, therefore he did not participate in the financing. Moreover, the admission is, in effect, that the liability of the candidate for expenditures under the primary statutes of Michigan is not greater than under the Federal statute under which Mr. Newberry and his codefendants were tried. As we have already shown, four Justices of the Supreme Court, including the late great and distinguished Chief Justice, held that unless the excessive contributions were made or caused to be made by the candidate, the candidate is not liable.

Under these opinions of the Justices, Mr. King and his associates were much more circumspect in not giving information in regard to the financing than they need to have been. They could have freely given him the names of all contributors to the campaign fund, together with the amounts contributed, even if in excess of the statutory limit, without making him the cause of the contributions or liable under any statute.

So, Mr. President, whatever may have been my concern about this case at the outstart, whatever my preconceived notions about the apparently inexecusable extravagance of these expenditures, how can I, in the light of this record and these opinions, which must appeal to every man as founded upon sound reason and the highest conceptions of justice, vote to unseat Senator Newberry? To do so may comport with the sense of fair play of others; I am not the keeper of their consciences, but it does not with mine.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. STERLING. I respectfully decline to yield. I so stated at the beginning, and I hope the Senator will excuse me.

It may seem strange that John S. Newberry, the Senator's brother, should have been so generous a contributor to this campaign—to the extent of $99,000, or a little more. It did to me at first. But I could not share in the implication that the transaction was only colorable; that it was really the money of Truman H. Newberry that was thus contributed, or at most it was money only loaned, and that if it has not been paid back it is a valid obligation owing from Truman H. to John S. Newberry.

Upon this question, if the evidence were evenly balanced, and we were considering with an open mind, free from prejudice, what should be the decision—one which involves guilt or one which recognizes a transaction consistent with the innocence of the party accused? Following all the rules and precedents of our Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, what must we do, convict or acquit? Of course, the rule in the criminal case is proof beyond all reasonable doubt. We might grant for the purposes of this proceeding that a preponderance of evidence should suffice. I do. But there is no preponderance of evidence against the accused. The evidence is not evenly balanced. It is all in favor of the accused, unless, indeed, we are willing to permit a bare suspicion arising from the apparent novelty of the transaction to outweigh and override the testimony of the only witnesses who knew its true nature. And if that is our attitude, are we qualified to sit as impartial jurors in the case?

Mr. Frederick P. Smith was the trustee and confidential agent of both Truman H. and John S. Newberry. He had from each of them a broad power of attorney. John S. Newberry left the matter of his contributions to his brother's campaign funds to Mr. Smith without placing any limit on the amount, and then went away—this in March, 1918. He had given Smith to understand that he was going to finance the campaign, and when he went away, left it all in Smith's hands, and the reason he gives for this action on his part, as expressed in his own language: "It was the love and loyalty and affection I had for my brother," and this was the reason he told Smith to "go ahead and use what money you want."

In pursuance of these broad instructions, and under his power of attorney, Mr. Smith made contributions to the campaign fund for Mr. John S. Newberry, the contributions being for the most part by check, payable to Mr. A. A. Templeton, general chairman of that committee, who, it must not be forgotten, purposely kept knowledge of the financing of the campaign from candidate Truman H. Newberry.

The checks drawn by Mr. Smith for campaign purposes were all drawn on the John S. Newberry account. Senator Wolcott, of the committee, questions Mr. Smith, as follows:

Senator WOLCOTT. I want to find about the checking out of these funds by you, Mr. Smith, to the Newberry primary committee. Those checks were all drawn against what account in your office?

Mr. SMITH. Against Mr. John S. Newberry's account.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you positive they were invariably drawn against that account and no other?

Mr. SMITH. Absolutely.

That was his answer, spoken apparently with the positiveness of a man who knew what he was talking about.

And then Mr. Smith tells how he transferred from the other accounts into John S. Newberry's to cover overdrafts, and that this was a procedure that had been current for years. There were 10 or 12 different Newberry interests represented by as many different personal accounts. There were the accounts of Truman H. and John S. Newberry, and their wives and sons. It was a family matter, apparently, and Mr. Smith was general factotum in whom all had confidence, and therefore the very comprehensive power of attorney he had to draw checks upon one to cover shortages or overdrafts in another, and to reimburse the account upon which any such check had been drawn.

Senator WOLCOTT again asks:

Then the funds in their two accounts went to keep the John S. Newberry account up to a sufficient fund so as to enable you to have enough money out of that account to pay these primary expenses?

Mr. SMITH. In case there were overdrafts they would make up enough balance to cover the overdraft.

Senator Wolcott now asks him the direct question:

Were those funds from Truman H. Newberry's account and Mrs. Truman H. Newberry's account to John S. Newberry returned in due course to those accounts from which they were originally taken?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

So, Mr. President, we have the testimony of Mr. John S. Newberry as to what he authorized Mr. Smith to do, and the purposes of the authorization, namely, to finance his brother's primary campaign, and the testimony of Mr. Smith as to what he did in pursuance of his authority. The motive of Mr. John S. Newberry, according to his own language, was the love, the loyalty, and affection that he had for his brother. Considering the relationship of the parties, the motives of loyalty and affection of John S. Newberry toward his brother, that in the matter of the accounts they were only acting according to a long-time practice, that it was in accord with the policy of the committee in respect to financing the campaign, I see nothing unreasonable in their version, and I must take the testimony of these unimpeached witnesses as to what was in fact done rather than yield to a suspicion that something else might have been done merely because it was within the range of possibilities for it to have been done.

Let us at least indulge in the ordinary presumptions, namely, that a man is innocent until proven guilty; that fraud is not intended; and that the man sworn to tell the truth is, when on the witness stand under oath, telling the truth.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I had no acquaintance whatever with Mr. Newberry before he came to the Senate. I had never seen him. I have had little opportunity to cultivate his acquaintaince since he came. In the position I take on this question there is, therefore, no personal tie to bind, no personal interest to serve. My sense of duty and responsibility as a Senator alone has been my guide in considering the question whether he shall be permitted to retain his seat.

I know I am accountable to the people of my State for what I do here; but, Mr. President, in my nearly 40 years of residence in South Dakota I have learned not to fear but to trust the people of that progressive State, and whether I am right or wrong on any given question, I know they will believe that I have spoken or voted according to the dictates of my conscience and my best judgment. In this case, as in others, I leave the issue with them to consider and decide.

With no evidence whatever to show that Mr. Newberry committed or caused to be committed any act in violation of law, either State or Federal, or that he participated in or connived at any violation of the law; with no evidence to show that the election was vitiated by the bribery by others of enough voters to overcome his majority, or that he disqualified himself by the bribery or attempt to bribe a single voter, or that he disqualified himself by any other unlawful act, I can not find it in my heart to vote that he is not entitled to his seat. The great essential is, after all, was this a fair and free election, where every citizen was absolutely free to vote for the man of his choice, without coercion, fraud, intimidation, bribery, or corrupt practice of any kind that would induce him to vote otherwise than his free choice? To my mind, Mr. President, the evidence shows conclusively that it was that kind of an election.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a lawyer is a curious creature. He can split a hair betwixt the nor' and nor'west side and maintain the respect of his audience while he is doing it. There are all sorts of lawyers, of course, and in the very highest class of lawyers I place the Senator who has just taken his seat, Mr. STERLING, a man of fine feeling, a man of an acute sense of ethics, but yet a lawyer; and when he undertakes to argue a case of any description as a lawyer he argues as a lawyer and does not argue as a man nor even as a candidate for office.

I think I remember, unless I am mistaken, that when the Senator first came to this body the main reason which he gave for his election at the hands of the people was that his opponent had voted to seat Lorimer in this body. Lorimer had bought an election in Illinois. He had bought it from the hands of the legislature. He had not bought it from the source of original power, the people themselves, in a primary. Therefore Lorimer was a very much less guilty party than the Senator's present client. I do not mean by that his private client; I mean his partisan client; his political client upon this occasion. If I am not mistaken, the Senator owes his seat in this body to the fact that he rose in magnificent indignation against a man who dared, as a Member of this body, compromise his integrity by voting to allow Lorimer to retain a seat here.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will just allow me to say so——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will differ from the Senator. He declined to let me interrupt him; but as I am not reading what I say, and am not afraid of getting "off my trolley," as the Senator as a lawyer perhaps might have been, I will permit him to interrupt me.

Mr. STERLING. I did not grow personal in any statements I made, nor did I intend to be; so the Senator had no such excuse for interrupting me as I have, I think, for interrupting him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not being personal. I am simply speaking from the record.

Mr. STERLING. I remember something about the Lorimer case and the two investigations of the Lorimer case, and I remember that the investigation was had upon a memorial from the Legislature of Illinois charging Mr. Lorimer with bribery and corruption in bribing certain members of the Illinois Legislature.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to enter into the details of the Lorimer case. I argued that, you know.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; that is all right; but that was altogether a different case, not parallel to the case at bar at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are not parallel in one respect only. Mr. Lorimer bribed the legislature, while Mr. Newberry expended a very large amount of money at the primary. Whether he bribed anybody directly or not I am not quite certain; nor was it ever proven in the Lorimer case that Mr. Lorimer gave A, B, C, D a number of dollars. It was merely proven that Mr. Lorimer had spent a whole lot of money, and had had a whole lot of meetings, and a whole lot of "winings," and a whole lot of dinings, and that at the end of it Mr. Lorimer had been "elected."

Mr. President, that is the difference between a man who appears before the people to be elected to an office and a man who appears before the Senate as a shrewd, honest lawyer defending a case—defending a case—defending a case. Why should it need defense? Why is any defense necessary? Was any needed for the Senator from South Dakota when he came to this body? Was any needed for me when I came here? Was any needed for the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] when he came here?

Another Senator preceded the Senator from South Dakota a few minutes ago, and he also read a defense—afraid to get off the trolley, afraid to speak from the heart, afraid to speak from the head. You must have it all drawn up beforehand like a lawyer's brief, and you must read it, and you must announce beforehand that you do not intend to be "heckled," and you do not intend to be interrupted.

Mr. President, whenever a man engaged in the public discussion of a public question in a public body declines to be interrupted and declines to answer questions, it is generally because he has something to conceal—not necessarily morally, but at least mentally; at least logically, something to conceal. No man ever was afraid of an interruption who had nothing to conceal. He welcomes it, because it may help him to think on his feet, and, helping him to think on his feet, may help him to clasp his argument and to rivet it on the other side.

Oh, Mr. President, "the loyalty and affection he bore his brother"! Did you notice that? It was like a lawyer appealing to a jury on behalf of the family. It all came from "the loyalty and affection he bore his brother"! [Laughter in the galleries.] Utterly pathetic, is it not? And yet, Mr. President, if everything in the world in politics is to be excused——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). The Senator from Mississippi will suspend for just a moment. The occupants of the galleries will preserve order and not show signs of approval or disapproval of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What did the Chair say? I did not hear him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will proceed with his address.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right. I do not yet understand why I was interrupted, but I will go ahead.

I find that a good deal of this corruption, a good deal of this immense money fund, a good deal of this irresponsible distribution of it, a good deal of this lack of knowledge of where it came from and whither it went, is owing to "the loyalty and affection he bore his brother"! Some day I am going to write a little comic tragedy and I am going to call it "A Family Affair, or The Newberry Case." Then I am going to picture all the brothers, and then the wife, and then the wife's brothers and the wife's other relations, and all of the Newberry family, all of them, contributing to an immense fund to carry through a primary in a State of the American Union and each of them as he comes in and deposits his check, running up in the aggregate to nearly $300,000, as I remember—although I believe the Senator said $200,000—each one of them as he comes in upon the arena and deposits his check is going to say, "For the loyalty and affection I bear my brother." Another one will say, "For the loyalty and affection I bear my wife," "For the loyalty and affection I bear my son-in-law," "For the love and affection I bear my brother-in-law," "For the loyalty and affection I bear my sister's brother."

Mr. President, we do not need lawyers in this case; we need honest men. We need men who can speak to the American people with honest hearts, who have nothing to conceal and nothing to evade.

I did not really expect it, but I expressed the hope here the other day that when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEBERRY] should have made his statement I hoped I might find it possible to clear stain from two great families, two honest families, two typically American families—his own and his wife's.

Mr. President, I listened to the Senator from Michigan to-day. I listened to him with a sympathizing feeling, personally speaking. I did not hear one word from him which was not a word of evasion, evasion of the issue, evasion of the fact that nearly a third of a million dollars had been expended in Michigan in a primary election. Will one of you tell me, or dare tell me, that that amount of money can be honestly expended in a primary election in any State of the American Union for legitimate and honest purposes? You know it can not be. You are liars in your hearts if you say it can be. I would be a liar in my heart if I said it, anyhow. I shall have been in public life 30 years when my term expires on the 4th of next March, and I have never seen the time when I needed over $7,000 in the State of Mississippi to carry me through a primary election throughout the entire State. The heaviest expense I was ever put to was $6,833 and some cents.

Do you tell me that for the "loyalty and affection I bear my brother," for the loyalty and affection I bear my husband, for the loyalty and affection I bear my cousin, for the loyalty and affection I bear my brother-in-law, $300,000 is needed to make the intelligent people of the State of Michigan—I presume they are intelligent—find out what man they are going to vote for in a primary election of the Republican Party, which pretends to be the party of intelligence everywhere? Of course, it is not, but it pretends to be, and I have a right to take them at their word for that, and I have a right to assume that the Republican Party in Michigan is composed of fairly intelligent sort of "folks," quite up to the level of "folks" in Mississippi. The Republicans will contend they are quite above it, but does it take almost $300,000 to quiet the conscience and convince "the intelligence" of the most "intelligent element" of the population of the State of Michigan?

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] knows, and I know, that if he spent that amount of money in his State, or if I spent it in mine, or if any of the people spent it for us, even though we swore that it was "without our knowledge and consent," there must be rottenness in that particular Denmark.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Mississippi was interrupted by my very dear old friend, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], when reference was made to the vote of his predecessor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care anything about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from South Dakota interrupted the Senator from Mississippi to say that the Lorimer case, to which the Senator from Mississippi referred, was radically different from the case before us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just said it was not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He pointed out that proceedings were instituted in the Lorimer case because of a memorial by the Legislature of the State of Illinois. I want to have the permission of the Senator to interrupt him to show that these cases are not at all different in that respect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care about that. I am arguing this case now, not the Lorimer case. The Senator will pardon me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to read a part of this record touching the matter referred to by the Senator, namely, that there was a memorial.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood what the Senator wanted to do, but I just said I did not care about it. I understand the Lorimer case. I argued it, I voted on it, I know all about it, and it is not "radically different." When we say there is a "radical" difference, we mean a difference going to the roots of a controversy.

The root of that controversy and the root of this controversy are exactly the same, to wit, corruption, corruption by money. That is not all; they are alike in another respect. There was a very strong social influence in Washington for Lorimer, and there is a strong social influence in Washington to-day for Newberry.

"Radically" different? The two cases do not even differ from one another superficially. The only difference between them was the object upon which the money was to be applied. In one case it was the legislature, and in the other case it was that superabundant intelligence which composes the Republican Party, voting at a primary.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator allow just a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. So much reference has been made to the Lorimer case that I desire to ask the Senator if there is any evidence in this case that a single voter was offered a dollar for his vote.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. STERLING. Was there not evidence in the Lorimer case that money, a thousand dollars or more, was offered to a legislator to vote for Lorimer?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator is again being a lawyer; he is again evading the issue. This record is chock full of evidence that man after man was "paid for his time" when he went out to advocate the nomination of Mr. Newberry. Is there a man in this body who is a gentleman, is there a man in this body who is honest, who will allow any human being to "pay for his time" for advocating a man for a public office upon the ground that he was best fitted for a public trust? The Lorimer case suffered from paucity of proof by comparison with this one.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, does the Senator from Mississippi see any difference between paying a man for his time in disseminating literature or in organizing a county for that man and a man being paid for his vote?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned I see a difference between a man being paid for his vote and a man being paid for services performed in a campaign in the way of distribution of literature; but as far as I am concerned I can see no difference between a man being paid for his vote and a man being paid for trying to get another man to vote for the candidate. I see this difference, if it be a difference, that if I sell my vote I sell something that theoretically belongs to me, and if I sell the vote of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]—if any human being under God had that power—I would be selling something that did not belong to me but belonged to him, and I would have to divide the spoils somehow, thus doubling the corruption.

Mr. President, there is no use trying to evade this issue. There is no use trying to disguise it. Nearly $300,000 were expended. Who denies it? The Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the subcommittee? No. My good friend who has just interrupted me? No. Then why was it expended? Is there an honest man in the sound of my voice who does not know why? Editors received a lot of it, not merely to publish advertisements of the candidate's writing at so much per line but to advocate the candidate. Billy goats in their particular communities who led the goatherd were paid so much for their time, hoping that the other goats, male and female, would jump over the fence after them; and the other goats did, to a very large extent.

Do not try to evade the issue. Do not be dishonest with one another on this floor, or with the people of Michigan, or with the other people of the United States. You know and I know that $300,000 invested in a primary election, in the ordinary "piping times of peace," at that, was not innocently invested.

Then the Senator tells me that there was a holy alliance, or an entente cordiale, between the executive committee which spent the money and the candidate, under the terms of which the candidate "must not be informed." In other words, all you have to do to violate the State laws or the Federal laws in a primary is to pass around the word to a committee of your own naming, "Do whatever you darned please, boys, but don't tell me about it. Don't say anything to me about it until after I have made my oath in the office of the Secretary of the Senate."

My friends, what was that oath, and what is generally an oath before you speak about it? It is an attestation in the presence of God, while a man makes a statement. He calls on the great Almighty to witness that, without mental reservation, without evasion, what he is saying is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. That is an oath, and an oath made in the office of the Secretary of the Senate is an oath not at all different although made in the anteroom of this august body.

Do you think that a statement in the presence of God to the effect that although I had definite or indefinite knowledge that certain men were doing certain things and expending indefinite moneys in my behalf, though I had charged them or they had charged me, or one another, not to have any personal communications upon the question, would hide me from the wrath of God at judgment?

Here is the oath. I have the original. It is in his handwriting:

I have not received any money or thing of value, nor has anyone else received for me any money or thing of value with my knowledge or consent—from any source to aid or support my candidacy for election as United States Senator.

Is there a man within the sound of my voice who believes that is true? Oh, my friends, it is a horrible thing to accuse a gentleman of perjury. It requires the great weight of public obligation to make any man do it, especially a good-natured man.

From any source with my consent—

Not foreknowledge merely but consent—

from any source to aid or support my candidacy for election as United States Senator. I have not given, contributed, expended, used, or promised any money or thing of value, nor has any money or thing of value been contributed or expended or used or promised—

Now and then we can thank God for a lawyer when he uses so many verbs that nobody can escape perjury when he swears to them—by my agent, representative, or other person—

Not only agent or representative but "or other person"— for or in my behalf, with my knowledge or consent, for the purpose of promoting my election as United States Senator.

Now, do you believe that? Do you believe it? Is there a Senator around me who believes that is true? You know that it is as false as the gates of hell. I have him in his own handwriting again:

The campaign for my nomination for United States Senator—

Here he is hedging just a bit; watch it—has been voluntarily conducted by friends in Michigan.

Voluntarily conducted! When you [referring to Mr. CUMMINS] ran for Senator in Iowa, the whole business was just voluntarily carried on among your friends, and you did not have anything to do with it. When I ran in Mississippi, I "did not want" to be elected. The boys were just electing me "voluntarily," you know, and whenever they did anything it was just voluntary upon their part and I "did not have anything to do" with it. I was deus ex machina, or really outside of the machine, looking down upon it and had nothing to do with it at all particularly, and they were just voluntarily electing me because they loved the office so much and they loved me so much that they wanted us united and never wanted us divorced.

Do you believe that?

He goes on:

The campaign for my nomination as United States Senator has been voluntarily conducted by friends in Michigan—

I reckon by that that he did not even have to announce himself as a candidate—

I have taken no part in it whatever—

Now, Senators, I wish you would watch that. Of course, as the "niggers," say, he may have "overspoke himself," but still he is not a "nigger." He was a lieutenant commander in the Navy. He was Assistant Secretary of the Navy at one time. He is now seeking to be a Senator of the United States. This is written in his own handwriting—

I have taken no part in it whatever.

Do you believe that? If there are six Senators on this floor who believe that, they are not fit to be Senators, because they are too gullible for anything.

No contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge or consent.

"Or consent." Even after the primary, up to the date of the time he took this oath. It might have been consent after the time, but he swears it was not even that.

No promise nor pledge has been made by me or anyone in my behalf with my knowledge or consent.

And the record is full of the promises and pledges. But this is continued:

I further certify that no promise or pledge has been made by me, or by anyone for me with my knowledge or consent or to whom I have given authority to make such promise or pledge, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in a county, State, or the Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment, for the purpose of procuring the support of such person or any person in my candidacy as aforesaid.

And here are all these men going around and being paid "for their time." I see before me a Member of Congress from the good State of Louisiana. What do you reckon would happen to a candidate in Louisiana or to a candidate in Mississippi if he went to a man and said, "I want you to help me, but I want to pay you for your time?" We may be barbarous down there, but I believe about the third man I made that proposition to would shoot me.

Here is another one:

I have not received any money nor thing of value, nor has anyone else received for me any money or thing of value with my knowledge or consent, and I have not contributed, expended, used, or promised any money or thing of value, nor has any money or thing of value been contributed, expended, used, or promised to an agent, representative, or other person, for or in my behalf, with my knowledge or consent.

Now, Senators, these affidavits were made before the Secretary of the Senate. If the usual forms were gone through with the man Newberry raised his right hand, attesting the presence of God, while he made the statement "in the presence of God." Do any of you believe the statement? Do any of you believe he believed it when he made it? Do any of you believe that the clerk who received it believed it?

Some of my Democratic colleagues have warned you that if you dared to vote to seat Newberry you would be unseated. I do not participate in that warning. I know better. I remember a story once when old Thad Stevens was in the House of Representatives when there was a contested-election case and, Mr. President, I will be excused, I hope, on the score of quotation—he stepped into the House quite quickly, and turned to Morton of Indiana, and he said, "Morton, which is our son of a gun?" Being informed, he voted accordingly without the slightest knowledge of the evidence.

I do not believe the people of Iowa would send the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to private life because he voted to seat Newberry. They would say, "Oh, well, he was a Republican; the Republicans were wound up that way, and they were going to do it that way anyhow, moral law or no moral law, code or no code. A contested election is sort of a party affair of some sort, so let him go easy this time."

But if you think your party can escape the burden, not you individually, but your party, you are mistaken. You can no more escape it than you could ever have escaped the burden of seating Lorimer. You can no more escape it than you can escape the party burden of any other useless and semicriminal thing.

Mr. President, I have no sort of personal feeling against the contestee. While he was in Washington years ago he treated me very nicely. He has always been very nice to me since. If I could find it within my heart to vote to help him keep this seat, if I could find it within my heart to say upon my conscience and honor that he was an honest, truthful man, who in those oaths before the Secretary of the Senate had told the truth as he thought it to be, I would vote for him. But I do not believe him. I can not believe him.

Mr. President, when the Pretorian Guard sold the Roman Empire to Didius Julianus, they had sufficient decency afterwards to go out and execute Didius Julianus and sell the empire over again to another fellow, and then after they had sold it to him they had sufficient decency to execute him, and then gave it without price to the great Roman imperator who illustrated his faithfulness to the Roman Empire by his services against the barbarians.

If you Republicans are going to seat this man with one or two half preachers and laymen before you leading the fight, for God's sake put the blamed office up again for another sale and let somebody else buy it, and then after the other fellow buys it, refuse to seat him and let somebody else then honestly elected take the place. I said honestly elected. I did not mean that. I mean honestly nominated. Of course, a yellow dog could have been elected Republican Senator that year, so far as the general election was concerned, in the State of Michigan, but if I understand it correctly, the usual majority in the State of Michigan had been about 125,000, and such was the revulsion of the morals of even the so-called better element, the "intellectual element" of the people of Michigan—the Republican element—that somehow or other Newberry got a majority of only between 2,000 and 3,000. I do not remember the figures, but it went down under 10,000 from having been above 100,000.

Do you not think you had better take a little warning from that lesson? If that many dyed-in-the-wool, arrogant Republicans in Michigan, who imagine that they have been specially created by the Lord Almighty to be a superior element, went back on Newberry anyhow and reduced the majority of over 100,000 down to less than 10,000, do you not think you had better take warning for your party's sake?

Perhaps, after a while they might have a good all-around conscience, instead of a merely "respectable Republican Party conscience"; and if they should have, there is no telling what might happen in Michigan. I am not hoping much from it, because I have always found that the Republican rank and file, under the Republican leaders, are ready to do anything for Republican success, even to the crucifixion of the greatest character that has appeared in two centuries upon the arena of the world; but it might be well to take a little warning.

The Senator who has just taken his seat made another argument. He said this man King cleared Newberry of all offense because King rose up, swelled out his breast, probably threw back his head and said, "I ran that campaign." Well, I have had party leaders run my campaigns, too; so have other Senators; but they never ran them without our knowledge or consent, did they? We were not asses enough just to leave them to do whatever they blamed please while we stay back, silent—unknowing, unsqueaking—poor, little, innocent, fat creatures, with rubicund countenances and heavy jaws and half-sleepy eyes—stand back in the rear and say, "Let the boys do what they please; it does not affect me. It is true I am a candidate, but that does not bother me. My brother is going to see me through on account of his love and affection; all my wife's relatives are going to see me through on account of their loyalty and affection, and really, you know, I am not running except temperamentally as a nominee." "I think I am a candidate, I halfway asked to be a candidate, and have put in an application for that purpose, but really it does not concern me a bit. I have nothing to do with it." "For God's sake, boys, don't tell me anything about it." The Senator from South Dakota says King said "he ran the campaign" and that that took all the burden off Newberry. Then he quoted King long afterwards as saying, "We purposely kept away from Mr. Newberry"—and then I missed the balance of the Senator's statement, because he was speaking and I was writing—but he purposely kept away from him all they had to do; that was the substance of it.

Mr. President, the United States Senate calls itself an "august body," but I came to the conclusion some time ago that it is not very august, considering the original Latin definition of the word "august," but still it is a respectable body. If, however, the time has come when a man, either through a primary or through a general election, can buy his way into this body through his friends and his relations and his wife's relations, especially when he is so stupid as to have it all "happen" "without his knowledge or consent," "before the fact or after the fact," then this body ceases to be respectable. It not only ceases to be respectable but it ceases to be intelligent, because if men of that kind are to be seated here we are going to fill up this body with absolute fools, for if what the junior Senator from Michigan says is true he is an ass without sense enough to get out of the rain.

Is there one of you who believes that his very best friends and all his wife's relatives and all his relatives could have carried on a campaign in his State involving an expenditure of $300,000, and he have known nothing about it? Is there one of you who believes that if you were he and had known anything about it you would have come up and taken that oath before the Secretary of the Senate, and said that it "happened" "without your knowledge or consent" and that you had not spent a dollar and that nobody else had done so with your knowledge or consent in order to promote your nomination or election? Could you do that if it were true without being a fool, and could you have done it if it were untrue without being perjured? Could any man or any number of people go out into the State of Missouri and spend $300,000 for the Senator from Missouri in an election and the Senator from Missouri know nothing about it? If he did know anything about it, would he come here and swear that he did not? The Senator knows he would not. The old Presbyterian bluestocking covenanters behind him, even though they are dead, would rise in their graves and kick him out. Such a thing could not happen without his knowledge or consent; and if it did happen with his knowledge or consent he would not swear that it had happened without his knowledge or consent for fear of being mistaken for an unadulterated ass.

Mr. President, we do not need any lawyers in this case. One thing which made me always believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ was His prejudice against scribes, pharisees, and lawyers. Lawyers always quibble around about words and split hairs here and there. I say that without any prejudice against the profession, of which I am myself a member, as my father was, as my grandfather was, as his grandfather was, and his grandfather's grandfather was. But lawyers do finally acquire the habit of quibbling. They do finally acquire the habit of splitting hairs; they do finally acquire the habit of being advocates; they do finally acquire the habit of taking a side, and then trying to find out a reason for having taken it, instead of first ascertaining the reasons and then taking the side.

I do not believe there is a Senator in this Chamber who can read the record in this case, with all of the letters which passed between Smith and King and the contestee, and all the proof as to the editors and the workers and the other people being hired to perform services, without coming to the conclusion to which I have come.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] the other day took a position which seemed to me very curious for him—I do not say it for an ordinary man, but I say "for him"—that it is perfectly right for a candidate to hire men to go around and blow his horn and advocate his election.

Mr. President, what is an election? It is an appeal by two or three or four men to the electorate for an office, and in making the appeal each one thinks or ought to think, or else he ought not to be a candidate, that he is the best fitted by training, by native ability, by honest intent or otherwise, to fill the position. To hire a man to go out and tell other people that you are by intent or native ability or training best fitted to fill a position is bribery. For a friend to go out and of his own accord say all of that because he believes it is loyalty, and loyalty is the highest virtue of which mankind is capable. If I would say of the Senator from Missouri, if I were a citizen of his State, "I think he is honest; I think he is competent; I think he is able"—to use Thomas Jefferson's phrase as to the test of an officeholder—that would express my loyalty to a superiority, mental or moral, and would put me in the category of those who are capable of a feeling outside of and above themselves; but when I am paid $5 a day, or $20, or $50, or $100, as some of these men were, to do that I am a contemptible—Oh, Mr. President, I despair of expression; there is no parliamentary language in which to say what.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thank the Senator from Alabama. Mr. President, when the Senator from Mississippi was descanting upon the criticisms made in his first campaign by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota against his predecessor for having voted to seat Mr. Lorimer he was interrupted by my very good and dear friend the Senator from South Dakota, who said that there was a marked difference between the case before us and the Lorimer case, and the particular difference to which he adverted was that in the Lorimer case the Senate of the United States had been memorialized by the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

Mr. President, the Legislature of the State of Michigan did not memorialize Congress in connection with this particular matter, but the lieutenant governor of the State of Michigan in his inaugural address called the attention of the Senate of the United States and of the country to the matters which have been under investigation and discussion here, and in that connection publicly as a part of his official inaugural address, made the following statement:

> Primary elections will call for action on your part. From what has occurred during the past political campaign it would afford me relief if I could pass by this question, but experience teaches that the disagreeable acts of an office are the ones people demand the most strenuously. More communications on this line asking for legislative action have come to me by far than all others combined, and almost without exception Republicans, not only from all parts of Michigan but from other States.
> This, you know, is the outgrowth of a candidacy that doubtless cost more money than ever before was paid for a nomination for office in all the world's history.
>
> You also know this candidacy from one of the best-known families of the State, of a man of high standing, unquestioned integrity, and acknowledged ability, in the face of an abnormally large party majority, came near an ignominious defeat through the resentment from nearly every voting precinct in the State, of the farmer, the laborer, the business and professional voter, because of the enormous amount of money acknowledged to have been used in his behalf, and generally believed to have been used contrary to laws several sections of which were enacted for the stipulated purpose of restricting the use of large sums of money in campaigns.
> The case is now agitating Congress, the Federal and Michigan courts, with a strong suspicion by many that for political purposes it will be there suspended as long as possible before the country at large as an unsavory act of Republican primary in Michigan, hoping by such course to produce an effect that will deprive the party of the majority secured at the November elections.
>
> If the courts had given a decision as to who is to blame for this undesirable condition it would have cleared the way for your action. If, however, there is any question as to violation of the primary statute it should be so amended that the interpretation relative to restrictions in the use of money and who to blame for violation shall be made plain and simple.
>
> In legislative action I believe the utmost caution should be used to climinate the name of any candidate and avoid all appearance of politics in considering this subject. The individual or even party interests are of but little note when the sanctity of the ballot and safety of democracy are at stake.
>
> From almost every part of the State have come to me pleas that this legislature make it impossible in the future to witness the sale of a public office on the auction block, but rather that the laborer, the farmer, the business, or professional voter, however humble, but able and respectable, may have a chance with the man of millions.
> The war's end has been termed a victory for safe democracy. No democracy is safe with a polluted primary or election, made so by money or otherwise. And no great amount of money will be used except for the purpose of making votes, and to make votes by the use of money is polluting, corrupting, and the user should be treated as a baser criminal than the laborer who steals a sack of flour for his family. * * *

I submit, Mr. President, that the Senate of the United States and the Committee on Privileges and Elections were no more at liberty to disregard this public declaration upon the part of one of the principal officers of the State of Michigan than they were at liberty to disregard the protest of the Legislature of the State of Illinois against the seating of Mr. Lorimer from that State.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have said here on two or three former occasions in the last week that this is the most important question that the Senate will be called upon to decide at this session or at any other session of Congress. We are trying to determine here whether the Senate of the United States will demand of every Member who comes here that his title be clean and clear, free from the lavish use of money, or whether we shall set up a new order of things and simply say that if the candidate will keep out of the State while the contest is on and finally come in here himself in his own behalf and say that his seat was bought without his knowledge or consent and that he personally was not a party to the bargain, that will be sufficient and the Senate will accept his statement and accept his credentials, and thus put the stamp of its approval upon the sale of a seat in the Senate.

That is the situation presented here to-day.

Mr. President, we listened this morning to the prepared statement of Mr. Newberry, prepared doubtless by some lawyer who knew how to dodge and evade, how to slip and slide around the cold facts in the case. He would not accept the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that he be given additional time to answer questions propounded to him by Senators who, under their oath, are to decide the question whether or not he is entitled to a seat in this body.

I must confess that his statement did not make a favorable impression upon me. I suppose that some Senators on the other side had insisted that he come in and make some kind of a statement. I have heard that some Senators on the other side said: "Unless he comes in here and makes a satisfactory statement about this whole thing I will vote against him." Now, I want to ask those Senators if they accept his statement to-day as one that is satisfactory?

He admits here from his own lips that nearly $200,000 were expended in his behalf in a primary for the Senate in the State of Michigan. He follows that by a statement that this money was necessarily spent. He follows it by a statement that he has no criticism to make of the committee that conducted his campaign; and if he has no criticism to make, he certainly indorses the conduct of his committee. Whether he criticizes the committee or not, whether he indorses its conduct or not, is not the question for us to determine here. The question that we must determine is, Are seats for sale in the Senate? I do not care whether they are bought by Mr. Newberry in person, bought by his brother, bought by his brother-in-law and the other relatives of the Newberry family, or bought by Wall Street, and some contributions were made by New York citizens. What difference does it make? Are seats in the Senate for sale? That is the question that the American people want us to determine.

Some Senators on the other side impress me with the idea that they look at this thing as if it were a case being tried between two profligate citizens. Senators, that is not the issue here. You have no right to permit your personal sympathy for Mr. Newberry to cause you to vote to seat him in this body. The Senate is an important public institution established by the founders of the Republic, and the people of the whole country are vitally interested in the outcome of a case that affects the honor and integrity of the Senate. They realize what its freedom from the lavish use of money in politics means to the American people.

Mr. President, could it have been imagined by those who achieved our independence, who died in the Continental Army to bring forth this Republic, to establish liberty in this Western World, that at some distant day so near as this a majority of the Senate would stand with uplifted hands before God and vote to seat in this body a man who had spent money amounting to more than $2 for every vote he received in the State primary for the Senate? Senators, are you going to vote for this man with that record behind him?

Mr. Newberry, I regret, did not accept the offer of additional time so that we could cross-question him. We wanted the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to ask him a few questions. He is the ranking Democrat on the committee, and he knows this case thoroughly. He is a great lawyer. We wanted him to follow the great lawyer from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who did propound a few questions and had to quit because his time had expired. I wanted to ask him some questions; others wanted to ask him questions; but he dodged and evaded and denied us the opportunity to ask those questions. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] rose and asked that he be given additional time, and he declined to have his time extended so that questions could be asked him. On this side the other day unanimous consent was asked that Mr. Newberry be granted additional time, unlimited time, so that he could be questioned, but his friends on the other side objected. Does not all this seem rather strange to you Senators? Senators, this is an ugly case. The more you go into it the uglier it gets.

Mr. Newberry said this morning:

> I had not the faintest idea that such an amount of money was being spent.

Senators, Mr. Vandenburg, a Republican and splendid citizen of Grand Rapids, Mich., wrote to Mr. Newberry on August 8, 19 days before the primary, about the lavish use of money and the scandalous campaign being conducted in his behalf.

Mr. Newberry wrote him that he would turn his letter over to the committee in charge of his campaign. He never said that he would not stand for or tolerate such a campaign and that he would publicly condemn and repudiate it; he wrote Mr. Vandenburg that he would turn his letter over to the committee, and to show that he did not in any way intend to even offer his protest against such a campaign he wrote Paul King, his manager, that he was inclosing to him a copy of his letter to the Grand Rapids people—meaning Mr. Vandenburg—in which he, Mr. Newberry, had answered the charge of a boodle campaign in a very "flimsy manner."

You do not find in that letter to Paul King a single word of protest against the dangerous and demoralizing conditions mentioned to Mr. Newberry by Mr. Vandenberg. He treats it very lightly, and admits that he answered Mr. Vandenberg in a very flimsy manner. Is his statement in this regard satisfactory, Senators?

And yet he said to-day that he had not the faintest idea that such an amount of money was being spent. Strange statement in view of Vandenberg's letter and his letter to Paul King. In order to bring it a little closer home to him, I will quote from a man high in authority in Michigan, in Republican politics, and in the civic household of that Commonwealth. He is the lieutenant governor of that State, a Republican, Mr. Dickinson. He wrote to Mr. Newberry while the campaign was on and told him, in substance: "They are expending in your race anywhere from $250,000 to $500,000. It is the most scandalous campaign that has ever been conducted. It will take the State 25 years to recover from the evil effects of it, and I ask you, in the name of the Republican Party and the State, to withdraw from the race."

Senators, that statement will burn for many a day in the ears of those of you who vote to seat this man. A lieutenant governor of his own party in the State asked him to withdraw because his campaign was debauching the voter, making barter of the ballot, and doing so much harm that the State would not recover from its evil effects for a quarter of a century, and yet he has told you this morning, and asked God to witness his statement, that he had no idea that large expenditures of money were being made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that Mr. Newberry was told, in the letter to which the Senator first referred, that rumor charged that the amount being expended exceeded six figures. He was told at that early date by a Republican, one of the leaders of his own party in his own State, that this committee was expending such a large sum that the amount exceeded six figures; so when Mr. Newberry to-day said that he did not know of these expenditures until more recently it is obvious that he had either forgotten the letters or that he was attempting to deceive the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Mr. President, as I said on a former occasion, and I desire to repeat it again to-day so as to get it in the same RECORD with his speech, the trail of the boodle serpent is over this man's pathway from the time he tried to buy a seat in the House of Representatives 17 years ago against Mr. Denby, the present Secretary of the Navy, both of them running for the Republican nomination; and Denby defeated him. The papers of Michigan at that time referred to his campaign as a boodle campaign, and charged that he paid hired workers in one city in one day $3,000, and that he himself was in an automobile going over the district giving out cigars by the box to managers and to those who were to look after the election.

And yet some of his friends here tell you that he is a stranger to politics. He just backed off into the mysterious nooks and corners of political secrecy. He backed up until he reached the deck of a fake battleship in Union Square, New York City, and he upon that deck posed as a commander, and they made pictures of him to use in Michigan to make those people think he was actually commanding a battleship in the United States Navy; and the moving pictures cost $30,000. I wonder who paid for that heroic performance!

But they say that he did not know anything about what was going on in the campaign in Michigan. I wonder if he knew that he was posing for the movies! I guess he saw that fellow snapping away with his camera.

What business did he have on that battleship? That was a recruiting concern, out on Union Square, surrounded with poll parrots and English sparrows and squirrels. It was not at all in line with the shore service that he was supposed to be engaged in. He was not a sea commander, but, Mr. President, he just backs off and off when you mention his boodle campaign in Michigan.

It reminds me of Alice in Wonderland. My friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] told about her description of the cat; how it backed through a hole in the fence. The first thing to disappear was the tail, and the next thing was the hind legs of the cat, the next thing was the back and shoulders of the cat, the next thing was the head of the cat, and the last thing she saw was the grin of the cat. All of it was gone but the cat's grin. He backed off into the State of New York, and if you accept his statement made here to-day, you must admit that he had backed so far away that you could see nothing of him but his grin of approval, for he wrote Paul King: "I am devouring your reports greedily."

Did you ever see a fellow eat greedily? Whenever you see a man doing that, he has no dyspepsia; he is paying strict and enthusiastic attention to his business. He wants the food and he is really relishing the food. That is the idea that Mr. Newberry meant to convey when he wrote Paul King that he devoured greedily the reports about his campaign.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that when this campaign was over, and after the Grand Rapids man, Vandenberg, had written to Mr. Newberry and told him of his scandalous situation, and after the Republican lieutenant governor, Mr. Dickenson, had written to him and begged him to withdraw from the senatorial race and that the committee was expending from two hundred and fifty to five hundred thousand dollars, he sat down and wrote Paul King a letter thanking him for all he had done. His letter is in the testimony, and when he wrote it he expressed approval of the methods employed to secure his nomination.

Hundreds of people were hired to work for Mr. Newberry. I want to call to your attention the fact that on November 15, 1918, Albert H. Fowler, a prominent Republican of Michigan, filed charges with the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections against Mr. Newberry and associates, protesting his election because of the corrupt use of money in large sums, and demanding an investigation.

William G. Simpson, a candidate in the Republican primaries for United States Senator, filed charges with the United States district attorney in August, 1918, to the same effect.

I want to read again a portion of the inaugural address of the lieutenant governor of Michigan, which the Senator from Washington so appropriately read a moment ago. This was January 1, 1919, after the primary in August, after the election in November, and the lieutenant governor had not ceased to hear about the scandalous campaign of Mr. Newberry. He told the legislature:

> More communications on this line, asking for legislative action, have come to me by far than all others combined. This, as you know, is the outgrowth of the candidacy that doubtless cost more money than ever before was paid for a nomination for office in all the world's history.

Are Senators going to vote to seat a man in this body when the lieutenant governor of his own State, charging the legislature in the interest of new laws, tells them that more money was expended to secure his nomination than was ever expended before for a nomination for office in all the history of the world? Can you afford to do that, Senators?

To give an idea of what was going on, permit me to read this from the Detroit News, August 19, 1918:

> A communication from Merlin Riley, member of State legislature. Campaign is a disgrace to the State.

This was in August, nearly 10 days before Mr. Newberry's nomination.

> Incurring great expenses and can not be denied; proven by these facts.

Listen, he gives five reasons:

1. Large headquarters for months, with force of 30 to 40 clerks.
2. Class of workers who do not work without pay.
3. Banquets in county after county.
4. A superexpensive advertising campaign in 700 papers of the State.
5. Plan to have autos at the precincts to bring out the voters.

Senators, do you see in that the door closed in the face of a poor man? There it is. Do you see in that the passing of the time when the people sought the man for the office? Do you see in that the going of the day when merit and manhood, real qualifications, honor and integrity, were the things to be desired in a Senator? Away with them all, this new order demands. Go out and hire your workers. Pay them. Open up big headquarters. Hire as many clerks as you want. Buy up all the newspapers you can. Go to it under full pressure with your paid publicity work. That is what Mr. Newberry wrote to Paul King. Do you know how long they carried on that full publicity work? Thirteen weeks in the newspapers of Michigan.

Mr. Paul King wrote to Mr. Newberry:

In counting up the papers that we have for you to-day I count 201.

That is a fine showing. They are going out after the others.

"Mr. Newberry, who financed your campaign?"

"I do not know."

Senators, you are the jurors in this case. A judge in the trial of a case in court would tell you, in charging you in a particular case, that you are the judges of the facts, and that you can consider the witness and his testimony from the standpoint of the interest he has in the matter. Mr. Newberry is much interested here. He wants to hold this seat. A man who will expend from $250,000 to $500,000 for a seat in the Senate will do a great deal to hold it. Oh, they say he did not know anything about the expenses; he deplores the fact that they had a money campaign. Listen, Senators, I want to call attention to this phase of his case. He admits that Paul King came to him and told him it would cost $50,000. What did he say to Paul? Did he say that he told Paul King he would not pay it? Did he say that he told Paul King he would not be a candidate with that understanding? No. Did he say he would not permit such an amount to be expended? No. What did he do by his silence? He admitted that it was all right to spend $50,000, and he went into that race with the knowledge that it was going to cost at least $50,000. They spent four times $50,000, and Mr. Newberry speaks to-day of all of it as money necessarily spent. Are we going to accept Mr. Newberry's idea of what is necessary and right and proper to expend in a senatorial race? Are we in the interest of common decency, good morals, and honest politics going to set up a standard for the good of our common country?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I yield to my friend from Utah.

Mr. KING. I wish the Senator would comment upon the fact, or recall to the Senate the fact, that Mr. Newberry to-day stated that his was not an ordinary campaign, and that he indorsed all that Paul King did; that he had no criticism of it, and only regretted that so large an amount of money was necessarily expended. In other words, Mr. Newberry to-day damns himself beyond any power of salvation when he states upon the floor of the Senate that he has no criticism of Paul King, and only regretted that so large a sum was necessarily expended.

Mr. HEFLIN. Ah, Mr. President, that is one of the keynotes in the case. Mr. Newberry has ratified the expenditure of about $200,000. I wish we could have asked him to-day, "Mr. Newberry, where are the checks? You say you have not furnished any money. We wanted to get the checks but they have been destroyed, and they have been in the hands of your friends. Where are the check stubs, Mr. Newberry? They, too, are destroyed. The bank books are destroyed. All the lists containing the money expended have been destroyed. How do you explain that, Mr. Newberry?"

He comes here and sanctions this thing, indorses it; says he regrets that so much money was necessary to be expended. He did not know that so much was being expended, but here it is in black and white from the lieutenant governor, who wrote him that it was being expended, and a distinguished citizen, Mr. Vandenberg, from Grand Rapids, Mich., writing him that it was being expended; and his own witness, Mr. Blair, his campaign treasurer, testified that the reason they did not accept Mrs. Truman Newberry's check for $15,000 was that the newspapers in Michigan were making so much fuss about the expenditure of money in the Newberry campaign that they thought that if they accepted her check it would give them an opportunity to be more nasty.

Mr. President, when my friend from Utah, Mr. KING, interrupted me, I was asking if we are going to accept Mr. Newberry's statement of what is necessary and right to spend in securing a seat in this body and make it the standard of the Nation, or are we going to set up an honest standard and ask Michigan and all the other States, in the interest of clean politics, to accept it.

That is what Senators on the other side must consider. I want to say this to you, Senators, whenever you vote to seat Mr. Newberry you vote your indorsement and approval of his conduct and that of his committee in securing the nomination. You can not get away from that, because the Bible tells us that "by their fruits ye shall know them." So those who vote against him are opposed to the methods he employed, and those who vote for him can not deny that they indorse his methods. There can be no escape from that conclusion.

I want to read an editorial from the Detroit News of August 30, 1918, after Mr. Newberry was nominated:

The good name of Michigan is at stake, and patriotism demands that they see to it—

Speaking of those in authority—that no man shall be able to assert that in this State political preferment is for sale to the highest bidder, or that the law in Michigan means nothing to those who can command money enough.

Oh, Mr. President, I was saying a moment ago that in 1904 these newspapers in Michigan said that Newberry had opened the barrel, and that it was open at both ends; that money was plentiful; and finally that Denby, with nothing but his personal qualifications, had beaten a man for Congress with large amounts of money and with a disposition to use it. They said that of this man Newberry 17 years ago, and some of you would undertake to have the Senate and the country think that he is just a big, rich, business man, and did not and does not know anything about politics.

I want to bring another phase of this case to your attention briefly before I close. Old man Stephenson, of Wisconsin, when you considered his claim to a seat in this body, acknowledged that he furnished his own money for his campaign for the Senate. Then Mr. Lorimer came along, and he tried the Newberry tactics. He said, "I did not furnish any money. I had nothing to do with it. My friends furnished the money."

The Senate of the United States said, "It does not make any difference whether you furnished it or your friends furnished it; you got your seat unlawfully and in the wrong way; you got it by the use of money," and they put him out as they should put Mr. Newberry out. Now, Mr. Newberry, profiting by his experience with Mr. Denby in 1904, when the papers charged him with opening a barrel campaign when he was going through the district in person giving out cigars by the box, decided to get out of the State. His friends said, "Let your committee claim to be doing it voluntarily, and when they ask you about it say you know nothing on earth about it, and then they can not do anything with you." That was the plan. He said his lawyers advised him. He said his lawyers told him not to go on the witness stand. They were smart lawyers, because they knew if ever he opened his mouth he was gone. He talked here to-day and he is gone, if you are going to take the statements he made and read them in connection with the facts in the record. He never once denied, but admits, that Paul King told him it would cost at least $50,000. I repeat, then was the time for him to say to Paul King, "I will not go into a race that will cost $50,000. I am opposed to that sort of politics." But not one word of that character did he utter.

What did his managers do in the final wind-up of the case here in the Senate? They said, "We have nothing to apologize for; we are not ashamed of anything we did." He said practically the same thing here to-day. He said, "I do not criticize my committee for the campaign they made." Not only that, as I said before, he wrote Paul King a letter thanking him for all that he had done. Then he indorses the campaign committee for the campaign they made.

If he indorses the senatorial campaign conducted in his behalf he places his approval upon campaign methods that Lieut. Gov. Dickenson denounced in a letter to him as the most scandalous one ever conducted in the State and one from which the State would not recover in 25 years.

Now they come here to-day and ask us to seat him. I venture the suggestion that nearly every paper in the United States will carry his speech to-morrow. It will probably cost him $25,000, but I predict that every line of that speech will be carried. But what about the speeches of those who speak against him and his money barrels? What about the speeches of those who fight here day in and day out to protect the honor and integrity of this body and safeguard the rights of the American people? Senators, this is a critical time in your history, a critical time in the history of this body. I pray that you will not permit this thing to be done.

One more reference to what they were doing according to this Republican member of the Legislature in Michigan. Listen, Senators:

Banquets in county after county.

It costs money to have banquets in county after county. Where did they get the money? What did Paul King, his manager, swear? What did Paul swear before the committee? He said, "I did whatever I thought was necessary without regard to expense." That is what he said. Banquets in county after county. Oh, Senators, that costs a lot of money. Take the men of moderate means in this body. Suppose you are called upon to furnish a banquet in each county in your State? I could see you now stand up and say, "Ladies and gentlemen, I have had an ambition to go to the Senate. I wanted to serve in that great body. I have always had a desire to be one of the lawmakers of this great Nation. But I am not relying on money to elect me. I intended to run on what I thought was my fitness to fill the place, my merit, if I have any. I never thought the proposition would be put up to me that I would have to buy it. If the place is for sale, you must excuse me. I am not a candidate."

I hold to the doctrine that if a man will buy a seat in the Senate he in turn will sell it. I do not care whether he is a Democrat or a Republican, if he buys it he will sell it. He may buy it, but he is not going to have the opportunity to sell it with my consent.

No bought credentials or money-acquired title shall ever receive my vote as a Member of this body. I said if a man buys a seat here he will sell it, and he will. If a man goes out to the auction block and buys a piece of real estate he has the right to do what he pleases with it. It is his. He has paid for it. If he goes out and buys a mule he can trade that mule off or give it away; it is his. If his seat is bought in this body, why will he not vote like Wall Street wants him to vote? If they put up the money to buy the seat it belongs to them. I pray God the day will never come when seats here become a matter of barter, put upon the auction block for sale and traffic to the highest bidder.

A superexpensive advertising campaign was conducted in 700 newspapers in the State for 13 weeks. When I learned that Truman H. Newberry had run ads in 700 newspapers for about 13 weeks I said $500,000 will not cover his bill. I believe now he spent $750,000, every dollar of it—13 weeks in 700 papers, daily papers, weekly papers.

What did Paul King write him? He said, "The labor situation is a little weak over here at a certain point, and I am going over there to take a full-page paid advertisement in a labor paper. I think that will help the situation some." What did he mean by that? He meant he was going to get that support because of the money he was going to expend with that newspaper.

They not only went after the newspapers but they hired workers, they hired automobiles to carry people up to the election places and take them home, against two or three candidates who were not able to do that. The man with the biggest purse got the nomination. Money was the controlling factor in the campaign. I do not believe there is a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who can deny that. But for the money, how could they have used all those newspapers, 700 of them, for 13 weeks? They could not have done it. They published everything about Mr. Newberry, including how he was standing on the deck of that ship up in Union Square yearning for a German. How could any other candidate get his reply and his criticism in unless he had $500,000 to buy up the same newspapers? He could not do it. The other candidates were just relegated to the rear, and Mr. Newberry said to Paul King, "Keep up our publicity at full pressure."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In connection with this picture, did they not buy up a thousand feet of an old film that had been taken showing or illustrating some previous naval review?

Mr. KING. It was 8,000 feet of film.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It was some old reel of film that had been taken of some old naval review.

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly. They had that ship swimming across the movie screen with this brave warrior standing up there on the deck four square to every wind that blew. How innocent he is. "Did you know anything about this expenditure?" "Oh, no." "Did you know anything about that?" "Oh, no."

"What about these people," asked that great lawyer, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], "who went up in droves and stopped at the hotel and charged their accounts to you? They were paid by you. What about it?" He said, "I never paid them that I know of." You might ask a man, "Did you go to bed last night?" and he might say, "Not that I know of," and you would then probably say, "You must have been in a stupor or dazed condition." A man usually knows whether he has paid bills or not.

Here is the fact about it: Fred Smith, his confidential agent, had power of attorney from him to give checks. If he did not, then Fred Smith is a falsifier, because he swore that he had, and he swore that he checked on Truman Newberry's money and John Newberry's money. He said their funds were in there together, with all the balance of the Newberry family, in that big partnership. So Fred Smith paid those hotel bills, Fred Smith gave checks for money in the campaign in Michigan, and Mr. Newberry stood far away and said, "I do not know anything on earth about it. Go to it, boys." Oh, how ridiculous, how ridiculous!

He still has Fred Smith as his confidential agent, so I do not suppose he violated any instructions. Paul King published a statement in the Detroit Journal just before the primary, in which he said:

> There are, of course, expenses. Anyone with any sense knows that.

What a reflection he made on his chief, Mr. Newberry. His chief declares that he had no knowledge of any expenditures, and so forth, and Paul says any man who did not have any knowledge of it was a fool. Senators will recall that Paul King swore that he kept Mr. Newberry informed about the conduct of the campaign and Mr. Newberry wrote Paul, "I devour your reports greedily."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly; I am glad to yield to my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. In connection therewith, it will be remembered that the junior Senator from Michigan swore that there was no expenditure with his knowledge or consent. He swore that twice in order to make it true. Yet he to-day said that he was told that this campaign would cost $50,000, and he consented to become a candidate with that knowledge.

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. And he never even told us on whom he thought he might rely to put up that $50,000.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, here is a business man going into a campaign that he knows in advance will cost $50,000, and according to the sworn testimony he never had the faintest idea who would put it up, and he swears now that there was nothing spent with his knowledge or consent, when he consented in the beginning that they might spend $50,000.

Mr. HEFLIN. Absolutely, and he certainly had knowledge that they were going to expend at least $50,000. What would a numbskull do if he were to go into a race for the Senate and did not have any money or was not going to expend any money, if the man whom he intended to make his manager were to tell him it would cost $50,000? He would either say, "I will not be a candidate," or he would say, "Who is going to put up the money?" He would certainly say one or the other of these things. Yet here is a man just imagining that his campaign was going to run itself while he was running the other way so as to know nothing at all about campaign expenses. Who is going to put up the money? John Newberry? Mr. Newberry's sisters? Mr. Newberry's brothers-in-law?

Senators, can they get away with that? They could not get away with it before a precinct jury, before a justice of the peace, not for a minute.

Let me read another line from this paid advertisement, an excerpt from the formal statement issued from Newberry headquarters justifying his campaign expenses:

> Volunteer workers for Newberry are numbered by tens of thousands in 83 counties.

We need not wonder as to that. There was banquet after banquet in county after county. Tens of thousands of workers were in the 83 counties. Listen to what they say in conclusion as to that:

> There has never been a campaign in Michigan like it.

Senators, that is true; and I pray God there never may be another one in Michigan like it. Banquets were held in the counties. There was a revel in Michigan. One witness swore that he went into Paul King's office and saw stacks of money piled up, and when asked how much there was, said it looked like a million dollars; but they were not satisfied with the accumulation of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to be expended in the counties.

There was a Belshazzar feast in every county in the State; workers were dragged in and paid $30 a week, $50 a week, and some more. Newberry campaign agents even approached a little fellow who was running a newspaper—the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] called attention to it the other day—and paid him for advertising, I believe it was $170. However, he did not think that was quite enough to warrant his support. They then said to him, "We will send you a ton of print paper besides." And print paper was then selling for $125 a ton. Money, I repeat, was the dominating, controlling power in the Newberry campaign. Senators, the trail of the boodle serpent is over it all. Are you going to permit this thing to go through?

What is the law as to stolen property? The burden of proof shifts to the man who has to explain his possession of it; he has got to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt how he got it, or you will convict him of stealing it. The burden of proof shifts in this case.

Mr. Newberry is charged with having secured this seat by the lavish and unlawful use of money. That $200,000 has been expended can be established without the checks and stubs and bank books. How much more could be established if we had those records God, and God only, knows. Mr. Newberry, where are those books? They were in your possession. Where are those stubs? They were in your possession, in the hands of your agents and friends. Where are the checks? All of them have been destroyed; none of them are here, and you stay out until the eleventh hour and then you come in and make a lame and very evasive statement.

The colleague of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] says that the junior Senator from Michigan has suffered the torments of hell. Well, that is always the fate of the evildoer, because the Bible tells us the way of transgressor is hard. I can say, in conclusion, that Mr. Newberry can blame nobody but himself. The men and women who believe that this Government belongs to the people and that nobody should be put in control who buys place and power with money must stand arrayed against Mr. Newberry in this serious matter. He has nobody to blame but himself. His situation is described in the language of the poet, who said:

The thorns which I have reaped are of the tree that I have planted; they have torn me, and I bleed.

DEATH OF DELEGATE JONAH KUHIO KALANIANAOLE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. JONAH KUHIO KALANIANAOLE, late a Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions of the House be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which were read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 9, 1922.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JONAH KUHIO KALANIANAOLE, the Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 207) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JONAH KUHIO KALANIANAOLE, late a Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SPENCER. As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Delegate from Hawaii, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 10, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, Thou hast taught us by the words of Him who spake as never man spake to call Thee "Our Father"; then as Thy children we wait before Thee. O may we breathe our prayer through Him who told us how to pray and do. Thou accept it as the desire of everyone. Upon our hearts do Thou write the words of wisdom and in our memories do Thou put the words of instruction. Come to us through the gateway of our need. When we are cast down help us up; when the load is heavy lighten the weight, and when the darkness gathers direct the way, and may all our sins be forgotten in the depths of Thy infinite mercy. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 6, 1922, was read and approved.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a message sent to Congress by the Porto Rican delegation to Congress now in Washington on the subject of an autonomous form of government for Porto Rico.

The SPEAKER. The Commissioner from Porto Rico asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The message referred to is, as follows:

CANADA IN 1839—PORTO RICO IN 1922.

It needs no change in the principles of government, no invention of a new constitutional theory, to supply the remedy which would, in my opinion, completely remove the existing political disorders. It needs but to follow out consistently the principles of the British constitution and introduce into the government of the great colonies those wise provisions by which alone the working of the representative system can in any country be rendered harmonious and efficient.

The responsibility to the United Legislature of all officers of the government except the governor and his secretary should be secured by every means known to the British constitution. The governor * * * should be instructed that he must carry on his government by heads of departments in whom the United Legislature shall repose confidence, and that he must look for no support from home in any contest with the legislature except on points involving strictly imperial interests.

LORD DURHAM.

PETITION OF THE PORTO RICAN DELEGATION TO CONGRESS THROUGH THE RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PORTO RICO.

The delegation that is now in this country petitioning for a remedy to the political situation prevailing in Porto Rico deems it its duty to reprint in pamphlet form the introductory note to a volume published by Mathuen & Co., London, 1902, because by placing that great and noble example within the reach of those who are going to legislate for us in Congress, we will help demonstrate to them, although they know it beforehand, that in all problems from race to race and from people to people there exists no wiser or more practical solutions than equality and justice.

It is surprising to find the really astonishing similarity there is between the political situation in Canada in 1839 and that of Porto Rico in 1922. Both peoples, at the different times, went through a deep crisis and suffered the pains inherent to a profound metamorphosis. It may be that the situation of the former 75 years ago differed in some minor details from that of the latter at the present moment; but, generally speaking, the causes being identical, so much the effects be and appear. The Canadian crisis was solved by the British parliament under the advice of Lord Durham: the Porto Rican crisis is to be solved by the American Congress. In the first case, Canada was redeemed by the principles of British liberty; in the latter, Porto Rico hopes to be redeemed by the principles of American liberty.

The American Congress is fully advised as to conditions in Porto Rico. Proceeding by elimination, it seems to be generally understood that statehood is not possible.

Ethnical and economic problems of no probable solution will ever be in the way to that end. Great American statesmen, as Root and Stimson, have openly declared against it saying that the insular possessions should be governed by laws strictly autonomous in their character. Statehood is to be preceded by incorporation. And here lies the crux of the whole question. But what does this word incorporation, so much used and abused, impart? What does it mean? It means assimilation, as Mr. Snow aptly says:

"The régime which the French call the régime of assimilation, the majority of the Supreme Court in the insular tariff cases call the régime of 'incorporation.' The French word seems the more proper. 'Incorporation' means 'admission into the body and personality' of the State. In the case of a State under popular government, incorporation of lands and populations can only occur by admission of them to a representation in the legislature on equal terms with the lands and populations already constituting the body and personality of the State, and with equal participation in the vote for the executive if he is elective. In the case of a Federal State, incorporation of lands and populations can only occur when they form a State and that State is admitted into the Union as a State, on equal terms respecting representation in the Congress or parliament, and with equal participation in the vote for chief executive if he is elective. Lands and populations, however, though not incorporated into the State, may be dependent upon the State under a régime similar in all respects, except participation in the election of the central government, to that which prevails in the lands and populations which are actually incorporated into the State. Such a dependency is under the régime of 'assimilation' as distinguished from the régime of 'autonomy.'"

Knowing now that the words "incorporation" and "assimilation" represent equal concepts, we ask is assimilation possible in Porto Rico, hundreds of miles apart from the national environment, with a native population numbering nearly 1,300,000 souls? Mr. Paul Reinsch, writing on the subject in his admirable work "Colonial Administration," says:

"* * * The policy of assimilation has thus far in practice proved unsuccessful and at times even disastrous.

"The policy of assimilation rests upon the old rationalist doctrine of the universality of human reason. An institution once declared rational must as such be applicable at all times and in all places; and though individuals may at first resist the introduction of such institutions they will, if forced to accept them, be ultimately liberated thereby and raised to a higher plane of existence and civilization. The essential element in this belief is that reason is the one controlling force in human conduct, and that rational institutions are productive of rational action and hence are the sole requirement for well-ordered and civilized life. As a matter of fact, however, the science of the nineteenth century has abandoned this belief in the universal supremacy of the conscious rational faculty. Men are governed far more by their inherited beliefs, customs, and instincts than by a conscious choice between different courses of action. This is true among ourselves * * *. The doctrine of assimilation makes a demand upon the rational element in human nature which not even the action of the most highly developed individuals, to say nothing of nations, could justify. The natives are to abandon the entire complex of customs and beliefs which have thus far guided them through life, and by an act of selective reason, to adopt institutions foreign to their social experience. Modern science is agreed that inherited psychological elements—the constitution of the mind—are the most persistent phenomena of which we have any knowledge. New ideas may be poured into the consciousness, may even be understood by the rational faculties, but they will leave no trace upon the mental constitution and upon the real spring of action.

"The actual experience of colonizing nations and the results of scientific investigation leave room for but one opinion upon the policy of assimilation, that it rests upon a purely idealogical basis and runs counter to the scientific laws of psychic development."

Basing himself undoubtedly on reasons of like import Mr. Alpheus Snow, in his book "The Administration of Dependencies," says:

"All the insular dependencies of the Union and Alaska are probably destined never to be incorporated into the Union as States, because it is best for them and for the Union that they should permanently remain in a relationship of dependence on the Union. In the latter relationship, they can properly have a higher degree of statehood than in the former. Under a well-balanced and expert administration * * * they can have that distinct community life which their isolated position makes necessary."

Only an autonomous form of government seasonably granted to Porto Rico will solve the present political situation. It will create contentment, enhance the affection and good faith always evidenced by the people of the United States toward the people of Porto Rico, and bring about a closer tie that time will prove indestructible. The United States can be as generous to Porto Rico as Great Britain has been to Ireland. In short, paraphrasing from the pamphlet we reprint, it will be hailed as an honor to this the greatest of all democracies to make a Porto Rico governed by itself, a country where freedom should beget loyalty, and we venture to say that the last hand which will wave the American flag on our island will be that of the Porto Rican.

FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA,
Resident Commissioner at Washington.
ANTONIO R. BARCELÓ,
President of the Senate.
MIGUEL GUERRA MONDRAGON,
Chairman House Finance Committee.
WALTER MCK. JONES,
Member of the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a statement on pending Alaskan legislation, setting forth the situation in the Territory.

The SPEAKER. The Delegate from Alaska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, there are to-day pending in Congress four bills for the relief of Alaska, two in the Senate introduced by Senators CUMMINS and NEW and two in the House introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

There may be diversity of opinion among Members of Congress as to why Alaska has come to a condition that requires immediate relief or what the cause of that condition may be, but there can be no doubt in any mind that the great northern Territory is to-day on the downgrade, industrially as well as in population.

It seems strange that at a stage in our history when the population of the country is increasing rapidly, and this largely by foreign influx, the population of this our greatest Territory, with its almost limitless natural resources, should be declining. One would naturally believe that the pioneering spirit must exist in the American people to-day to an extent that should impel population toward the northland with its possibilities and opportunities for the establishment of industry. Its fishery resources are greater than those of any country on earth, including the United States proper; its mineral wealth is largely undeveloped; its 100,000 square miles of tillable land waits for the advent of the homesteader; its forests, greater than those of any of the States, stand adjacent to its abundant water power ready for manufacturing enterprise.

Reference to bulletins of governmental departments whose activities extend to Alaska will convince one that there is no exaggeration in this statement regarding its natural resources.

THE REASON FOR DECLINE OF POPULATION AND INDUSTRY.

There must be a reason for this depressed condition in Alaska that causes her population to depart for other sections, a reason other than the general business depression throughout the United States, as this condition does not seem to cause any noticeable movement of population from one section of the country to another.

We of Alaska may disagree on practically every political question that arises, but there is no dissension on the primal cause of our declining industry.

This is the opinion of our Republican governor, Hon. Scott C. Bone:

Vital and urgent is the problem of transportation. The completion of the Government railroad does not solve it, but only makes its solution the more vital and urgent.

Separated by foreign land, as well as by water, from the United States, adequate steamship transportation and equitable ocean rates are the necessary prerequisites to the successful operation of the railroad and the development of the Territory. Steamship and rail are equally essential and mutually dependent utilities. Alaska can not prosper and progress without either. The great domain, its unparalleled resources yet scarcely touched, must remain largely a waste and wilderness until the twin problem of water and land transportation is rightly solved.

And this is the claim of our recent Democratic governor, Hon. Thomas Riggs, jr.:

When will these increases cease? War conditions no longer exist. Slowly the abnormal prices brought about by abnormal conditions are commencing to readjust themselves. It would seem that new rates becoming effective should be lowered instead of increased. Small competing lines have been eliminated. It is evident to all of us that Territorial development can not continue when operating under the handicap of almost prohibitive freight and passenger rates.

We should dig direct to the root of our discontent. Every other question sinks to insignificance, for back of it all remains the basic fact that unless relief is afforded us in our most vital need, moneys expended on roads, schools, charities, and on all other constructive projects constitute merely stop-gap measures, never to bear full fruit, for Alaska will gradually lose population and revert to a vast territory unpeopled save for a seasonal fishing population along the southern coast and the operatives of a few great mines.

This is the view of the Alaska Advisory Committee, appointed in 1920 by the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. John Barton Payne:

It was the opinion of practically every person appearing before the committee that money could not be attracted to Alaska, industries dependent upon transportation by regular lines started, or general development go forward freely under existing rates, and this was the conclusion reached by the committee.

From these published statements of governors and departmental boards one must conclude that the trouble with Alaska is inadequate transportation and excessive rates.

THE ALASKA TRANSPORTATION MONOPOLY.

The present excessive rates to Alaska are maintained by a transportation monopoly conducted by the Alaska Steamship Co. and the Pacific Steamship Co.

The two operating companies have for years controlled the water transportation from Seattle to Alaska. There is no evidence of joint ownership or interlocking directorates in the published reports of the two organizations, but their harmonious work in extorting exorbitant freight rates from Alaskan shippers for these many years would indicate that a common financial interest exists somewhere, and nothing serves to illustrate their common interest in throttling Alaskan industry as the cooperative and combined work of their Washington lobby, whose activities are paid for indirectly by the Alaskan shipper. "The small competing lines have been eliminated," says Gov. Riggs, and he, as well as the people of Alaska, know that they were eliminated by cooperative action on the part of the major companies. The Alaska Steamship Co. controls all ore shipments from Alaska, for the reason that the same interests that own the Alaska Steamship Co. own and control the smelter at Tacoma, Wash., where Alaskan ores are treated.

THE COPPER MONOPOLY AN AID TO THE TRANSPORTATION MONOPOLY.

There is but one copper mine operating to-day in Alaska outside of those that are operated by the interests that control the steamship monopoly and the Tacoma smelter, of the American Smelting & Refining Co., at Tacoma, Wash.

Many copper properties on the coast of Alaska are closed down by reason of exorbitant smelter charges and freight rates. The following quotations from letters addressed to Federal officials by the proprietor of the one copper mine that has managed to continue its operation, despite monopolistic effort to close it down, will serve to convey some idea of the state of mind of an individual who has spent the best years of his life in the development of an excellent copper mine and finds that, regardless of how rich it may be, there is no profit in operating it as long as he is dependent on the monopoly for transportation and smelter treatment.

From letter to the governor of Alaska, July 28, 1920:

This mine, which has been operating steadily for the last 11 years, may soon have to close, unless we can get from the Smelter Trust's plant at Tacoma a smelting rate that is not prohibitive.

I believe that all the other producers of smelting ore in Alaska, outside the Smelter Trust, have been suppressed by the Smelter Trust, so that their monopoly is now complete, with the exception of this one property.

They are now asking us a prohibitive smelting rate, which is clearly intended to put us out of business, and is a warning to all others to stay out. At the same time they are accepting ore of the same smelting character from a foreign country at a much lower rate.

The Territorial legislature at the last session adopted a memorial, senate joint memorial No. 10, requesting that smelter graft and extortion be dealt with by Congress.

I have had some correspondence with the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice and have acquainted them with the situation. I have not found that either department has taken any practical interest up to this time. I am hoping you will. It seems to me it is time to begin to save productive Alaska industries, if there are to be any left outside those belonging to the Smelter Trust.

I hope you will realize that this is not a prospective industry, but an existing industry. It will weather the storm if our public officers are not blind to Smelter Trust graft and deaf to Smelter Trust victims.

From a letter to the Delegate from Alaska, September 1, 1921:

At the solicitation of the Ketchikan Commercial Club the Tacoma smelter reduced their rate to me August 12 for 1,500 tons of ore, as follows: Treatment charge, reduced from $3.50 to $3 per ton. Copper deducted from copper contents per ton was 26 pounds; is now 15 pounds.

While this is not as well as they could afford to do, still it is better than nothing. If they make honest returns at these rates, I shall be able to keep going.

However, I fully expect that they will more than absorb these reductions by making dishonest returns on the ore. That is, I expect that they will falsify the moisture contents, the weights of the ore, and adulterate the assay samples with barren rock. They practiced these methods upon us for about five years—1910–1915.

The Tacoma smelter had robbed us of about $13,000 in cash and put us about $22,000 in debt. And they evidently thought that no developing property owned by an individual with no capital could overcome such a handicap.

Notwithstanding the reduction in smelter charges, I think the Federal Trade Commission should make the investigation which the Alaska Legislature asked for. It is to be hoped that the Department of Justice will also investigate.

As a matter of fact, I can not understand why it is that the business and practices of a great combine like the smelter trust, which absolutely controls the production of smelting ores in so many localities, especially Alaska, should never have been made the subject of official inquiry or investigation.

That a mine producing 10 per cent copper ore can not operate at a profit would not be credited in any copper-producing section of the United States, and yet these assertions of an individual, forced to the wall by arrogant and cold-blooded monopoly, serve to prove that in Alaska 10 per cent ore is not rich enough to overcome the extortions of smelter and steamship companies.

Under this system of crushing monopoly the ambition of every copper prospector on the coast of Alaska to develop a paying mine is thwarted, and it is not surprising that population is declining. Men who have pinned their hopes for success on Alaska and its opportunities have had those hopes blighted until they now search for other fields of endeavor beyond the reach of monopoly.

The prospector is naturally an optimist. He believes that the next blast of powder will open up rich ore, rich enough to overcome transportation and smelter charges. He is a pathetic figure in the coastal section of Alaska, holding onto his property from year to year, believing that economic conditions will change and that he will come into his own. Years ago he was notified by the great copper interests operating outside of Alaska that they could not take any interest in Alaska properties, as they did not care to enter into competition with the organization that controls that Territory, and yet the prospector's optimism continues. To-day there are splendid copper prospects lying idle that if located in any other section of the United States would be in operation, giving employment to labor and stimulating industry. To say that the present state of the copper market does not warrant investment in mines does not answer the question for Alaska, as these same conditions that exist there to-day have continued through all fluctuations of the copper market for the past 12 years.

Representative Mason, of Illinois, just before his death, told me of a friend of his who was leaving the Territory of Alaska, driven from some enterprise in which he was engaged, by excessive freight rates.

Mr. Mason's letter to me is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1921.

Mr. DAN A. SUTHERLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: I have been looking for the letter which I received from an acquaintance in Alaska. I recognized his name when I received the letter and put it in my pocket, intending to hand it to you. In general terms, it was a very bitter protest against the freight rates in Alaska. I acknowledged it when dictating a number of letters to an outside stenographer. I will make another search for it and forward it to you should I find it.

Sincerely, yours,
WM. E. MASON.

Mr. Mason's friend was only one of the many Alaskans who have come in contact with monopolistic operations in Territorial commerce and were compelled to yield to its superior power.

THE EXTORTIONATE RATES CHARGED ALASKANS BY THE TRANSPORTATION MONOPOLY.

The ocean freight rates to Alaska have not decreased since the close of the war, and it is not the intention of the monopoly to reduce them even though it has fought a seaman's strike against a 15 per cent reduction in wages successfully and has recently been granted a liberal mail subsidy by the Post Office Department.

There has not been nor will there be any reflection of the reduced operating expenses or greatly increased income in the nature of governmental gratuity in the rates paid by the Alaskan shipper. The same old system of publication of false tariff rates continues and the shipper still pays double rates under the weight or measurement option exercised by the transportation companies.

ILLUSTRATION OF EXTORTION UNDER THE WEIGHT OR MEASUREMENT SYSTEM.

The Washington lobby, which is maintained continuously by the Alaska transportation monopoly, inserted in the record of supplemental hearings on H. R. 5694 and other bills before the House Committee on the Territories on November 8 last the following false and misleading statements:

Based upon these distances, I submit tabular statements of rates on important commodities now in force to Alaskan ports compared with existing rates on the Seattle-San Francisco, Los Angeles, and San Diego routes which show that the rate per ton on most commodities is lower to Alaska than to the California ports for like distances.

The information given shows that the Alaska rates and fares are not unfair or unreasonable and that they are far below the rates and fares between other Pacific coast ports.

The following are the tables referred to:

[NOTE.—The rates given to California ports are taken from Tariff F–No. 48 of the Pacific Steamship Co., effective October 15, 1921, on file with the United States Shipping Board—that is, they are computed from the rates prescribed by that tariff.]

NOTE.—The rate shown in California tariffs is per 100 pounds. The ton rate here given was arrived at by multiplying said 100 pound rate by 20.

Knowing the statement that water rates are as low from Seattle to Alaskan points as from Seattle to California points was absolutely false, I wired to Alaskan towns for receipted expense bills paid by merchants on shipments from San Francisco to Alaskan ports via Seattle, and from those received I have tabulated those of most recent date, which in almost every case are dated subsequent to the date of the tariff rates submitted by the lobby, which went into effect October 15, 1921, and I herewith submit a tabulated list of shipments from San Francisco via Seattle to Ketchikan, Alaska, merchants.

Ketchikan is the first port of call in Alaska. It is one of the largest and most important towns in the Territory. All boats of the transportation monopoly call at Ketchikan, both north and south bound.

The distance from Seattle to Ketchikan is 742 miles, or 198 miles less than the distance given from Seattle to San Francisco in the table submitted by the lobby.

Note carefully what it costs the Alaskan merchant to transport his consignment from San Francisco to Seattle and then compare it with the cost from Seattle to Ketchikan.

The actual cost of transportation of freight from Seattle to Ketchikan, not including the wharfage charges at Seattle, is 36 per cent greater than the charges from San Francisco to Seattle, a distance 200 miles greater.

The fraudulent system under which these rates are extorted from the public by the monopoly is one under which it has worked for many years and is as follows:

Under the option whereby these companies may transport freight by weight or measurement all freight from San Francisco to Seattle is carried by weight. Upon its arrival at Seattle it is carried across the dock to the Alaska bound boat and billed through on measurement provided the measurement tonnage exceeds the weight tonnage.

It will be noted that in the tariff tables of the steamship companies on file with the Shipping Board, effective October 15, 1921, the tariff on sugar in less than carload lots from San Francisco to Seattle is $12 per ton, and from Seattle to Juneau $9 per ton. The actual freight cost of the consignment of sugar to Ketchikan carried by weight on both stages of the voyage is 33 per cent greater on the short stage to Ketchikan than on the longer stage from San Francisco to Seattle, and yet the Washington lobby blithely informs committees of Congress that rates are lower to Alaska than to other Pacific coast sections.

It will be noted that in the tariff list the freight on coffee in less than carload lots from San Francisco to Seattle is $2 more per ton than from Seattle to Juneau, an approximately equal distance. The absolute falsity of this tariff sheet is shown in the excessive charges indicated in the seven consignments of coffee to Ketchikan.

There is no classification of pottery in the tariff tables, but the consignment to Ketchikan cost over 70 per cent more for the short haul than for the long haul.

The question naturally arises, Do men of supposed honor and business standing thus deliberately misrepresent and make false statements to Members of Congress? The answer is that this is the day of the profiteer, and he brazenly carries his wartime methods into reconstruction days. He has exploited the Territory in the past while the appeals of the people to governmental agencies for relief were unheeded; why should he now relinquish his strangle hold on the commercial life of the Northland when he considers it to be his own particular field of exploitation?

The following editorial from a recent issue of the Ketchikan Chronicle serves to further expose the methods of the transportation monopoly in Alaska:

[Editorial in Ketchikan Chronicle Dec. 10, 1921.]

In Gov. Bone's annual report, in speaking of transportation rates, he says that Alaskans are not being discriminated against, as compared with the other people of the Pacific coast. As a statement of fact, this may be indisputable, and without a careful study of the situation no attempt will be made to question it. But this is a fact also which can not be disputed, that during the years of the war freight rates to Alaska were increased tremendously, exorbitantly, on the excuse that the cost of labor and fuel was mounting rapidly.

Since the war the fuel costs have dropped very much and the steamship companies fought through successfully a battle to cut wages. So why now do the Alaskans not get any benefit as the result, as they were made to bear the burden when the costs were going up.

Furthermore, it may be brought to the attention of the governor that the tariff sheets of the companies catering to Alaska are snares and delusions and the Chronicle will cite one little experience of its own, one which is undoubtedly similar to those of many other business firms. The base rate, whatever that means, on newsprint from Seattle to Ketchikan is $8 a ton, but the Chronicle paid $22 a ton, or more than a cent a pound. Newsprint paper is brought from Norway to the Pacific coast for less money, is landing so much more cheaply, in fact, that dealers in it were able, only a few weeks ago, to undersell the American manufacturers.

The statement in the governor's report that Alaska was not discriminated against in freight rates is, of course, based on the false tariff sheets and on the false statements of representatives of the transportation monopoly.

When men of large affairs issue tariff sheets and publish statements regarding the conduct of their business the presumption is that they are true, but we know that in this case they are false.

This editorial simply shows that what is termed by the editor a "delusion and a snare" whereby he is mulcted out of 200 per cent over the advertised rate on newsprint is practiced on all shippers of various classes of freight.

The editor wonders why the result of the "successful battle to cut wages" was not indicated in the Alaska freight rates. The answer of the monopoly to this is that they lost money by their suspension of traffic during the battle to cut wages. The only inference is that the public must bear the monopoly's expenses in its industrial wars. This industrial innovation on the part of the transportation companies might be extended to reimbursement of the seamen who were involved in the battle for loss of opportunity to earn. In the industrial war, wherein the transportation companies forced a reduction of wages of seamen, the public showed considerable sympathy with the companies as it was assumed that the reduction in wages would eventually mean reduced freight rates, but there the public as usual fooled itself, as the saving in operating expenses went entirely into the coffers of the monopoly. The public should long ago have learned that transportation monopolies are not conducted in the public interest.

The monopoly's explanation of why the $100,000 subsidy for carrying mails can not operate to reduce freight rates is "that fuel oil is likely to increase in price at any minute," and thus freight rates are maintained in anticipation of increased operating costs that do not exist at present.

At this point I insert a table to show what it costs Wrangell merchants to import goods from California via Seattle under the weight or measurement option system since the tariff became effective October 15, 1921.

Wrangell is a port of call on the run from Seattle to Skagway and is located 842 miles from Seattle. A majority of the boats to Alaska make this port.

Table showing immense increase of freight charges on same shipments from San Francisco to Seattle when these are transshipped at Seattle to Wrangell, Alaska.

Date, 1921.	San Francisco shipper.	Wrangell, consignee.	Class of freight.	Cubic feet.	Weight, pounds.	Cost of this freight from San Francisco to Seattle, 940 miles.	Cost of same freight from Seattle to Wrangell, 842 miles.	Excess cost of this short haul.

Nov. 18	Hills Bros	D. Sinclair	3 cases coffee	12	310	1.71	2.70	.99
	Total					4.31	9.90	5.59

The Wrangell merchant pays over 125 per cent more on his freight for the shorter haul from Seattle to Wrangell than on the longer haul from San Francisco to Seattle, and yet the lobbyists represent to Congress that the California-Seattle rates are highest.

SKAGWAY RATES.

Reference to the rate sheet submitted to the House Committee on the Territories by the lobby show that the rates to Skagway, located at a distance of 1,153 miles from Seattle, are considerably less per ton in less-than-carload lots than the rates on corresponding quantities from San Francisco to Seattle, a distance of 940 miles. But there is no occasion for expressions of thanks to the monopoly by the residents of Skagway for the magnanimous treatment indicated in the rates published by the lobby for the benefit of Members of Congress, as the herewith inserted tabulation of freight costs via Seattle on their importations from California since the tariff rates became effective, October 15, 1921, should dissipate any delusion they may have labored under.

Table showing immense increase of freight charges on same shipments from San Francisco to Seattle, when these are transshipped at Seattle to Skagway, Alaska.

Nov. 18	Hills Bros	P. H. Gauty	5 cases coffee	19	470	2.59	4.75	2.16
	Total					7.52	15.63	8.11

Under the weight and measurement scheme while the published tariff rates are less to Skagway than to San Francisco the Skagway merchants are held up for over 100 per cent more on the northern half of the voyage than they are charged on the southern half.

How much longer must the people of Alaska be subjected to this robbery by the transportation monopoly?

JUNEAU.

I hold a number of expense bills for freight from San Francisco to Juneau via Seattle, but these bills are all dated long prior to the date of the tariff rate under discussion. They consist mostly of freight of equal weight and measurement and indicate an increase of 15 per cent on the northern stage of the voyage. There is not the slightest doubt that the Juneau merchants are robbed in the same manner as those of Ketchikan, Wrangell, and Skagway.

If one could secure their expense bills, their freight costs could be known.

This extract from the letter of one of Juneau's leading citizens, who was asked to obtain expense bills from shippers, and who did obtain some, serves to explain the reason why I am unable to present a tabulated statement of rates to Juneau:

The shippers are a little reluctant to give out information of this nature without knowing the purpose of the request, thinking it might prejudice the transportation companies against them if their action became known.

And thus through fear of the monopoly, the public is prevented from knowing just how much is contributed in the increased prices paid for food and other necessities imported into the Territory. But this fear of the monopoly on the part of shippers was well known to my predecessor, Mr. Grigsby, for in his brief to the conference committee heretofore mentioned he presented the attitude of the Alaskan shipper in this language:

The people of Alaska do not feel, and justifiably so, that the matter of freight regulation has so far been intelligently handled by the Shipping Board. Every application for permission to increase rates by private carriers has been granted. The applications are based on figures submitted by the steamship companies, their investments being based upon war valuations, interest on investment, depreciation and insurance on the same basis, so that naturally a sufficient showing has been made to justify the raising of rates. The Alaskan shipper, the merchant, is not represented and ordinarily can not be represented at the hearings before the Shipping Board for two reasons: (1) The average shipper has not enough individual interest to justify the expense, and (2) fear of reprisals by the companies.

And thus holding complete sway over the Alaskan shipper through fear of reprisals and with its lobby working continously here in Washington to prevent the passage of relief measures, the Territory remains under the complete domination of the monopoly while commercial life is thereby stagnated until a land that once was bright with promise for its industrious inhabitants has become a land of disappointed hopes and ruined ambitions.

ANOTHER LINE OF TRANSPORTATION GRAFT INCIDENTAL TO ALASKAN SHIPMENTS ONLY.

At this time I would call attention to an outrageous system of extortion practiced by transportation companies at the port of Seattle whereby the Alaskan shipper is held up for tribute which is not exacted from the shippers or consignees of any country on earth to which American commerce extends.

The Seattle terminal charges on freight destined for Alaska and on that destined for other countries is as follows. The tonnage weight is in all cases 2,000 pounds:

On shipments originating in the east and consigned to Hawaiian Islands or Oriental ports: Wharfage, 30 cents per ton.

On shipments of same origin destined for Alaska: Unloading cars, 65 cents per ton; wharfage, 50 cents per ton; from wharf to ship's slings, 60 cents per ton; total, $1.75 per ton.

On local shipments to Hawaii or Oriental ports: Handling charges, 30 cents per ton.

On local shipments to Alaska: Handling charges, 60 cents per ton; wharfage, 50 cents per ton; total, $1.10 per ton.

Why should all terminal charges on oriental freight in excess of 30 cents per ton be absorbed by the transportation lines and the Alaskan merchant be bludgeoned out of five times as much as the Oriental merchant when his freight is passing through Seattle?

How long must the Territory bear with this outrageous discrimination? Just as long as transportation monopoly holds sway and those who have the power to rectify such conditions decline to act in the interest of an exploited people.

THE WORK OF THE ALASKAN MONOPOLY LOBBY IN WASHINGTON.

This lobby has operated here in Washington for many years, and although composed of two resident members, its number is always promptly augmented by additions from New York, Seattle, and even from Alaska when the S O S is sent out requiring their presence to prevent remedial legislation for Alaska or to assist in obtaining special legislation for the benefit of the monopoly. The two resident members are always on the job gumshoeing around the congressional office buildings and in the departments. The chief lobbyist, when appearing before committees introduces himself as an "economist," whose interest in pending legislation is "that of the public," sometimes he claims to represent the National Merchant Marine Association, sometimes he announces that his presence before committees is "involuntary," sometimes he arranges for an attaché of the Shipping Board to present him to committees.

That there is something about his work as paid lobbyist of the Alaskan transportation monopoly that he is ashamed of is evidenced by his studied efforts to prevent his real status of paid lobbyist being known by Members of Congress.

He occasionally, when pressed, will admit that he holds a retainer from the Pacific Steamship Co., but inasmuch as he is working for their combined interest in the prevention of legislation for the benefit of Alaska, it is safe to assume that he is employed by the combination.

My predecessor, Mr. Grigsby, in a brief presented to the House conference committee on the merchant marine bill in 1920 described this lobbyist as—> one who appeared before the Senate Commerce Committee as the avowed representative of the Pacific Coast Co., and who up until recently also represented the Alaska Steamship Co.

Former Delegate Wickersham in a brief on Alaska transportation filed with the Shipping Board describes the lobbyist as—> pretending to represent the Alaskan fishing interests, but, in fact, representing the Alaskan transportation monopoly.

That this fellow imposes himself on the National Merchant Marine Association as well as on officials of the Shipping Board in order to enhance his standing before committees of Congress there can be no question, for I assume that these organizations do not intentionally stand as sponsors for lobbyists of this type. The people of Alaska are to-day paying all the salaries and other expenses of this Washington lobby in the freight rates that are extorted from them. In other words, when the Alaskan shipper is compelled by the monopoly to pay double the rate that is paid for a haul of equal distance on the Pacific coast a considerable part of this tribute money is used in paying the lobbyists for their prevention of measures in Congress that might bring relief to the Territory. Was there ever on earth a monopoly that used more unscrupulous means to maintain its strangle hold on the public? Was there ever a people on earth exploited as the people of Alaska are exploited by this monopoly?

WHAT OF RELIEF?

Senator CUMMINS and Mr. MCFADDEN, knowing of Alaskan conditions through correspondence with friends in Alaska in whom they have absolute confidence, have introduced practical measures for the benefit of the Territory. These bills provide that a few of the Government-owned ships now rusting at their moorings may be placed on a direct route between Pacific coast ports and Seward, the terminal port of the new Government-owned railroad in Alaska. These bills are being most viciously opposed by the Washington lobby of the monopoly.

The passage of the Cummins or McFadden bills would not cause interference with the traffic of the monopoly only to the extent of carrying the freight destined for interior Alaska over the Government railroad and to points intermediate, but the monopoly, through its lobby, says no. If the new railroad is to carry freight on a weight basis, the Government is going to get the same deal in the matter of water rates that the coast shippers are now getting under the fraudulent weight or measurement scheme of the water transportation companies.

The Secretary of the Interior, knowing much of existing conditions in Alaska, asks for power to relieve these conditions by congressional authorization of the use of Government-owned steamships in connection with the railroad, but this is arrogantly opposed by the lobby, even though the Secretary stated his object in asking for the legislation in this language:

> With reference to the proposition to turn over to the Interior Department the transportation problems in Alaska, I may say to you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that this was not my original idea. It is my thought that if it were ever enacted into legislation it would only be as a last resort under any circumstances that I should avail myself of any such authority, because I am frank to say to you that I do not believe in Government operation of transportation lines when it is possible to avoid it, whether it is transportation by ships or transportation by railroads. My idea was that if we had the power, to be used in case of necessity, the necessity would not be so likely to arise.

Doubtless the Secretary desired this legislation only for the purpose of compelling the monopoly to give reasonable water rates or freight destined for points on the railroad.

Under present conditions wherein an absolute monopoly of ocean freight to Alaska is held by the transportation company, the railroad is at their mercy to be exploited in the same manner that the people of the Territory have been exploited in the past and are being exploited at the present time, and thus a Government investment of over $50,000,000 for the development of Alaska is to be used for the selfish ends of monopoly.

WHY LEASE THE RAILROAD?

There is one feature of the proposed legislation that the lobby does not oppose, namely, the lease of the Government railroad to private interests. To whom will it be leased? To the monopoly?

The provision in pending bills whereby the Alaskan Railroad might be leased to private interests has aroused the fear of the people of the interior section of the Territory that it is to pass into control of the monopoly.

I have many letters and telegrams from all sections of Alaska urging me to try to prevent any transfer of the railroad from the Government to private interests, and the following telegram from the geographical center of the Territory is expressive of the sentiment in all sections:

> POORMAN, ALASKA, VIA MELOSRI, ALASKA,
> December 30, 1921.
> D. A. SUTHERLAND,
> Delegate from Alaska, Washington, D. C.:
>
> We, the people of the Poorman district, in mass meeting earnestly request that you, our Delegate, use all your influence and every means within your power to maintain the Alaska Railroad under Government ownership and management.
>
> EDDY M. GETTIGAN, Chairman.
> JOHN SHROPSHIRE, Secretary.

Should the monopoly get its clutches on the railroad, the whole interior section of the Territory will be at its mercy just as the coast is at present.

During all the discussion of methods for the development of Alaska through the agency of the almost completed railroad it is not recorded that a single overture toward cooperation has been made by the transportation monopoly, whose interest in the welfare of the Terrtiory one would believe should be almost as great as that of the Government itself. It seems to look upon the railroad project as something provided for its benefit rather than for the benefit of the people of Alaska. The Secretary of the Interior has the responsibility of successful operation of the Government railroad upon his shoulders. Why should Congress deny him any facility he may request that he believes will aid him in his work?

Regarding the Cummins-McFadden bill the Secretary has said, "In so far as I am personally concerned, that legislation would be perfectly satisfactory to myself." The lobby opposes that legislation most strenuously. It is most unsatisfactory to the monopoly.

Who is the most interested in the upbuilding and development of Alaska, the Secretary of the Interior or the transportation monopoly?

A CONCISE STATEMENT OF THE SOLUTION OF THE ALASKA PROBLEM.

A communication published in the Juneau Capital on October 23 last sets forth so clearly and succinctly the situation in Alaska regarding transportation that I herewith insert it in the RECORD:

> A man might start across a desert with everything necessary to make his trip a comfortable one except a sufficient quantity of fresh water to last him during the journey. It would make no difference how rich a country lay beyond to which he was en route, without water failure is certain and death probable.
>
> So it is with the development of Alaska. Without transportation across the waters separating us from the continental portion of the United States, the development of Alaska will be a failure and the depopulation of the country a certainty. Transportation from the States to Alaska is what water is to the wayfarer crossing the desert; without it Alaska must die.
> It is idle to discuss any other reason as to why Alaska is "advancing backward" until the question of transportation is settled, for as long as the Alaska Syndicate "carries the canteen" only those whom it desires to survive will prosper in Alaska. It makes but little difference whether there are 30 or 1,030 different bureaus governing Alaska, as long as the "man with the canteen" refuses to quench their thirst they must be his slaves.

The consolidation of the activities of Federal bureaus operating in Alaska, although desirable for an improvement in administrative functions, is, indeed, a minor feature of the pending bills. A correction of the transportation system will bring relief to Alaska, will develop its mines, its fisheries, its agricultural lands. The passage of the Cummings-McFadden bill would, I believe, bring the desired results.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a short statement made by the president of the Federal Land Bank of Omaha. There are some figures in it which I think will be valuable for the information of Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT BY D. P. HOGAN, PRESIDENT FEDERAL LAND BANK OF OMAHA.

With $3,125,000 paid-up capital, $625,655.07 surplus and undivided profits, and $56,597,340 in loans, the Federal Land Bank of Omaha is the largest of the 12 Federal land banks and the largest cooperative institution in the United States. The Federal land banks are truly cooperative. The farmer borrowers furnish the capital. All net earnings belong to them.

The suit attacking the constitutionality of the Federal land banks was decided in favor of the banks February 29 of this year, and immediately the Federal Land Bank of Omaha made preparations to resume loaning operations.

Forty million dollars' worth of 5 per cent 20-year bonds were sold for the Federal land bank system in May at par, and a like issue of $60,000,000 in bonds was sold in October at par. Loans have been closed during the year amounting to $9,257,200.

The net earnings of this bank for the year 1921 amount to $400,359.81. A dividend of 6 per cent per annum was declared for the first half of the year, and a dividend of 8 per cent per annum was declared for the last half of the year. The rate charged borrowers on new loans during the year was 6 per cent per annum on the 33-year amortization plan.

Borrowers who secured their loans through this system five years ago at 5 per cent now realize their good fortune. Their loans continue at 5 per cent without renewal charges, while their less fortunate neighbors who borrowed on the old five-year plan are now obliged to renew their loans at a high interest rate with excessive commissions.

The market for farm loan bonds has greatly improved during the past three months and there is every reason to believe that a much larger issue of bonds will be taken by investors in the next bond sale than has been taken in the last year.

In spite of adverse agricultural conditions during the past year the loans of the Federal Land Bank of Omaha have proved their high quality by the very limited number of delinquents shown in the monthly statements to the Farm Loan Board. Those remaining past due longer than 60 days are so small as to be practically negligible.

The officers of the Federal Land Bank of Omaha are fully informed of the urgent need of farm loan funds in this district and are making every effort in their power to secure as large a supply of funds for loans as possible.

There is every reason to hope that the market for Federal land bank bonds will continue to improve and that within the next six months the supply of funds will fairly well take care of the demand of eligible borrowers for good loans.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions and bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 79. Joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic;

S. J. Res. 140. Joint resolution relative to payment of tuition for Indian children enrolled in Montana State public schools; and

S. 2186. An act granting certain lands in Hot Springs, Ark., to the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS AND BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolutions and bill of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 79. Joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic; to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. J. Res. 140. Joint resolution relative to payment of tuition for Indian children enrolled in Montana State public schools; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 2186. An act granting certain lands in Hot Springs, Ark., to the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2914. An act to add certain lands to Minidoka National Forest;

H. R. 8344. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes;

H. R. 7204. An act to provide a Government-owned water-service system for the Fort Monroe Military Reservation;

H. R. 5700. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old Subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.;

H. R. 9021. An act to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America;

H. R. 8401. An act to transfer the custody and control of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department; and

H. R. 6380. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended.

CORRECTION.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] is absent from the city on official business, and he asked me to request unanimous consent that roll call No. 28, January 4, be corrected. He voted "aye," but was paired with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. He wishes permission to withdraw his vote of "aye" and be recorded "present."

The SPEAKER. That can not be done at this time. However, the statement of the gentleman from Missouri will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. DYER. He wanted to do justice to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BLACK, for three days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HIMES was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of John M. Doddridge, H. R. 13345, Sixty-sixth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, while there is much legislation now ready for consideration in the House from the Committee on the District of Columbia, yet in deference to the high regard in which the House held the distinguished Delegate from the Hawaiian Islands, Mr. KALANIANAOLE, whose death occurred Saturday last, and out of respect for him and his services in this House, I feel constrained to yield our claims upon the House for this day.

DEATH OF MR. KALANIANAOLE.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce to the House the death at Honolulu at 37 minutes past 2 o'clock last Saturday morning, of that patriotic American and splendid representative of his people, the Hon. JONAH KUHIO KALANIANAOLE. At some future time the House will undoubtedly set aside a day on which to adequately commemorate his services to his people and to the country. At present I offer the following resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 261.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JONAH KUHIO KALANIANAOLE, the Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly, in accordance with the resolution heretofore agreed to (at 12 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 10, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

456. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting request for the passage of legislation contained in House Document No. 531, Sixty-fifth Congress, transferring portion of old public-building site at Baltimore, Md.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

457. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a tentative draft of legislation authorizing the sale of certain parcels of land acquired for Federal building sites, etc., which are no longer needed for the purposes of the Government; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

458. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting request for the passage of the legislation contained in House Document No. 532, Sixty-fifth Congress, concerning deed for land for site of post-office building in New York City; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

459. A letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting text of the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the year ended October 31, 1921; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

460. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the fifth annual report of the Federal Farm Loan Board for the year ended November 30, 1921 (H. Doc. No. 147); to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4933) granting a pension to W. W. Cooper; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 9147) granting a pension to William Lehman; Committee on Pensions discharged and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

3440. By Mr. MacGREGOR: Resolution adopted at a session of the council of the city of Buffalo, held on the 4th day of January, 1922, relative to excessive coal prices; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 10, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, from whom come all blessings and direction in the great affairs of life, we would humbly represent before Thee our needs and seek from Thee guidance to-day and every day, so that we may live acceptably before Thee. We pray for direction this morning. Grant unto him who assumes to-day grave responsibility the wisdom that cometh from above. May he and all others in connection with this honorable assembly find it their highest pleasure to do the will of God and serve the Nation accordingly. We ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. LODGE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I present the credentials of GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER, a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, appointed by the governor to fill the existing vacancy in the Senate from that State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

IN THE NAME AND BY AUTHORITY OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Executive Department.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

This is to certify that pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, I, William C. Sproul, the governor of said State, do hereby appoint GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER a Senator from said State, to represent said State in the Senate of the United States until the vacancy therein, caused by the death of the Hon. BOIES PENROSE, is filled by election, as provided by law.

Witness: His excellency our governor, and our seal hereto affixed at Harrisburg, this 9th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1922.

[SEAL.] WM. C. SPROUL, Governor.

By the governor:
BERNARD J. MYERS,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The credentials will be placed on the files of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. PEPPER is here and ready to take the oath.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator appointed will present himself at the desk.

Mr. PEPPER, escorted by Mr. LODGE, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him he took his seat in the Senate.

REINTERMENT OF SOLDIER DEAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Quartermaster General of the Army, Brig. Gen. C. R. Krauthoff, Quartermaster Corps, transmitting lists of American soldier dead returned from overseas, to be reinterred in Arlington National Cemetery, Thursday, January 12, 1922, at 2.30 p. m., which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table for inspection by Senators.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution adopted by the Alfalfa Grange, of Grand View, Idaho, favoring the enactment of Senate bill 2604, the so-called Ladd honest money bill, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of Royal Arch Masons of the fifth Masonic district of North Dakota, held at Lisbon, N. Dak., January 3, 1922, favoring the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented 12 petitions of sundry citizens of Hampden, Edmore, Loma, Galesburg, Hope, Hunter, Driscoll, Steele, Rocklake, Wheelock, Carpio, Fessenden, Merricourt, Tioga, Kintyre, Marion, and Divide County, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation and its management by officials not connected with grain exchanges, middlemen's interests, or millers, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Alumni of the Yale University Forest School, of New Haven, Conn., protesting against the proposed transfer of the United States Forest Service from the Department of Agriculture to any other department, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Miltiary Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1456) for the relief of Col. Herbert Deakyne, Corps of Engineers, United States Army (Rept. No. 395); and

A bill (S. 2493) to relieve enlisted men affected thereby from certain hardship incident to the operation of the proviso of section 4b of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, and to protect disbursing officers in connection therewith (Rept. No. 396).

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2173) to loan to the College of William and Mary in Virginia two of the cannon surrendered by the British at Yorktown on October 19, 1781, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 397) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2824) to extend the provisions of section 2305, Revised Statutes, and of the act of September 29, 1919, to those discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and subsequently awarded compensation or treated for wounds received or disability incurred in line of duty, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 2953) for the relief of Fred N. Dunham; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2954) granting an increase of pension to Wilbur A. Richardson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 2955) granting a pension to Helen G. Noyes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

BONUS COMPENSATION FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have received a great many letters from Government employees asking me whether it was necessary for them to join a Federal Employees' Union in order that they may receive the bonus for the coming fiscal year. If there had been only a few of such letters, I could have answered them all; but there have been so many of them that I deem it right and proper to make a statement to the Senate with reference to the matter.

Every Senator has undoubtedly noticed the drive that is being made among Government employees to get them to join the union, it being given as a reason that every Government employee ought to do it because of the fact that in so doing they can thus force the Congress to act favorably upon the bonus for the coming year.

I am going to take this means of saying to the Government employees that it is not necessary for them to join any union with the thought that by so doing they are going to change any action of Congress in relation to the bonus. I have no idea that Congress is going to take $240 off of the pay of the employees of the Government if the reclassification bill is not enacted into law by July 1, 1922. In some cases it could not be done without bringing hardship and, indeed, actual want upon a certain class of employees, and I know that Congress will not undertake to do such a thing. I feel like saying to the employees that if they desire to join a Federal union they may do so and pay their money to the said union, but it is not going to influence Congress one iota as to the bonus or any other legislation.

This statement will be an answer to the many, many letters that I have received from various Government employees. There is no necessity for the drive, there is no necessity for the employees being disturbed over the matter, and I am quite sure when I say this that I voice the sentiment of both the House and the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask my colleague whether by anything he has said he intended to convey the idea that it was the policy, so far as he may speak for the administration, that the employees of the Government should join unions—not unions of Federal employees, among themselves—but unions affilliated with some international or national organization which might be deemed extraneous to the Government itself?

Mr. SMOOT. I never heard any member of the administration—referring now to the President and the members of his Cabinet—express himself upon that point. I have reference to the Federal Employees' Union.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, two years ago, as I recall, the League of Nations began its activities. I have here a very brief résumé of its accomplishments and its activities during that period. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Democratic Research Bulletin, Jan. 10, 1922, No. 20. Bureau of Political Research, Robert Goldsmith, director Democratic National Committee, Woodward Building, Washington, D. C.]

SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF THE LEAGUE—THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS WAS 2 YEARS OLD ON JANUARY 10.

The following résumé of the league's activities and accomplishments to date was prepared by the League of Nations News Bureau:

CONSTITUENCY AND CHARACTER OF THE LEAGUE.

Two years ago when the league came into being it was composed of but 13 former allied powers. Since then all the allied powers, except America, have joined; the 13 former neutral powers invited to adhere have done so; and 2 of the 4 ex-enemy States and half a dozen new States born in the war have been admitted. To-day, on its second anniversary, the league numbers 51 nations, the largest collection of States ever brought together.

In those two years there has been built up a loose, flexible association of cooperating nations able to focus attention on any international problem from a purely humanitarian project to the most serious diplomatic issue. The outline of a general international structure has been drawn to be filled in as time and experience seem to justify. In certain major matters of common interest most of the world's nations, whether of Europe, the Americas, Asia, or Africa, have learned to confer about a common table.

There are now functioning an annual assembly of 51 nations; a council of the 8 larger nations; a permanent court of justice; a permanent secretariat; technical organizations on international health, finance, economics, and freedom of communications and transit; an international labor office; permanent committees on armaments and mandates; special bodies on the suppression of the international opium and white-slave traffics, repatriation of prisoners, the relief of typhus in Poland, the protection of minorities, and the administration of the Saar Basin and the free city of Danzig.

NIPPING WARS IN THE BUD.

The league's first task, of course, is to prevent war. Already five disputes threatening world peace have been brought before it. Three have been settled finally and two are in negotiation. Procedure wholly new in diplomacy has been used on several occasions, but force never.

The first conflict settled was that between Sweden and Finland over the strategic Aaland Islands, when detailed negotiations gave the sovereignty of the islands to Finland, assured absolute protection to their predominant Swedish population, and effected their neutralization through a 10-power treaty.

Second was the Polish-Lithuanian dispute, where the league has prevented the hostilities threatened by Zoligovski's seizure of Vilna and offered a project of settlement which is still being negotiated.

Third was the Upper Silesia dispute, which because of the deadlock between Great Britain and France threatened the break-up of the Entente and which was solved only when the league was called in and drew up an entirely new form of solution safeguarding economic as well as nationality interests.

Fourth was the Jugo-Slav invasion of Albania, when Lloyd-George's telegram to the league requesting the application of the economic blockade against Serbia for having begun hostilities without arbitration, and immediate public sessions of the councils sent Jugo-Slav exchange tumbling, held up an important loan, and forced the Jugo-Slav Government to withdraw its troops behind the frontier.

Finally the three-cornered Tacha-Arica dispute was argued at length in public session on demand of Bolivia, and although the results were not conclusive it is interesting to note that Chile has since initiated direct negotiations with Peru on the question and has definitely proposed a plebiscite.

REMOVING CAUSES OF WAR.

But the mere settlement of disputes already arisen is not sufficient guaranty of peace, for if disputes are allowed to develop until they become critical, the time is certain to come when one amongst them will get out of hand and the world's peace be again ruptured. Consequently, an even more constructive work has been undertaken, first in setting about removing as many general causes of difficulty as possible, and, second, in providing a permanent machinery to be ready at all times.

ASSEMBLY.

The crown of that work is the assembly, where representatives of the 51 league members come together automatically on the first Monday in every September to discuss any question which any nation wishes to bring up as affecting the peace or well-being of the world. Through its two sessions at Geneva the assembly has become a well-oiled, smooth-running forum, without power of compulsion but with great moral authority.

COUNCIL.

The council, consisting of representatives of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan permanently and of Belgium, Brazil, Spain, and China temporarily, will hold its sixteenth meeting at Geneva to-day (January 10). It is a small, informal body charged with the general direction of the league and able in emergencies to meet on a week's notice. It was just some such body as this that Sir Edward Grey failed to find when the Austrian crisis of 1914 precipitated the World War.

SECRETARIAT.

The third central body is the secretariat, an international civil service of about 250 people and over 30 nationalities, charged with carrying on all the daily work of the league, serving as an international center of experts named for their knowledge rather than their politics, and specifically entrusted with the publication of all treaties registered by league members, some 250 of which have already been received.

COURT.

Next is the permanent court of international justice, a court of law basing its judgments not on diplomatic adjustment but on legal principle, and entrusted, with the council, in making effective the covenant's fundamental principle that no nation shall go to war without arbitration or conciliation. Here the league has achieved its greatest single triumph, for as against the failure of The Hague and other conferences it has succeeded in creating a court of 11 judges and 4 deputy judges, which will hold its first meeting on January 30. This court is of peculiar interest to America because Elihu Root helped draft its statute and John Bassett Moore sits as one of its judges.

TECHNICAL ORGANIZATIONS.

Beyond these bodies are the technical organizations, so called because dealing in technical questions as distinct from political and diplomatic. Most highly developed is that on freedom of communications and transit, which has already held an international meeting of 40 nations at Barcelona and worked out draft treaties aiming to assure a readier flow of trade between nations by removing certain of the unnecessary war barriers. Next is that on finance and economics, which directed the Brussels financial conference of some 35 nations, including the United States and Germany, worked out the details of the so-called Ter Muelen scheme, and laid down a complete program for the reconstruction of Austria, which only awaits the release of liens by the United States to be put into operation. Finally is the health organization for coordinating the activities of the various nations for the prevention of world epidemics, as shown in the work already undertaken in helping relieve typhus in Poland by means of about a million dollars contributed by the members of the league, and in the present conference at London, which America is officially attending, for the international standardization of antitoxic sera.

HUMANITARIAN ACTIVITIES.

Certain humanitarian tasks were also intrusted to the league in the peace treaties. First is the oversight of the mandated territories containing about 13,000,000 backward peoples. Though the United States several times delayed this work by protests on points of detail, the mandates for former German Southwest Africa and the former German Pacific islands were confirmd a year ago; the Japanese and the Australian Governments have already sent in the required annual reports; and the permanent mandates commission, composed of colonial experts, begun its work of oversight.

At the same time the Saar Valley, a vital coal area of about 625,000 people between Germany and France, has been administered for over a year by a league commission composed of a French, Belgian, Danish, Canadian, and Saarlouisian member; and the free city of Danzig has been enabled to work out its difficult relationships with Germany and Poland through the protection of the league. Similarly, some dozen treaties have been signed with nearly all the nations of eastern Europe and the Balkans promising certain minimum rights to their racial, religious, or linguistic minorities and recognizing the league as the agency of interpretation or appeal.

So, also, two important prewar social projects have been taken over by the league. As regards the suppression of the traffic in opium, the expert advisory committee has begun its work, and the council and the assembly have gone far beyond anything ever before attempted to initiating definite plans not only that the traffic be controlled but that the production be limited to purely legitimate needs. As regards the suppression of the international white-slave traffic, a conference of 30 nations was held at Geneva last spring; a new convention was drawn up and indorsed by the assembly, and 23 nations have already put their signatures to it.

Moreover, certain specific humanitarian emergencies have been met. Under direction of Dr. Nansen over 400,000 prisoners of war, many of whom had been in exile for five and six years, have been returned to their homes. The plight of the 800,000 Russian refugees squeezed out of Russia into the neighboring States and that of unnumbered thousands of Armenian women and children dragged off into Turkish harems are slowly being ameliorated through the league.

TOWARD REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS.

Where the league has achieved least success is in reduction of armaments. Progress has been impossible in naval questions because of America's absence, and delayed in military matters by Europe's unstable political situation. Nevertheless certain preparatory work has been effected; the question of budgetary limitation and statistical information studied; and two corollary projects, the suppression of the traffic in arms and munitions to backward countries and the control of the private manufacture of arms initiated.

SUMMARY.

In the past two years, then, it may safely be said that the League of Nations has built up a flexible structure for international cooperation; has solved several serious conflicts between nations and established the machinery for solving others that may arise; has begun the creation of a new kind of international law; has advanced certain highly humanitarian projects; has provided a broad forum for international conference whether on general or technical questions; and demonstrated that nations can cooperate without losing their sovereignty, without using force, and with mutual advantage to all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday, the 13th instant, I shall address the Senate on the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 172, submitted by Mr. SPENCER November 15, 1921, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], in the nature of a substitute, denying the right of Truman H. Newberry to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. May I inquire what time I have left out of my hour?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has 11 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Thank you.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if this controversy involved alone the question of Mr. Newberry occupying a seat in this Chamber for the next four years, I should content myself with my vote and not trespass upon the time of the Senate in the further discussion. But it is the precedent that is about to be established which concerns me much more than the other proposition, important as that may be. A somewhat careful study of the law and an investigation of the facts in this controversy lead me to the following conclusions, which I shall briefly undertake to sustain.

First. That the primary is a part of the election process, and that the improper use of money in the primary has the same effect in invalidating the election as the use of money in the election proper.

Second. That the amount expended in the Michigan election was such as to lead to the conclusion that it was intended to and did corruptly affect the result of the primary election.

Third. That no man can be the beneficiary of a corrupt election when such corruption was had in his behalf, whether he personally participated in the corrupt methods or not.

Fourth. That the committee which expended this money was Mr. Newberry's committee. If not actually selected by him, it was accepted by him, and he cooperated with it. Therefore, the committee's acts became his acts.

Fifth. That Mr. Newberry had such knowledge of the expenditure of the money and the doings of the committee and the methods of expenditure as to charge him with responsibility for whatever the committee did.

Sixth. That the State statute was repeatedly violated.

Seventh. That the Federal statute, not as yet declared unconstitutional, was violated.

Eighth. That the election being tainted with corruption and controlled through the use of money is void, and the seat occupied by the sitting Member should be declared vacant.

Mr. President, no one justifies the amount of money which was expended in the Michigan senatorial primary election. It has been condemned alike by those supporting Mr. Newberry's contention and by those who are opposed to it. The Committee on Privileges and Elections in its majority report condemns the amount expended; the minority of the committee also condemns it; and, so far as I have been able to listen to or to read the remarks of the different Senators speaking upon the subject, it has been condemned by all. Not only the amount expended has been condemned but it seems to me that the manner of the expenditure has not been successfully defended.

The question then seems to turn upon the relationship of Mr. Newberry to his committee and his knowledge of what transpired during the campaign. I might contend, and I think successfully under the law, that if the election were actually corrupted no one could be the beneficiary of that election, especially no one in whose behalf the corruption took place. That has been the law in some countries, particularly in England, for many decades, and I believe is the law to which we shall ultimately have to come if we are to protect the purity of elections in this country. It is not necessary, however, as I view it in this controversy, to go to that extent.

I want to take up first the question of whose committee it was that did the things which no one now defends and what relationship did Mr. Newberry bear to that committee.

The chairman of that committee was Mr. Templeton, long a business associate, acquaintance, and friend of Mr. Newberry. Mr. Newberry met Mr. Templeton in New York and had an interview with him about acting as chairman of that committee. It has been said that the campaign committee was a business man's committee. To some extent it was, but the idea that it should be a business man's committee and as to who should head it came from the sitting member himself.

The interview between Mr. Templeton and Mr. Newberry was not, so far as it is given in the record, an extended interview, but it very clearly demonstrates the relationship of the chairman of that committee to Mr. Newberry and Mr. Newberry's relationship to the committee thereafter. I quote from the record the following excerpt from the testimony of Mr. Templeton:

> He [Newberry] said he was very anxious that if he should run to have a business man's campaign, and that perhaps I would be willing to have a business man's committee in Detroit. I said if that was all there was to it, I saw no objection.

That is all the testimony bearing directly upon the selection of Mr. Templeton, according to his testimony, as chairman of the business man's committee; but the suggestion with reference to the committee and the kind of committee first came from Mr. Newberry, and also that Mr. Templeton should have charge of the committee or "to have a business man's committee," as he puts it in his testimony. He said that if that was the extent of it, he had no objection. That seems to close the transaction and Mr. Templeton became chairman.

This conversation between Mr. Templeton and Mr. Newberry took place prior to the time, as I read the record, that anybody else had suggested Mr. Templeton as chairman; prior to the time that anybody else had suggested to Mr. Newberry that Mr. Templeton should be the chairman or be the head of the business man's committee. So far as we have the origin of this organization and the committee, it originated in the conversation between Mr. Templeton and Mr. Newberry in New York, and then and there Mr. Templeton accepted the position which Mr. Newberry wished him to have.

Templeton said that this was weeks before the interview, upon which so much stress has been laid, which took place in the Statler Hotel between Mr. Cody, Mr. King, and Mr. Templeton. At this interview in the Statler Hotel in Detroit there was a conversation which has been construed, as I understand, to have been the beginning or the initiation of the organization of the committee; but Mr. Templeton advises us that his conversation with Mr. Newberry was long prior to the time that he had the conversation in the Statler Hotel with Mr. King and Mr. Cody.

Now, who was it that suggested the chairmanship of the committee and the kind of a committee that should be organized? It did not originate with the business men of Detroit; it was not initiated at home; it was initiated in New York, suggested there, and concluded there. Does anyone suppose that Mr. Templeton would have been the chairman of the committee if he had not been solicited by Mr. Newberry? Does anyone suppose that Mr. Templeton would have taken a part in the campaign at all had it not been at the request and upon the express desire and wish of Mr. Newberry? In other words, whose chairman was he? Who solicited him? Who made him the head of the committee? In whose mind did the thought originate? Who conceived the idea of a business man's committee and the chairmanship of it? The sitting member himself, as he practically admitted in his statement upon yesterday.

Now, I undertake to say, Mr. President, that both in morals and in law Mr. Newberry was responsible for Mr. Templeton's acts after that conversation; neither in morals nor in law could he ever release himself, unless he did so by an open repudiation. In other words, whatever Mr. Templeton did as the chairman or the head of the committee, or that the committee did under the leadership of Mr. Templeton, was the act of Mr. Newberry from that time on, regardless of whether we appeal to the principles of morals, of ethics, or clean politics, or of law.

I may give an illustration, Mr. President, which it seems to me would be applicable at this time: Suppose that there had been in contemplation some offense to be committed in the State of Michigan, and that some particular individual, Mr. Jones, had been interested in the commission of the act, and the man who was at the head of the organization in consummating that offense should have been found to be in conversation with Mr. Jones in New York prior to that time, arranging for the criminal act, would he not be held responsible not only in morals but in criminal law unless he thereafter disclosed an utter repudiation? Would the mere fact that Mr. Jones was out of the State when the crime was committed release him of responsibility? After he set his agent in motion could he escape by being physically absent? Oh, no; he would be just as guilty as if he had gone to Michigan and physically participated.

Mr. President, it also appears that Mr. Templeton solicited funds; but as to that I am not particularly concerned at this time.

Who was the next important member of the Newberry campaign committee? It was Mr. Paul King; but Mr. Paul King never became the manager of the committee, or accepted the responsibility for it, until after he had an interview with Mr. Newberry. It is true that his name was suggested by another party; but it was only a suggestion, and the suggestion did not ripen into the managership until after Mr. King had gone to New York and had his interview with Mr. Newberry, in which Mr. Newberry and he came to an understanding in regard to it. I read very briefly from the testimony of Mr. King as found on page 324 of the record:

> Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You finally got in touch with Mr. Newberry, did you not?
> Mr. KING. I went down to see him; yes, sir.
> Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Who got you in touch with him?
> Mr. MURFIN. That was all gone over at great length in the record.
> Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Who got you to go and see Mr. Newberry?
> Mr. KING. I think it was my own idea.
> * * * * * * *

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Somebody proposed that you should be the manager of this campaign. Who was it?
Mr. KING. As I said, Mr. Scott was one. Mr. Fred Cody was another. Mr. Allan Templeton was another.

They were the gentlemen with whom Mr. Newberry had talked some weeks before.

Then, from page 467 of the record, I quote the following:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Cody made arrangements for you to go to New York to meet Newberry, did he not?
Mr. KING. I think not.
Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Who did?
Mr. KING. It seems to me it was Commander Newberry.

In other words, not until Mr. Paul King had gone to New York and had a conversation with Mr. Newberry, in which they talked over the campaign and the probable amount of expenditures, did he stand in the relationship of manager of Mr. Newberry's campaign. Now, what difference does it make whether Mr. King's name was first suggested by Mr. Cody or by Mr. Templeton? The fact is the suggestion did not ripen into the managership until Mr. Newberry and Mr. King met and conversed in the city of New York. Thus we see the two parties who were the head of the organization, including the man who particularly controlled the campaign and managed it, had no relationship to the campaign except by way of suggestion until they had interviews with Mr. Newberry.

I ask as a matter of practical common sense, and as a matter of morals and of law, who selected Mr. King as the manager of this campaign? Do Senators suppose that Mr. King would have been manager if he had not seen Mr. Newberry and conversed with him? Do Senators think that Mr. King acted as manager by reason of suggestions which came from people at home, or by reason of suggestions made by Mr. Newberry in New York? Mr. King advises us not only with reference to the conversation between Mr. Newberry and himself, but he advises us that every man who became identified with the committee had his name submitted to Mr. Newberry for approval. There were no volunteers on this committee; it was not a business man's committee in so far as any initiation upon the part of the business men was concerned.

It was a committee selected in the first instance by Mr. Newberry, or always ratified by Mr. Newberry. Mr. Floyd, who was the secretary and one of the important factors, had his name sent in for approval by Mr. King, but he was not secretary until Mr. Newberry approved. Mr. Blair had his name sent in for approval, but he was not treasurer until Mr. Newberry approved. I ask my senatorial friends, Whose committee was this? Who selected this committee? Under whose supervision did they have to pass for approval? Whose sanction must they receive before they started upon this campaign?

Mr. President, there is another gentleman of importance in this matter, and that is Mr. Smith. We have first the chairman, second the manager, third the secretary and treasurer, and then we have the man who was to supply the funds. It does not make any difference just now, so far as I am concerned, where the money came from. I will speak of that later if I can find time; but the man who was to find the funds—I do not care whether he went into the safes of New York or the safes of Detroit—was the confidential agent, and had been for years, of Mr. Newberry. He held his power of attorney. He was entitled to check not only against Mr. Newberry's brother's funds and the funds of the other members of the estate, but he was entitled to check against Mr. Newberry's funds also. He held, so far as the testimony discloses, an unlimited and uncircumscribed power of attorney. He stood in the place, in contemplation of law, of the sitting Member. He had all the power to check money that the sitting Member had against his own funds if he saw fit to do it.

So, sir, we have the chairman selected specifically by Mr. Truman Newberry, the manager approved by him, the other members approved by him, and the man who was checking the money holding his power of attorney. I ask, therefore, can we start out with the theory that this was the committee of anyone except Mr. Newberry? Will men seriously contend that it was not Mr. Newberry's committee, tested by all rules of law and all rules of common sense?

But suppose, Mr. President, that we pass by entirely the question of the selection of this committee. There is another rule of law and another rule of morals just as well established upon which there can not be any possible controversy in this matter, and that is that if there is suggested to me the name of a man who is to represent me and I accept it, receive reports from him, report to him, converse with him, and advise with him, he is my committeeman, my representative, and my agent just as conclusively as if his name had been in the first instance suggested by me.

What is the fact? The fact is that Mr. Newberry was in close touch with this committee every day from the time that he talked with its members, in the first instance, until the returns came in from the primary. Will Senators undertake to say that you can hold your relationship to men through a campaign, advising with them, counseling with them, receiving reports from them, and then repudiate the fact that they were your committee when the campaign is over? Neither in law nor in morals, in decency nor in ethics, could any such proposition ever be sustained. It is for that reason that I said in the beginning of my remarks that I am vastly more concerned with the precedent which is being established in this case than I am with who shall occupy this seat for the next four years. The question of the mere holding of the seat is a single question, but such a precedent as will be established by the success of this defense will work evil so long as it stands, put a premium upon corruption, and menace the whole fabric of representative government.

If the contention be sustained here that you may have a committee in the field tacitly accepted by you, operating under your direction and control, or advising with you and making reports, and nevertheless anything that this committee does in the way of corrupting an election, is not binding upon you, the candidate, then we have opened the doors wide to unlimited and uncircumscribed corruption, and there is no way in the world by which it can be prevented. A man may take his vacation in the retreats of the South during the time that the campaign is on, or vice versa, or he may go to Europe, and before he starts he may call into his room, for example, Mr. Templeton, and say: "I am going to be a candidate for the Senate. I am going to Europe. I want you to have a committee look after my interests while I am gone." Mr. Templeton goes and absolutely corrupts an election, we will say, expends untold amounts of money, and when the election is over he reports to the gentleman who went to Europe: "Your election is secured." The seat is contested, and all that the man who went to Europe would have to say would be: "I was in Europe when the corruption took place. I do not know how much was expended. True, I am the beneficiary of it; I am here claiming the results of the campaign; but I do not know what they expended, and therefore this election ought to stand." A more shameless exhibition of unblushing effrontery you could not offer to the decent citizen who is concerned in the purity of the ballot.

It is the precedent, the rule, the principle which you are invoking in this case and laying down that is infinitely more important and will longer rise to plague you than any question of who shall occupy this seat for the next four years.

Now, Mr. President, let us go a little further and see how much knowledge Mr. Newberry had as to what was actually going on.

In the first place, in the conference which took place between Mr. King and Mr. Newberry at the time Mr. King consented to be Mr. Newberry's manager, Mr. King told Mr. Newberry that it would cost at least $50,000 to conduct a campaign, and gave him the reasons. Here we have them going over, at the very first interview, the question of the expenditure of money, and the sum estimated to begin with is $50,000—a sum which of itself was calculated to arouse the anxiety of any one who desired to keep within the law. I do not contend that $50,000 could not have been expended under the law of Michigan without getting outside the law. There were certain things for which it could be expended; but when Mr. King advised Mr. Newberry that it would cost $50,000, that was notice to Mr. Newberry that he must be on guard to see that the $50,000 was expended along certain lines and compelled to flow in certain channels.

It has been a little interesting to me to understand why, if this was a business men's campaign and conducted by the business men and paid for by the business men, Mr. Newberry should be interested in the first instance in knowing the expense of the campaign. He could be interested only for one of two reasons: First, because he was going to pay it—and he says he was not—or because he knew that such sums might be turned loose as would get outside of the law. In any event, he was put upon his inquiry, he was put upon his guard, as to the amount of expenditure; and this was away back in April, 1918. The very amount suggested was one which called for vigilance upon the part of Newberry.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I would rather not be interrupted, because I have only an hour in which to speak.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I simply wanted to ask one question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is conceded upon all hands that Mr. Newberry had full knowledge of the campaign except as to the details of the expenditures. Nobody denies, his attorney does not deny, that he had full knowledge of everything except the dangerous things; that he advised and counseled upon every question which arose; that he sent out letters which were sent to him for that purpose; that he saw individuals whom it was necessary to see in New York; that he kept track of the amount of publicity; and that he was fully informed as to the entire campaign in all its details, except the details of the expenditure of money. That is denied.

In the brief of the attorney for Mr. Newberry it is stated:

From that time on Commander Newberry was kept advised of the progress, development, and general nature of this campaign. This has never been denied, has never been a secret. He admittedly had nothing to do with the active management or the giving of orders. He frequently made suggestions, and conferences on questions of policy were not unusual. That he knew anything as to the detail of what was going on can not be successfully claimed by anyone, but that he was kept advised in general of the nature and character of this campaign there is no doubt. * * * The campaign—was undoubtedly the most pretentious, the most thoroughly planned, the most far-reaching, and the best organized that had ever been staged in any community.

Says the attorney—

Of which Mr. Newberry had full knowledge at all times, except, it is said, as to the expenditure of the money.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who listened to the testimony before the committee, and one of the members of the committee, said:

Of course, Mr. Newberry fully understood the situation. The only denial that he makes at all is in reference to the financial knowledge. Mr. Newberry knew precisely what was going on.

So we have, to start with, the proposition that Mr. Newberry was fully informed of all concerning the campaign except the question of the actual expenditure of money. That is a controverted question here; but how, I ask as a practical proposition, could Mr. Newberry have his committee, with which he was cooperating, and have full knowledge of everything that was going on, and not include the knowledge with reference to the expenditure of money? The other knowledge which it is confessed he had necessarily included the knowledge of the expenditure of the money.

I do not contend that Mr. Newberry, for instance, knew, perhaps, that John Doe was paid $50 for this service, or that another man was paid $100 for that service, or that this or that newspaper was paid for this or that particular matter. That is a subject about which there can be a legitimate difference of opinion, and I am perfectly willing to give Mr. Newberry the benefit of the doubt, because I apprehend that in all probability he did not know the details; but that he knew that the money was being expended in this tremendous amount, that he knew in a general way the purposes for which it was being expended, that he was kept thoroughly informed by his committee as to all the facts, is an uncontroverted and an indisputable proposition in this controversy.

Let us go a little further.

On July 28, prior to the election, having this general knowledge of what was going on, and being in daily touch with his campaign committee, Mr. Newberry makes complaint as to the expenditures. He wanted to know when these expenditures of this large amount of money were going to cease. He knew in the beginning it was $50,000, and of that he made no complaint. On the 28th of July it had risen to such a stupendous figure apparently that he came to the conclusion that he must make further inquiry in regard to the amount which was to be expended. How can it be contended, my friends, that Mr. Newberry did not then and there have all the knowledge which was necessary to put him upon inquiry as to the details of all the expenditures? It is a rule of law, as well as of morals, that if a man has knowledge which puts him upon inquiry he has knowledge of everything to which that inquiry would lead; and Mr. Newberry, knowing that this amount of money was being expended, far beyond anything he thought was reasonable, could not close his eyes to the investigation of how it was being expended. That was on the 28th day of July.

Mr. President, it was during this time that there was a reason why Mr. Newberry should be concerned in this expenditure, which, I must say, reflects very strongly upon the good intent behind this defense. On the 28th of July he had this knowledge, and made inquiry. What was Mr. Fred Smith, his confidential agent, doing at that time? He was checking in great amounts against John Newberry, until John Newberry's account was run down to the point where he had to check the money out of Truman Newberry's account into John Newberry's account, and then from John Newberry's account into the treasury of the campaign.

It is an indisputable and an uncontroverted proposition that money was checked out of Mr. Truman Newberry's account into Mr. John Newberry's account when John Newberry's account got down to the point where it needed supply, and it was at that time, or about that time, as near as I can gather, that Mr. Newberry said, "Where is this expenditure going to stop?" Yet it is said in the Senate of the United States that the expenditure of this money is not to be visited upon the seat itself, and the question of its purity or impurity thereby determined.

I call attention, now, Mr. President, to another form of knowledge. This expenditure of money had reached such a climax and to such a point in the State of Michigan that it was not only discussed by the newspapers, not only declared to be an issue in the campaign in the State of Michigan, but it spread out over the adjoining States of the Union, and became a matter of national notoriety and a scandal throughout the country.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. If Senator Newberry did have knowledge of the expenditure of this large sum, which in a general way he certainly did, by his own acknowledgment, and if this money was expended entirely within the law, as stipulated and analyzed in the sworn report filed, would that make Senator Newberry guilty of any crime, even if he had known of it?

Mr. BORAH. No; but I am coming to that in a few moments. Of course, I can cover only one point at a time. Replying briefly to the Senator, I contend that the evidence is ample that this money was not expended within the law. But I want to say another thing before I conclude on that proposition, that my conception of the law with reference to the purity of elections would lead me to vote this seat vacant if there were no statute upon the statute books of the State of Michigan, or Federal statute, either. I am arguing it from the Senator's standpoint now, however, and not from mine. I undertake to say that the law is well established that if money has been used to such an extent that a reasonable mind would say that it has controlled or affected the election, that of itself is sufficient to invalidate the election, regardless of whether there has been any statute passed or not. I will come to that a little later, but I am now discussing it from the standpoint of the Senator.

Mr. Newberry did have knowledge, which was his knowledge, because his agent, with his written authority in his hand, was checking out of Truman H. Newberry's account, and in law and in morals that was his knowledge. Mind you, it is not the knowledge of Mr. Smith as an agent alone that he was checking money out of John Newberry's account, and then, when it ran down, checking it out of Truman's into John's account, but that was Truman Newberry himself, because the man held his power of attorney, and in law and in morals he is bound by the act, just the same as if Mr. Smith had said to him over the 'phone, "I am checking out of your account."

It seems to me we would not dare to lay down the rule in the Senate that a man may give a power of attorney to check against his account and then not be held responsible for what that man does in the way of filling the coffers for the purpose of corrupting an election. That is infinitely worse than the seating of Mr. Newberry. The defense in this case, in my judgment, is much worse than the original offense, because it establishes a precedent fraught with danger for all time.

But, as I was saying when interrupted, not only did Mr. Newberry have this knowledge but he had the knowledge which every man in the State of Michigan had, a knowledge that the manner in which the campaign was being conducted was such as to cause it to be described and designated as a scandal and in violation of the law.

I was in the State of Michigan a few months after this happened, traveling over the State of Michigan, and if Mr. Newberry, as a citizen of the State of Michigan, did not know all about this proposition he was about the only man, I venture to say, who had a citizenship in the State of Michigan who did not.

But his attention was particularly called to it by communications from men who stood high in the community. They might have been his political opponents; I do not know. I understood him to say yesterday they were his political opponents. That would make no difference as to the knowledge which they brought home to him.

The editor of the paper at Grand Rapids wrote him a letter and called his attention to the fact that the campaign had become a scandal, that they were doling out money without regard to decency or the purity of elections, or the standing of the State of Michigan itself. Not only that, but there was put upon the wires an interview, carried by the Associated Press, which went all over the country, by the lieutenant governor of the State of Michigan, as to what was going on in the State of Michigan.

Will it be said, Mr. President, that a man can have such knowledge as that and still sit quietly in the State of New York, knowing what is going on in his behalf, and not thereafter be held responsible, in case the transgression of the law or of morals has been established by the act of those agents? We are undertaking to establish the fact that notwithstanding the information came to everyone else, it was shut out of the knowledge of Mr. Newberry because he refused to consider it when it reached him.

Mr. President, let us go for a few minutes to the question of the manner of the expenditure of this money, because I am compelled to hasten through. Mr. Frank P. Bohn testified, record page 880:

I employed about 15 men to work primary day, and paid them $5 a piece, 2 of them $10. They worked before the primaries.

He said the men selected had worked for him in politics before. He testified further:

I did not know who they were supporting before I hired them. My purpose was to get them to support Mr. Newberry.

In other words, he employed the men and paid them a consideration to work upon primary day, in order to get them to support Mr. Newberry. That was certainly in direct violation of the statute.

I am aware that it has been contended here, it seems to me without very great success, that this statute did not cover the employment or hiring of men to work upon primary day or prior thereto, that it only covered the actual purchasing of a vote; but the statute, while I will not take the time to read it, provides against the hiring of men on primary day or prior thereto, in order to inhibit the custom which had prevailed of paying men for their work in elections. Certainly the evidence discloses that the men were hired upon primary day, and the record is full of evidence which discloses beyond all question that a number of men were hired for dollars and cents to work for Mr. Newberry prior to the day of the election.

Mr. Sherwood said that the money came from Detroit by mail on two occasions, the first time either $500, $700, or $1,000. He testified:

I employed men to work at the polls on election day in five precincts of our city. I correct that. He said he employed men to work at the polls on election day; that there were five precincts in the city; he had put men in each of the four precincts, but none in the other. He said, "I paid these men $7 per day."

In four of the precincts of the city he had men employed working at $7 a day, the very thing which the statute was designed to inhibit.

It is in a measure purchasing votes, Mr. President, but it comes under the statute under the term "prohibiting the hiring for work upon election day or prior thereto."

Mr. Glocheski, the Polish worker, testified that his expenses were about $400 and his salary amounted to $600. He received two or three checks from Detroit signed by Mr. Blair.

Mr. Connelly testified that he received altogether, expenses and salary, $1,200.

Mr. Prescott testified:

I received a total of approximately $1,300 from the Newberry committee while engaged upon the Newberry work.

You will observe that all these witnesses testify, as they run along in their testimony, that it was Mr. Newberry's committee, and nobody understood anything else.

Mr. McLean said he was to receive, and did receive, $200 a month as salary, and, in addition to that, all his expenses.

Mr. Clago testified that he worked through the factory organization in Detroit; that he received a salary of $300 a month, and that he received his pay from the Newberry senatorial committee.

These are simply cited for the purpose of illustration. They do not cover by any means the number which might be cited and which are cited in the brief. In other words, they began hiring men for so much per day to work for Mr. Newberry some two or three months prior to the primary, and they continued the hiring until the very day of the primary, when they put men at the primary polls, paying them so much per day as compensation. This statute, as I read it, was designed to inhibit just that kind of practice.

But, Mr. President, let us pass by the statute for a minute and go to the general proposition as to whether we are willing to place no limit upon the amount of money which a candidate or his committee may expend in the way of compensating men for going about over the State and working for their election. The Senate will say here by its vote, if it seats Mr. Newberry, that $200,000 or $250,000 is not too much. If $200,000 or $250,000 is not too much, what amount is too much? What amount would receive our condemnation? I heard Senator Frye say once that he denounced in unmeasured terms the expenditure of $15,000 by a Senator to secure his election to a seat in this body.

When the matter of Mr. Stephenson was heard, the veteran Senator from Maine, Mr. Frye, said, in contemplation of the constant growth of the use of money in politics, that while he had always been an optimist as to the future of the Republic, yet for the first time in his life he began to despair of the salvation of the Government. We started with $15,000; we contested an instance in which a party was charged with spending $107,000; and now we have $200,000 or $250,000. Do not forget that the great mass of the American people will ask, "What is the limit that you men sitting there representing the purity of election and of the American ballot box are going to establish?" We may excuse such things here, we may employ sophistry, but out yonder in the open with the plain people, out there where this Government must find its final security, they will not listen to such miserable sophistry.

I had intended to call attention to some of the methods of payment. Possibly I can do so. May I ask the Chair how much time I have left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 15 minutes left.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to retain a few moments at my disposal when I close. I shall not discuss the question of the press at this time, but I wish to call attention to another matter.

I said a moment ago that there was a general law, a common law, outside of any statute law which, I think, is to be invoked in this kind of a controversy. England once had to contend with just this kind of a situation. The corruption of elections in England became so pronounced that it had to be dealt with in a most drastic fashion. She has succeeded, so we are informed, in purifying her elections. How did she do it? She did it by establishing in her law that the corruption of an election avoided the election, regardless of whether the party claiming the seat had participated in the corruption or not. Judge Willes said in a celebrated decision in the Litchfield case:

Bribery at common law equally, as by act of Parliament, avoided any election at which it occurred. If there were general bribery, no matter from what fund or by what person, and although the sitting member and his agents had nothing to do with it, it would defeat an election on the ground that it was not a proceeding pure and free as an election ought to be, but that it was corrupted and vitiated by an influence, which coming from no matter what quarter had defeated it and shown it to be abortive.

Again he said in a later decision:

It is the common law with respect to the election of members of Parliament that no matter how well the member may have conducted himself in the election, no matter how clear his character may be from any imputation of corrupt practices in the matter, yet if an authorized agent of his, a person who has been set in motion by him to conduct the election or canvass voters on his behalf is, in the course of his agency, guilty of corrupt practices, an election obtained under such circumstances can not be maintained. As it has been expressed from early time, no person can win and wear a prize upon whose behalf the contest has not been legitimately and fairly carried on.

That is the true rule. That is the only rule which will save the American ballot box from the contaminating influence of the corruptionist.

Mr. President, this is the third time since I have been a Member of the Senate in which it has been charged and, to my mind, proven that seats in this body have been secured through corruption. It is the belief in many quarters that these three instances by no means tell the whole story. The fact is it is being made more and more difficult to secure a seat here in any other way. Issues are put aside, great questions are pushed into the background—issues and questions around which the people might be organized and elections won—and money, the power of money, is relied upon to secure political honors. The preconvention campaign for the Presidency last year was, in part, a coarse, vulgar, venal, impudent, shameless, hideous attempt to hand over the nomination without cost to the nominee. The same thing was declared then as now, to wit, that devoted friends, enthusiastic supporters, volunteer committees, and public-spirited citizens were financing and managing the deal—that the candidate stood out clean and untainted, not only untainted, but helpless to stay the debauch, yet willing and anxious to be its beneficiary. These are the things which are taking place in a Nation less than a century and a half old—still young in years as we measure the life of nations. But though young in years, we are old, prematurely old, and well-stricken in those political practices and vices which eat out the heart of republics. We are already ancient, if age is to be measured by the extent to which the leprous disease of venality has fastened itself upon the body politic through the cursed customs and evil practices which seem to luxuriate in the soil of free peoples. There was a Rome once so sordid, so base, and so corrupt that she has been designated in history as "Venal Rome." We point to her as a revolting example of political degeneracy, and to that attribute her fall. But I venture to say that we have traveled further over the road of money in politics in 100 years than Rome traveled in 500 years. And with this shameless debauch before us, with the precedent established for which Senators here contend, who can feel other than discouraged with the outlook? There is, it seems, only one hope and that is to take our appeal from this tribunal to the open forum where we must look for the final judgment on all such matters, and which judgment, I shall not doubt, will be both righteous and drastic.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have 11 minutes left of the hour upon which I started yesterday. The Washington Post of this morning in an article upon the Newberry case said:

> Barring the accident of unexpected absenteeism, the margin of votes in his [Newberry's] support is adequate.

I wonder how the Washington Post learned that Mr. Newberry is to be seated? I have asked the question before and I now ask it again. Is it a part of the administration program to seat him? Is that why the social lobby has been so active? Is that why Senators can not attend a reception unless wealthy women of the East besiege them and ask them to support Mr. Newberry? Is that why, when the report was made by the committee, a poll was had of Members on the other side before the report had been read or the testimony read by sworn Senators who are to pass judgment upon this case? How is it that this Washington Post man can say that a majority of votes will be marshaled for Mr. Newberry?

In that same article in the Post, it is said that no argument has been made here that large sums of money were expended for Mr. Newberry in Michigan. That is not true. The record in this case teems with statements that money galore was expended in Michigan for Mr. Newberry. Mr. Newberry's own brother, his partner in business, testified that he had put up thousands and thousands of dollars that were expended in Michigan. Mr. Newberry's brothers-in-law, two of them, spent thousands and thousands of dollars in Michigan. Yet the Washington Post would have the country believe that no argument has been made here that vast sums of money have been expended in Mr. Newberry's behalf in Michigan.

Mr. President, if it is the program of the other side or of the administration to seat Mr. Newberry we would like to know it. I wonder if $200,000 and more is to be accepted as the amount proper to expend to secure a seat in this body? Oh, Mr. President, I would that every Senator here could have heard the speech of the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. It had the right ring about it. It was a masterful appeal in favor of clean and honest politics in the selection of United States Senators. It was pure, old time, 100 per cent Americanism. There was not any influence from Wall Street that could be used to prevent that speech nor was there any influence from the White House that could influence the man who made that speech to vote for Mr. Newberry. That speech is in keeping with the highest and best interests of the American Republic. I do not see how any Senator here can read that speech and then vote to seat Mr. Newberry.

Mr. President, during the whole trial of the Newberry case we have not had an average of 12 Republican Senators present in the Chamber. It is a shame, a burning shame.

The Republican Party has 24 majority in this body, and Senators are sworn to pass upon this case, not for themselves personally but for the American people, whose Senate this is and whose Government this is. Yet they are out and about, but not here. They will not stay here and hear the testimony read and the arguments made. The Washington Post says that some of us repeat points we have made before. That is the only way we will ever get some of these Senators to hear them. They will not read the testimony; they will not stay here and listen to it when it is read in the Chamber, and so we have to reiterate these things in order to reach some of them at all. I do not expect to reach all of them.

I understand some of them have already said to-day, "Why, of course I am going to vote to seat him." Are you, Senators? The Senator from Idaho told you how expenditures in senatorial contests had progressed from $15,000 years ago, condemned by Senator Frye, of Maine, then to $110,000 later, and now you come and tell us that the majority on your side of the Chamber are going to the country with a vote approving an expenditure of $200,000 and more in one senatorial primary. As I said here once before, that amount of money will pay the salary for one year of 26 United States Senators. I will not believe that a majority of Senators will vote to seat Mr. Newberry until I see it.

I have reminded Senators before, and I remind them again, that the men who voted to seat Lorimer are all gone but six, and when the roll is finally called and your name goes down in that column as voting to make barter of ballots in the Commonwealths of this Union, to approve the sale of seats in this body, there are going to be more that will go as the supporters of Lorimer went—and God speed the day!

No man has a right to sit here who will vote to seat a man who acknowledges they have expended $200,000 and more in his behalf. Can he say that because he did not know about the details that should excuse him? Suppose I were to set a big steel trap across a much-used pathway and I were to go a thousand miles away and a little boy were to come along that way and that trap snapped and cut his foot off at the ankle, would they convict me for doing it? Certainly they would. The same principle applies here. They would hold me responsible and convict me although I might be a thousand miles away, because I knew that it would do just such a thing when I put the trap in order. What did Mr. Newberry do, according to the speech of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]? He set the trap; he put Templeton in charge of the machinery; he passed on Blair; he selected King; he fixed the trap, and it caught the voters of Michigan, costing him $2 a head to do it. He got the nomination; he got the game; he got it wrongfully, immorally, corruptly, unlawfully. Are Senators going to vote to seat him? God help them to vote to the contrary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] as a substitute for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	Moses	Shields
Ball	Glass	Myers	Shortridge
Brandegee	Hale	Nelson	Simmons
Broussard	Harreld	New	Smith
Bursum	Harris	Nicholson	Smoot
Capper	Harrison	Norbeck	Spencer
Caraway	Heflin	Norris	Sterling
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Oddie	Sutherland
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Swanson
Curtis	Keyes	Owen	Townsend
Dial	King	Page	Trammell
Dillingham	Ladd	Pepper	Wadsworth
du Pont	La Follette	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Lodge	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	McKellar	Pomerene	Warren
Ernst	McKinley	Ransdell	Weller
Fernald	McLean	Robinson	Willis
Fletcher	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before proceeding to the consideration of some of the more serious features of the matter now pending, I desire briefly to advert to that aspect of it with which the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] opened his defense of his colleague, namely, the high patriotism of the latter. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Newberry], we are told, served in the Spanish-American War; he tendered to the Government his services on the breaking out of the World War, in which he had a creditable part; his two sons braved its perils; and vicariously, through his son-in-law, who was decorated for distinguished services by one or more Governments, the junior Senator from Michigan further earned the gratitude of his country.

Mr. President, so far as I know, none of those of us who feel impelled to assert that the junior Senator from Michigan is not entitled to his seat in this body has any disposition whatever to question his patriotism. We all believe that he is no less and no more patriotic than the millions of Americans who, when the life of the Nation was threatened, eagerly sought and gladly embraced any opportunity that presented itself to aid in preserving it. Many of those who came forward in that time of crisis, unlike the junior Senator from Michigan, surrendered lucrative positions or quit their business at large financial loss, while still others left behind them needy families.

I have no doubt that the junior Senator from Michigan is entitled to credit for other virtues than patriotism. I make no doubt at all that he is a good father and a good husband. I doubt not that he is moved by tales of want and distress as are most men, and that he is a generous giver to deserving charities. All these things, however, have nothing at all to do with the question as to whether or not he bought his seat in this body or whether others bought it for him.

However, Mr. President, seeing that such prominence is given to the high character of the services rendered by Lieut. Commander Newberry in the Navy during the World War, it may not be altogether inappropriate, inasmuch as all this is outside of the record, to say, also outside of the record, that the only scandal that occurred in connection with the Navy during the World War arose in the office of which the junior Senator from Michigan was the head. I do not desire to have it understood that that scandal touched Lieut. Commander Newberry even by the remotest suspicion; nobody suggests anything of the kind; but the fact remains that a report is on file in the Navy Department in which he is mildly censured for not having exercised a keener supervision over his subordinates who were guilty.

It is likewise not at all without significance that some at least of the rich men's sons who corruptly obtained promotions or were assigned to desirable details were introduced at the personnel office by Mr. Fred D. Cody, whose pernicious activities in the Newberry senatorial campaign have been the subject of some comment in this debate.

But, Mr. President, let us take up something serious. Various lines of argument have been advanced not on the floor, where they can be met, but circulated around the corridors and in the cloakrooms and other places where Senators meet, the purpose being to accord to those who would like to vote for the junior Senator from Michigan upon personal or other grounds some basis upon which they may found their action. So it is said that it is a matter of no consequence, that all of the illegal acts charged to have taken place in the Michigan senatorial contest transpired in the campaign for the nomination and at the primaries and before the primaries; that the election itself was entirely free from any suspicion of illegality, and the argument is made that whatever irregularities, whatever violations of law occurred at the primaries, whatever corruption may have occurred in the primaries, it is a matter of no consequence whatever. I combat that view.

In the course of some remarks which I made earlier in the debate, I was interrogated by one of the Senators as to whether the matters that were then being discussed and canvassed and criticized with some degree of severity were not all in connection with the primary, rather than with the ultimate election; and it was then stated that there was a radical and material difference in the importance of the two matters.

Sometimes people confound a proceeding to expel a Member with a proceeding to inquire into the question as to whether he ever was elected a Member of this body; and it has often been suggested, in connection with election contests in this and the other body, that the matters adduced were pertinent upon a motion or resolution to expel, which of course requires a two-thirds vote in order to carry, and that they were not relevant to the question as to whether or not the Member claiming the seat was legally elected, a resolution touching which need have no more than a majority vote in order to prevail. It has been universally held that when the Member has actually taken his seat, and the question arises not upon the legality of his election but upon something else, the proper motion is to expel him, and then the two-thirds vote is necessary; but that whenever the question is directed to the election, and the inquiry is as to whether or not he ever was legally elected, a majority is all that is required.

The matter to which I have adverted—the question of the importance of irregularities and corruption in connection with the primary—was the subject of very earnest debate in this body in connection with the Stephenson case.

The view was urged there that all the irregularities in the Stephenson case having taken place in connection with the primary, they could not be availed of to question the title of the seat of Mr. Stephenson. At that time the legislature still elected Senators, but a law was passed by the legislature of the State of Wisconsin providing for the holding of a primary for nominating candidates for United States Senator, whose nomination, of course, would be presumed to be influential with the members of the legislature when they came to select the Senator. It was in connection with that primary that the charges were made against Senator Stephenson.

It was contended on the one hand that acts of that character were entirely irrelevant, and on the other hand that they were all important in connection with the question as to whether Senator Stephenson had or had not been elected. The affirmative of that proposition was asserted upon the floor of the Senate by Senator Heyburn, of Idaho, and in a way by Senator Root, of the State of New York, although the Senator last mentioned subsequently modified in a very material way his views upon the subject. It was controverted, however, by the following Senators in speeches upon this floor: Bristow, Borah, Kenyon, O'Gorman, Cummins, Lea, Sutherland, and Poindexter. I state the proposition as it is set forth in the reports of the majority and the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the consideration of that case.

This is from the majority report, made by Senator Heyburn:

It seems from this consideration of the question we must conclude that the direct primary proceedings can not be held to affect the validity of an election by the legislature.

That was his contention. The minority answered that as follows:

The power to inquire into the practices and methods employed in the primary election is questioned. The majority in this case find that we have this power, and with that conclusion we agree. In this we are fully sustained by principle and precedent.

It appears by the record that several candidates for the legislature announced during their candidacy that, if elected, they would vote for the candidate for Senator receiving the highest vote at the primary. If the primary choice was secured by corrupt methods and practices would not the vote in the legislature secured thereby be corrupt, however innocent the member casting it? Several members of the legislature announced when they voted for Stephenson that they did so solely because he was the primary choice. If the primary was carried by corrupt methods and practices these votes were corrupt, though honestly cast, and if the Senate can not inquire into such corrupt methods and practices, then the power given to us to judge of elections of our Members is a mere shadow. That we have this power is in accord not only with reason and justice, but is sustained by precedent.

There was a separate minority report in that case, concurred in by two of the Senators who joined in the majority report, Senators POMERENE and Sutherland, who did not subscribe to the proposition set forth in the majority report to which I have adverted. They said:

It will be conceded that while the result of a primary election under the present constitutional provisions could not control the State senators and representatives in their choice of a United States Senator, would not an expression of the will of the people at a primary election have great weight with their representatives in casting their votes? And if this be so, ought not the primary election held to declare this choice be carefully guarded by suitable penalties? We have no hesitancy in saying that if the evidence disclosed the use of corrupt methods at the primaries it would affect the result of the election by the general assembly, and the Senate would be justified in taking cognizance of that fact and unseating any Senator who was thus delinquent.

Out of the many able speeches upon that subject in the Senate at that time I select two, not only because of their clearness and succinctness, but because the Senators delivering them are still Members of this body. I read first from the speech of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], expressed with his usual felicity and clarity.

He said:

Repeating, with slight paraphrase, the most serious and the most impressive utterance I ever heard in debate, I fear that the Senate is about to commit a grave mistake. I fear that the Senate is about to inflict all the injury that it can inflict upon the modern policy of nominating candidates for the Senate of the United States at a primary or popular election.

Some Senators here who have joined in the majority report openly and frankly avow that purpose. Other Senators, it seems to me, will lend the weight of their influence to the same result unintentionally and unconsciously. If the Senate declares that a candidate for the Senate of the United States can corrupt the primary election in which he is seeking a nomination and still hold a good title to his seat, then primary elections for the nominations of candidates for the Senate will become dangerous instrumentalities instead of an honest expression of the public will. This is one of the issues we must now determine.

* * * * * * *

The senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. Heyburn], who is in charge of this measure or this resolution, believes—and I have no doubt he believes honestly—that a primary election for the selection of a candidate for the Senate of the United States is not only unconstitutional but is vicious. He intends to draw as many Senators after him as he can in order to disparage and discredit throughout the United States the policy of allowing the voters of a political party to select their candidates for the Senate of the United States, and he intends to do it by having the Senate declare, if he can, that no matter how completely and comprehensively the primary election may be corrupted, nevertheless the title conferred upon the man who is elected by the legislature of the State is without a stain.

I think it is due to the country that those Senators who may inferentially stand with the senior Senator from Idaho upon this most extraordinary proposition shall be heard before we close this debate, for I am curious to know how many men there are in this country who espouse a doctrine so full of menace, so destructive to peace and good order.

* * * * * * *

If that be true, Senators, what will you say to a proposition which in effect declares that the primaries at which the selection is made can be corrupted and yet the legislature following the direction of the primary can give a valid title to a seat in this body? To me the proposition is so abhorrent not only to good morals, as we have known good morals for years and years, but so abhorrent to the tendency toward a closer tie between the voters and Senators of the United States that I confess it is hard to be complacent when it is known that a vote is about to be had from which the people of this country can infer, at least, that the Senate looks upon the corruption of the primary as a remote and not a proximate cause of the election by the legislature—a Senate that looks upon the corruption of the primary as so far removed from its membership and the laws under which the election of its Members takes place as to be beyond the examination and the consideration of the Senate in determining whether the seat has been honestly or dishonestly won.

Now I read briefly from the speech of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], as follows:

It is contended in this case by those who are defending the Senator from Wisconsin on the claim that his election was a valid election—some of them, at least—that all of the evidence relating to the primary is immaterial. They refuse to consider that. I understand that is the position of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Heyburn]. That was practically the sole basis upon which the counsel for the Senator from Wisconsin based his case in the proceedings before the committee—a most elaborate, I think, and artificial and sophistical argument, on the proposition that no attention could be paid to proceedings in a primary election, even though the evidence should show it was corrupt. The Senator from Idaho bases his contention upon the proposition that it had no legal effect upon the legislature, that it was not binding upon the legislature, and consequently had no appreciable or legal effect upon the election of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The importance of the primary election is not in its legal binding effect upon the action of the legislature, but in its persuasive force. In the same way, if money had been used directly with members of the legislature and not legally binding upon them to vote for the man who gave it to them, it would be a persuasive and a corrupting force. So with the primary election. The result was the Senator from Wisconsin became the nominee of his party and was entitled by the party rule, entitled by the statutes of the State, in the regular proceedings to have the votes of the members of his party in the legislature, and it had a persuasive and powerful influence upon the members of the legislature. Can it be logically said that an influence of that kind, an influence which was controlling, although not legally binding, brought about by fraud, brought about by corruption, would not vitiate the election?

So, Mr. President, it may be equally asked here, can it be contended that a nomination for United States Senator brought about by corrupt means at the primary does not enter into and vitiate the general election which followed, particularly in those States where, as in the State of Michigan, a nomination has always signified an election? In many of the States, particularly in the South, the whole contest is in the primary, there being none whatever in the election, it being established almost without question that whoever secures the primary nomination will be elected at the general election following.

In the Stephenson case reference was made to two cases that are entirely pertinent here.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in some States—I think it is true in our State—in registering for the primary vote the elector obligates himself to vote for the candidate nominated in that primary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is not uncommon in these statutes.

Reference was had in the discussion of the Stephenson case to what is known as the Payne case—the election of Mr. Payne as a Member from the State of Ohio. There, according to the custom that was prevalent at that time, the members of the legislature of the party of Mr. Payne held a caucus, and the bribery took place in the caucus. The members of the caucus were bribed to vote for Mr. Payne in the caucus. It was contended that notwithstanding the caucus the members of the legislature could do exactly as they pleased about it; they were not obliged to vote in accordance with the determination of the caucus; but it was argued by able Senators here, and not controverted, as I understand, by anybody, that the influence thus secured undoubtedly was operative and probably controlling in the selection of Mr. Payne by the legislature, and therefore that it affected it.

So, likewise, reference was made to what is known as the Caldwell case, from the State of Kansas. Caldwell bought off his opponent, and without the knowledge of the purchase the supporters of the candidate who was thus bought off went to the support of Mr. Caldwell in the legislature. That was held to be a corruption of the legislature itself. So that I do not believe we can get away from the proposition that corruption and violation of the law for the purpose of securing the nomination is just as important, so far as the right of the Member to a seat in this body is concerned, as if the illegal acts occurred in connection with the last election.

When I addressed the Senate before upon the subject I was endeavoring to establish the proposition, which has not, as I understand, been controverted, that all the contracts and agreements by which persons were hired by the wholesale to go out and work for Newberry were contrary to public policy and void.

I want to show, Mr. President, that not only is that the rule with respect to the final election, but it is the rule with respect to primaries. It is just as heinous, before the law, to hire men to work at the primaries as it is to hire them to work at the final election. I speak of it now not with respect to the statute of the State of Michigan or any other State; I speak of what the common law was before any statute was enacted; and lest anybody should think this is a technical matter, I desire to show that the common law merely expresses the general and common conviction of the people that the practice is against public policy, and has a tendency to introduce all manner of evil into the body politic.

I referred at that time to the case of The Exchange National Bank against Henderson, reported in Fifty-first L. R. A., at page 550, and I read, and I now propose to read again, a note telling what was decided in the case of Whitman against Ewin, a Tennessee case reported in the Thirty-ninth Southwestern Reporter. In that case the court said, speaking of the employment of a man to work for the election of another:

The greater his influence the more powerful his eloquence, the more persuasive and effective his arts and skill, the more important it is that such powers and capabilities should be preserved and protected, unbought and unpurchasable, for the benefit of the State and the public weal, and only allowed to be brought into pernicious activity from purely patriotic and unselfish motives. * * * All such contracts as the one alleged are corrupt, contrary to public policy, illegal, void, and unenforcible in the courts.

The Michigan statute, making these things a crime, simply makes criminal and penal, punishes by a penalty, the things which the common law always denounced as contrary to public policy, even if it did not make them crimes.

I want to refer to the case of Livingstone against Page, reported in Ninety-third American State Reports, a decision of the highest court of the State of Pennsylvania. It doubtless will be of interest to the distinguished gentleman who took his place in the Senate this morning from that State. That was a case in which a publisher of a Democratic newspaper agreed for hire to throw the influence of his paper to a Republican candidate. The court considers that question, and then quotes as follows from the case of Nichols against Mudgett:

The plaintiff in that case was a candidate for the office of town representative and a creditor of the defendant. The defendant's party affiliations were such as would naturally lead him to vote for the opposing candidate. Conversations were had which resulted in a mutual understanding that the defendant should use his influence in favor of the plaintiff's election, and that, if the plaintiff was successful, the defendant's indebtedness should be treated as paid. Induced by this agreement, the defendant supported the plaintiff's candidacy until his election was declared.

Now note, Mr. President:

There was no agreement that defendant should vote for the plaintiff unless it was implied in the above understanding. He voted for the plaintiff, however, and did so because of the understanding. The suit was for the recovery of the indebtedness referred to, and the defendant claimed that it had been satisfied. The court considered that there was a sale of the defendant's influence and vote, held the agreement void, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The court continues:

The agreement in that case involved both the defendant's vote and his influence upon the votes of others, but the court's discussion of the subject does not leave much doubt as to what its conclusion would have been if the undertaking had been confined to the latter service. Certainly no distinction could properly be made between the two. But that contract had reference to the votes to be cast at an election; and the plaintiff contends that, inasmuch as caucuses and conventions are not creations of the law, contracts for services in influencing the choice of delegates and the action of a convention can not be considered against public policy.

They canvassed that, and the conclusion was expressed in the following language, after citing the New York case:

We can not doubt the correctness of this conclusion. The rule would largely fail of its purpose if not so applied. When the voters are unevenly divided into two parties the nomination of the stronger organization is usually equivalent to an election. And when party action is less decisive the subsequent efforts of the voters are ordinarily confined to a selection from the candidates regularly presented. The individual voter of a large electorate can seldom give an effective expression to a choice that is not in line with the action of some party convention. To secure a free and exact expression of the sovereign will there must be a proper selection of candidates as well as an honest election. If the choice of delegates and the action of the nominating convention are improperly determined, the election ballots will fail to express the real judgment of the voters.

Mr. President, I inquire now whether the election in the State of Michigan, in view of the enormous expenditure that was made in order to get the name of Mr. Truman Newberry on the ballots at the final election as the candidate of the Republican Party, does express the real choice of the people of the State of Michigan?

There is another line of argument which has been pursued here. Many Senators are going to vote for Mr. Newberry because of Mr. Ford. Many Senators are not in their seats; there are on the Republican side not half a dozen Senators, but I propose to put in the RECORD evidence showing that large sums of money were expended before Mr. Ford's candidacy was heard of, so that when those Senators go before their home people for a justification of their acts here they will not be entitled to say to them that they did this in order that Mr. Ford might not have a seat in this body.

I call attention to the fact that Mr. Newberry began his consideration, at least, of becoming a candidate months before Mr. Ford's name even was mentioned in connection with this place. It appears from the evidence that on October 3, 1917, a meeting was held at Port Huron, Mich., attended by Fred D. Cody, who came out there all the way from New York for the purpose of considering the question of Mr. Newberry's candidacy. The results of that meeting were immediately communicated to him.

Later, on the 17th day of November, a Mr. Andrews, who attended that meeting, wrote a letter to Commander Newberry in New York. Bear in mind, Mr. President, that this was in 1917. I shall show you that as early as the month of August, 1917, less than 60 days after he undertook the duties of a lieutenant commander in the United States Navy, he had this matter under consideration.

On the 17th day of November, 1917, bear in mind, Andrews wrote a letter to Newberry in New York concerning the matter of his candidacy, and Mr. Newberry replied to that letter upon November 22, 1917. Bear that in mind. In the month of January following Newberry actually became a candidate.

While Paul King started in upon the management of this campaign about the 6th of March, 1918, it was not until at least a month afterwards, although voluminous correspondence had passed between him and Commander Newberry, that Ford's name was ever mentioned between them. In a letter found on page 703 of the bill of exceptions is the first indication we find of Ford's candidacy being mentioned.

After the talk he had had down in New York, Paul King opened up on the 6th of March. On the 11th of February he wrote Newberry as follows, after telling about the other Republican candidates who might possibly enter the race:

Confidential information also this morning indicates that the people behind the Ford candidacy are the Booths, and that they are planning to circulate his petitions and try to force him to run anyway. This does not scare me very much either.

Then he added:

Mr. Warner is scared by the Ford bogie, and is postponing his announcement for a month. I would not be surprised if it ultimately works out so that he will not enter at all.

I propose to show, Mr. President, that they had not the slightest concern about the Ford candidacy. They treated it as a thing which was not to be regarded even seriously, clear down to the time when he finally made his announcement.

Mr. Newberry replied to that letter on April 13, two days afterwards, as follows:

There is no doubt but that Mr. O'Brien's advanced age would not help him any in the campaign. The other men you mentioned have been talked over many times. The fact that the Booths are behind Mr. Ford seems reasonable to me, but that does not explain their campaign against millionaires.

At page 706 appears this in a letter from Mr. King dated April 17:

Nothing more has been heard from Mr. Couzens and there is some talk about the Ford candidacy.

At the time the other letter was written—that is, April 11—they had already had contributions from John S. Newberry amounting to $8,000, which had actually been spent, apparently, because the contributions were made in sums of about a thousand dollars before Ford's name was even mentioned between them. Under date of April 17, 1918, Mr. King said:

Nothing more has been heard from Mr. Couzens and there is some talk about the Ford candidacy.

On May 2 they had forgotten about it. Two weeks had gone by, and Ford's candidacy was not made the subject of a letter that passed between them meanwhile, but on May 2 Commander Newberry wrote from New York as follows:

There was some interest shown by Senator PENROSE who was in town last night and talked with Currie, and by Senator CALDER, who was in to see me the other day, about the republicanism of Henry Ford. This matter will be brought to the attention of Mr. Hays, chairman of the national committee, which I think is very necessary and desirable, because the control of the Senate may in another year or two hinge on the republicanism of the next Senator from Michigan, and, therefore, our party is vitally interested in seeing that no man from our State is elected on a false pretense, and the very fact that the Democrats are prepared to indorse anyone in Michigan for this responsible position should cause everyone interested to "sit up and take notice."

That is all the attention he paid to that matter. It was not treated by them as serious at all, as will appear from the record at page 715, where there appears a letter from Senator Newberry to Paul King under date of May 6. Paul King was not concerned about it at all, as he said in his letter, but Senator Newberry wrote from New York as follows:

I have no doubt that people here—

That is, people in New York—

with interests in Michigan are already beginning to fear the advent of Henry Ford, and until this positive danger is eliminated I do not feel that we will have any straight and easy sailing. I do feel very strongly, as I think I told you before, that this menace of Henry Ford's false Republicanism is something that should be handled entirely by the national committee or the campaign committee of the Senate, and I don't want to have anybody associated with me in this matter begin any attack on Henry Ford of any kind.

By that time, May 6, 1918, the Paul King committee had already expended $20,000 in fixing up their affairs around the State for the purpose of excluding such Republican candidates as ex-Gov. Osborn, ex-Gov. Warner, Mr. Warren, and William Alden Smith. The fight had been going on against them for two months and $20,000 had been expended before Mr. Ford was regarded as even a possibility or probability in the campaign.

At page 739 of the record the same view is expressed. Paul King writes:

You have doubtless seen the press clippings relative to Mr. Ford and Mr. Warner. According to them, Mr. Ford is not saying a thing, but his political friends, who, by the way, are entirely unknown, are circulating petitions, and Mr. Warner will make an announcement of his candidacy about the first of the month. Let them come. I think we shall be able to give a good account of ourselves, no matter how many enter. Warner's candidacy will probably help us as much as it will hurt, and maybe more. Mr. Ford can, I think, be effectively dealt with.

He is not very much alarmed about it, is he? At page 775 Paul wires to Newberry, under date of June 11:

Democratic conference at Lansing Tuesday evening reported to have adopted resolution calling for Henry Ford as compromise candidate of all parties as supporter of administration and calling on Republican candidates to withdraw. Some nerve. Interesting but not alarming.

PAUL.

At page 780, on June 14, 1918, we find the following:

JUNE 14, 1918.

HON. TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
New York City:

Washington dispatches announce Henry Ford's candidacy with President's indorsement, as you undoubtedly know. Suggest we simply go ahead with our campaign just as we have been doing. Am not at all alarmed. Do not think it necessary or advisable for us to make any statement at this time. Am driving through Oceana and Newaygo Counties to-day. If you wish to wire me, send telegram to Grand Rapids, care Charles A. Floyd. He will get message to me. Will phone you from Grand Rapids Saturday morning.

PAUL H. KING.

At that time they had already expended $28,500 in the campaign. I think that is all that need be said about Ford.

Mr. President, I pass now to another matter. Mr. Newberry admits that at least $195,000 was spent in his behalf in order to secure for him the nomination. It is contended upon the part of those who take the opposite view that he ought not to be seated here, that the record shows that at least $250,000 was expended in his behalf; but it is not to be understood that it is contended that that is all that was spent. We merely say that that is all the record shows. Let me show you a few things that are not in the record.

I called attention yesterday to the fact that Paul King had an account in the bank that included something like five thousand-odd dollars that we insist is not included in the $156,000. I shall not go into the other items at this time, because my time will not permit, but I wish to call attention to a few items of testimony here that disclosed that $250,000 is a mere suggestion as to the amount of money that was paid out in the State of Michigan to accomplish the nomination of Mr. Newberry.

Two distinguished politicians of the city of Detroit were Milton Oakman and a Mr. Marx. They went to New York on the 14th of January, as will appear from the record at page 74. They went there at the request of Mr. Newberry. He wanted to get these two men. He got Milton Oakman, but he could not get the other man, Mr. Oscar B. Marx. I read from the cross-examination of Mr. Marx at page 74 of the bill of exceptions:

I have known Mr. Frederick Cody a great many years. His home was in Detroit.

He is telling about a conversation he had in New York when he and Oakman were there.

His mother and his brother, whom I know very well, live in Detroit. I have seen Mr. Cody in Detroit very often throughout the past 10 years and I have seen him in New York every time I have been there throughout the past five years. On this occasion in January, 1918, when Mr. Newberry said he might be a candidate, and he and Mr. Cody came up to my room at the Biltmore, Mr. Cody spoke to me personally, aside from Mr. Newberry, and I imagine it would be out of his hearing. We went to the window. In that conversation he said it would help matters, or relieve Mr. Newberry's mind, in the event that he did run, to know that he had the support of the Marx organization. I said it could not be done.

But he got Oakman, as I have indicated to you.

Gov. Osborn tells us that Oakman admitted to him having received $25,000, as appears from the record at page 224.

Will the Chair kindly advise me how much time I have left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time will expire at 2 o'clock and 16 minutes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well, I shall have to hurry on. I read from the testimony of Gov. Osborn:

I have known the defendant, Milton Oakman, 10 or 15 years; a goodly while.

I skip a little now and read further. He is talking about a conversation he had with Oakman. This is Gov. Osborn, of the State of Michigan, it will be understood, who said:

As an old friend and acquaintance, we had a talk. I said to him, "Milt, I understand why you are not supporting me"—he had been supporting me—"but I have no feeling in the matter whatsoever. It seems to be to your interest. I was up there in Lansing, and they told me you were to receive $25,000, and at that time had $12,500, etc. He said that it was made very clear to him that his interest was to be with Mr. Newberry, and he had to look out for himself; that I knew the character of the fight, and what it took to put it up in Wayne County, and it was to his interest. I said, "I don't blame you." But he said, "John Smith will be for you." I said, "That is very wonderful, if this doesn't take the entire organization." He said, "John Smith is loyal to you"; parenthetically he claimed to have been all through, and very pleasantly so. I don't think I asked him directly whether he had received the other half of the $25,000. I simply said, "I know you are to receive $25,000 or more," and I think I said, "Make it cost them what you are worth," something of that sort.

He made practically the same admission to a Mr. Montgomery, as will appear from the record at page 445, where Montgomery said:

Later I had another talk with Mr. Oakman in which he informed me that he did not intend to support Mr. Osborn, but intended to support Mr. Newberry. He said that he was very sorry that he could not be with Gov. Osborn, that he was going with Mr. Newberry. I do not remember just exactly the words, but it was to the effect that he could not afford to be with Gov. Osborn; he would have to be with Newberry because of the money there was in it. I had a subsequent conversation with him on that same subject, probably two or three weeks afterwards, in his office in the county clerk's office. He said that he was going to be with Newberry on account of his brother Bob. Bob told him that he would have to be with him; that Newberry was the only one that had been a real friend of his in their real estate crisis there in Detroit. Bob asked him to be with Newberry, and he would do anything for his brother Bob. He said, "Johnny Smith will be with Osborn; nobody could get him away from Chase." I had one conversation with him in which he asked me if I was getting paid well for being with Mr. Osborn. I told him I was not getting anything. He said I was foolish if I did not. He said that he was getting his; that he had got through; said something about he had come to a time in life when he had to look out for himself; something like that. He said, in substance, "I am getting well paid for what I do, and you are a blank fool if you are not getting paid well for what you do." He said something one night about $20,000. I think his words were something like it was worth $20,000 that he had been promised and was to receive $20,000 for managing the Wayne County campaign for Mr. Newberry.

At page 329 of the record it is disclosed that $50,000 was paid for the support of the county committee of Wayne County. I am obliged to omit some testimony that would connect it up better, but I read as follows. A man by the name of Robards, speaking concerning one Chilson, one of the defendants on trial in Grand Rapids, said:

I said, "This is a very quiet, peaceful, little city; we do not have much news." "Well," he says, "I was down to Detroit the other day, down to the Newberry headquarters, and those boys down there are doing business." I says, "Is that so?" "Yes," he says; "they have tapped the barrel, and the very first thing, right off from the bat, they gave the city committee of Detroit $50,000 for their influence for Newberry." I said, "Fifty thousand dollars?" He says, "Yes; I know it." He says, "They are spending money like drunken sailors." At that time the customers passed by and I went up to the window and I identified him with Mr. Rothelisberger.

Let us find out what Fred Henry got, who is interested in this to a considerable extent. It is told by Jesse H. Prescott at page 480 of the record:

I think I attended three of the Newberry meetings at Mr. Henry's home during the campaign. I talked with Mr. Henry several times during the campaign with reference to his work for Mr. Newberry. At one of our talks which took place at the Electric Cigar Store shortly before primary day he asked me to line up six or eight different men to work for the Newberry campaign at the Buick factory. I told him I would speak to them, and I did. He said I could tell them that he would take care of them financially. I took nobody to Mr. Henry, but I afterwards introduced him to a man of the name of Love in the Electric Cigar Store. I told Mr. Henry I had decided that I would not be a Newberry man. He said I was foolish; there was a chance to get a nice piece of change out of it; that he had just banked $2,000 and more was on the way, or more was coming; I would not say which.

A man by the name of Fletcher, who figured throughout this as one of the field agents in the Newberry campaign, paid certain bills. At page 316 we learn something about the method of the operations of Fletcher. I omit reading it, because I have not the time, but he went into a certain community and put it right squarely up to candidates running for local county offices that if they did not get in line for Newberry every one of them would be snowed under because of the money they were going to put into the campaign.

I now go to the record at page 251, where we get some information about what Fletcher knew about this campaign. A man by the name of Sparks is testifying:

I have lived in Grand Rapids slightly over 15 years. I am associate editor of the Grand Rapids Herald and have been acting in that capacity for about four and one-half years. I have known the defendant, Richard Fletcher, at least 10 years, possibly more. I had a conversation with Mr. Fletcher in his office in Lansing in which the matter of the expenditures by the Newberry senatorial committee in the Newberry senatorial campaign was referred to. The conversation occurred, as near as I can figure, on March 11, 1919. The matter came up incidentally; I was in there with reference to another story, and in the course of the conversation it drifted around to the matter of the recent campaign, and something was said about the matter of expenditures; I do not recollect just what, and I made the statement that I believed that rather than $176,000, that the campaign must have cost nearer a half million, and Mr. Fletcher said, "A half million, h—l! It cost nearer eight hundred thousand, and I know what I am talking about."

The junior Senator from Michigan in the course of his remarks yesterday told how he did not know anything at all about these expenditures. The argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] upon that phase of the matter needs no supplement at all from me. I showed yesterday in the course of the examination that Mr. Newberry had Paul King down in New York at the hotel with him at least half a dozen times, and at the very time the newspapers were filled with charges that enormous sums were being used for corrupting the electorate of the State of Michigan. Paul King was right there and knew all about it. He had all the books at his command and under his control, and all Mr. Newberry had to do in order to learn the facts was to ask Paul King or telegraph out to Mr. Smith, his own representative, who had the books right before him and could tell him every dollar that had been expended. If he did not know, it was because he willfully declined to inquire.

Mr. President, much must be said in the way of generalities to wipe away the damning testimony in this record; but, sirs, if this violation of the fundamental rights of the American people goes unrebuked by the Senate of the United States, the Government of this country may well be regarded as in the direst peril, for I undertake to say that no case will ever again be brought before the Senate with any hope of success unless a precedent shall be set in this case that a man can not go out and secure a seat in this body by the means that have been disclosed by this record.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have two minutes of time remaining, and I wish to read from the testimony of Fred P. Smith, the confidential agent of Mr. Newberry, as follows:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. What did John Newberry say to you?

Mr. SMITH. He came to me, as near as I can remember it, the latter part of February or the first part of March—it was the late winter—and told me that if the committee made any demands for campaign funds, if his brother should be in the senatorial race, to give them the money. I do not remember whether he mentioned Mr. Templeton's name or not. I knew Mr. Templeton quite well. The first call was from him. The checks that were given after that were all given to Mr. Templeton the same as the first one.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You have given us, in substance, all that transpired, have you?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. No other discussion, except to direct you, if they wanted money and came and asked for it, to give it to them?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. No limits as to amounts placed on you?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And no reports made to him as to the amounts you paid?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And no inquiries by him as to what it was used for?

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. President, is it any wonder that John S. Newberry did not make any inquiry as to how much money was to be spent? He was not furnishing the money; he was merely the go-between for his brother, Truman H. Newberry, and when he told Fred P. Smith to furnish all the money needed in the campaign, it was to remove Truman H. Newberry as far as possible from the scene. They were framing up the situation so as to enable Truman Newberry to say he had had nothing to do with financing the campaign. Does anybody believe that John Newberry would turn a senatorial campaign committee loose on his bank account without restrictions of any kind? The fact that he gave no instructions as to the amount that he was willing to give shows that he knew that that money was going to be drawn from Truman Newberry's account.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	McKinley	Shortridge
Ball	Glass	McNary	Simmons
Broussard	Gooding	Moses	Smith
Bursum	Hale	Myers	Smoot
Calder	Harreld	Nelson	Spencer
Cameron	Harris	New	Sterling
Capper	Harrison	Nicholson	Sutherland
Colt	Heflin	Norbeck	Swanson
Culberson	Hitchcock	Norris	Townsend
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Trammell
Dial	Kellogg	Page	Walsh, Mass.
du Pont	Kenyon	Pepper	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	King	Phipps	Watson, Ind.
Elkins	Ladd	Poindexter	Willis
Fernald	La Follette	Pomerene
Fletcher	Lodge	Robinson
France	McCormick	Sheppard

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, when the announcement was made in the press some days ago that the sitting Member, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Newberry], would address the Senate in his own behalf touching the charges that have been pending against him for approximately three years, I with many other Members of this body indulged the hope that in his statement relative to the subject he would be frank and in detail discuss the incidents which it is charged reflected knowledge upon his part of the method by which his campaign was conducted. Yesterday there was presented in this Chamber a scene which will be remembered by those who were present for many years. Thousands of persons were attracted to the Capitol, some from curiosity and others as the friends of Senator Newberry, in the hope that at last the Senate of the United States and the people of the country were to hear his viewpoint touching the charges that, in order to encompass his nomination and election as a Member of this body, there had been expended admittedly more than $188,000, and, as claimed by many, more than a quarter of a million dollars, according to the proof.

The statement made by the junior Senator from Michigan in his own behalf may be epitomized in a few words; it may be summarized as follows: "I had left the State of Michigan in the discharge of my duty as an officer of the United States Navy; I was urged to become a candidate for the Senate; I did not return to the State during the progress of the campaign, and, while I was kept advised as to its general progress, I never knew anything definite respecting the character of the campaign that was being conducted in my behalf and as related to the expenditure of enormous sums of money for me."

Mr. President, the defect in that defense which to a lawyer and a patriot is and must remain unanswerable is that a candidate for Senator can not, in that or any other way, divest himself of the responsibility imposed upon him by the Constitution and laws of this Nation, the laws of his State, and the rules of morality and ethics which govern gentlemen and citizens in their transactions, to see that his campaign is conducted in accordance with law and ethics.

A citizen can not announce his candidacy for the United States Senate and then treat it as of such little importance that he shall give no thought or attention to the manner in which that campaign is conducted. The moral obligation is upon him, when he seeks a seat in this body, to do what he can in fairness, and with all the intelligence he possesses or can acquire, to see that his campaign is conducted decently and with due respect to the laws of the State and Nation. When the proposition is stated in that way, I do not believe that any Senator can or dare controvert it.

When the title by which a man holds or claims membership in this body is assailed the rules of criminal law ought not to be invoked. A Senator can not be heard to say, "Under the Constitution I may not be compelled to give testimony against myself, and thus incriminate myself." The moral obligation is upon him, when his title to a seat is challenged in the way that the title to the seat of the sitting Member from Michigan has been challenged, to meet the issue. Courageous, manly conduct, it would seem, should prompt him to advance to such an issue rather than retreat from it.

Three years and more have come and gone since the primary was held in Michigan. The undisputed evidence discloses that throughout the campaign it was publicly charged in the press of the State that the campaign was a boodle campaign; that enormous sums of money were being expended in order to encompass the nomination of the sitting Member. The evidence shows that a newspaper man, Vandenberg, wrote the sitting Member prior to the primary election that it had become a matter of State-wide scandal that his friends were making an effort to purchase the nomination. That letter and the newspaper articles which from time to time were published relative to the subject put the Senator from Michigan on notice, as they must have put on notice every intelligent man who was interested in the subject, that the character of the campaign was being assailed. The sitting Member has rested under this charge for more than three years as if he recognized no obligation to repel it.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Newberry] replied to Vandenberg's letter. I thought yesterday, when he took his place in this Chamber and said that he intended to tell the Senate all that he knew about these charges, that he would not think of retiring from this presence without explaining the answer which he made to Vandenberg. That answer was a letter written by himself. It related to facts and circumstances which he claimed, when he wrote the letter, were within his knowledge. The Senator from Michigan, in substance, wrote Mr. Vandenberg: "The campaign is being conducted by a committee in accordance with law, and when the campaign is over the accounting requirements of the statutes will be complied with." That statement implied knowledge, definite knowledge, on the part of the writer, the sitting Member, as to the manner in which the finances of his campaign were being conducted.

If a Senator on either side of the Chamber thinks that my interpretation and application of the facts connected with this letter is erroneous, I ask him to rise now and point out the error in the statement. It was charged by a written communication that his friends were disgracing and scandalizing his State by the corrupt expenditure of money to encompass his nomination. He sends back an answer which in substance implies: "I know what is going on. The charges are untrue. The committee is conducting an honest and a fair campaign, and it will make the reports that the law requires it to make."

I say that that was not an honest letter, using the word "honest" in the sense that the law defines it. I point you to the fact that immediately following his reply to Vandenberg Mr. Newberry wrote his executive chairman, King, characterizing it as a noncommittal answer: "How did you like my noncommittal answer?"

If he was acting in good faith, why did he write a letter which he himself characterized to his political manager as a noncommittal answer? The charge was a serious one. It called for frankness and sincerity, and he himself characterized the method in which he replied to it as noncommittal.

That is not all. In the same letter he said: "It is true that it covers the situation in a flimsy manner."

Is there a Senator here who honestly wants to know what Mr. Newberry knew about that case who would not like to have him say what he meant by the reply he made when the charge was brought home to him by a citizen of his own State that a dishonest and a corrupt campaign was being waged in his own behalf? He denied it. What did he mean when he said that his denial was "noncommittal" and "flimsy" or trivial? The responsibility and obligation was upon him, when those charges were brought home, to put a stop, or try to do it, to that method of campaigning if it was in progress.

What would be the conduct ordinarily expected under such circumstances of one who intended to act in good faith? If he did not have knowledge of the truthfulness of the charges, he would say: "Paul King, Vandenberg says you are running a corrupt campaign. I am too busy to keep track of the details of this campaign, but, as my agent, tell me what you are doing, and how you are doing it"; and if the facts revealed by the inquiry thus made showed that the charges of Mr. Vandenberg were true, it was the obligation of the candidate to stand up like a man and say: "I will not receive the benefits of such a campaign. I will not be the beneficiary of such methods." Instead of pursuing that course, however, he wrote a "noncommittal" reply, a reply which he said was noncommittal, and which, according to his own statement, covered the situation in a "flimsy" manner. In his statement yesterday he approved Paul King and his methods cordially, and expressed gratitude to the committee. Is that consistent with good faith in his contention that he did not know the character of the campaign that was being waged in his behalf?

Mr. President, not only is the good faith of his declaration that he had no knowledge of the character of the campaign that was actually being made regarding the expenditure of money controverted by his own letter, but it is also controverted by other circumstances which are admitted to be true. When Paul King, who afterward became executive chairman, first called upon Mr. Newberry in New York, the first inquiry was, according to Paul King, "What is this campaign going to cost?" The answer came back, in substance, "It cost Senator TOWNSEND $20,000, but on account of the fact that you are not well known throughout the State it will cost you at least $50,000." Listen, what arrangement was made for meeting that $50,000?

Is it consistent with the motives which control ordinary human transactions that, with the knowledge that $50,000 at least would be required, Mr. Newberry should leave to chance or accident the manner in which the campaign should be financed? He was put on notice by the declaration of Paul King that the campaign would cost, in round numbers, ten times as much as the Michigan statute permitted any candidate to expend. No objection was made. He had called Allan Templeton and said, "I want a business men's committee." Mr. Newberry now says, and his friends declare, that he has no responsibility for the activities of that committee. The evidence shows that he was the first man to suggest the organization of the committee. It was to be a business men's committee, and his partner and intimate friend, Allan Templeton, who had never engaged in politics, was asked to organize the committee and take the nominal leadership of the campaign.

Is it consistent to say that the Senator from Michigan could call his intimate friend and business associate to lead the campaign, and then, with the knowledge that it would cost at least $50,000, make no provision whatever, either express or implied, for the payment of that fund?

The only inference which a jury, sworn to try a case according to the law and the evidence, would arrive at from that state of facts is that knowing it was to be an expensive campaign, and that sums in excess of the amount which the statute authorized the candidate to expend must be expended if it were to be successful; that there originated, either expressly or impliedly, a plan so to arrange and conduct the campaign that the candidate should know little about the details of expenditures that were being made, so that he would not be in a position to file the statement the statute required him to file. No other conclusion can be reached from the admitted facts in evidence.

With that in mind and that circumstance established, let us see how the campaign was conducted. But before proceeding to that proposition, let me point out other circumstances which tend to show that the Senator from Michigan was not wholly ignorant of the manner and the methods employed to secure his nomination. He had already had a conference with Hayden, in which Hayden had warned him against making a "barrel campaign." He had been told by Paul King that the campaign would cost at least $50,000. We find that from New York he was making efforts to secure the support of Mr. Davidson, of the United States Steel Corporation; that he was also attempting to interest the great labor leader, John Mitchell, in his behalf; that he exercised supervision of form letters mailed out; that he directed King to permit no attack on Henry Ford; that he gave assurances to Vandenberg that the finances would be properly handled and accounted by the committee. In addition to that, the individual authorized to draw checks for the payment of the expenses of the campaign was his attorney in fact, with unlimited authority. Mr. Newberry was a stockholder in the corporation of which Mr. Blair, the treasurer of the committee, was the head.

So that instead of it being true that he took no part in the campaign, as he erroneously certified to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, he was actively engaged in the campaign from beginning to end. It is true that his other duties, and his preference in all probability, kept him out of the State during the campaign, but the record shows that daily reports were made to him by his manager and that he himself said he "devoured" those reports.

In spite of all those facts and many others which have been reviewed by Senators during the course of this debate, it is now claimed that out of consideration for the public good, unselfishly, while serving his country in time of war, the sitting Member permitted his name to be used as a candidate for the Republican nomination for the Senate in Michigan, and just left to chance or Providence the manner in which his campaign should be financed, notwithstanding the fact that he knew it was to be a barrel campaign and that it was to cost at least $50,000. You could not induce the most ignorant juror who ever tried a case to accept such a conclusion of fact.

The Senator from Mississippi a day or two ago declared that the sitting member filed a false certificate with the Secretary of the Senate when he said that he had taken no part whatever in the campaign, and that if any money had been expended it had been done without his knowledge or consent. I do not want to be uncharitable to Mr. Newberry, who is in a difficult situation, but with the facts I have already reviewed in mind, the fact that it was he who first mentioned his candidacy, he who first suggested the creation of a business men's committee, he who summoned Allan Templeton and asked him to head that committee, he who concurred in the appointment of Paul King as executive chairman, he who throughout the course of the campaign was exerting, from his far-away position in New York, every power and influence that he could exert to encompass his nomination, the fact that all these things occurred and that he then filed a certificate that he had taken no part whatever in the campaign, reflects upon his good faith, if it does not establish the dishonesty of his motives.

Do Senators believe that a Senator can legally pursue the course which the evidence in this case shows was pursued—create a committee, direct its activities, supervise the letters issued, insist on increasing publicity, the maintenance of publicity at full pressure, insist that everything possible be done to keep other candidates out of the field, use his personal influence to secure the support of representatives of great combinations and of labor unions, permit his bank account to be drawn upon without limit, and then, in order to escape responsibility for the measures that were employed, declare that he had taken no part in his own campaign?

I do not remember who it was, but I recall in reading the record that after the primary was over some Michigan Republican of prominence wrote Mr. Newberry a letter in which he said, in substance, "Newberry, everybody in Michigan knows the character of campaign you have made. Do not try to make the people of Michigan or anyone else believe that you knew nothing about that campaign. Come out like a man and say that you understood what was going on, but under the impulse and the heat engendered by the campaign you and your friends were driven to measures which are not to be approved. Do that and you will restore yourself to the confidence of the people of Michigan and you will win my respect." I am reminded that was the suggestion of ex-Gov. Osborn.

The Senator from Michigan told us a day or two ago that he understands this controversy fully, and that the people of Michigan understand it. Yes, Mr. President, but the people of Michigan know and understand that more money was expended in that campaign than had ever been expended in a primary campaign in the history of the United States. They know that in almost every part of the State many politicians were racing about with their hands behind them, inviting others to join them in an effort to secure boodle from the Newberry campaign committee. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] read to the Senate a few moments ago the testimony of a number of witnesses which shows that it was understood among many of the workers that this was an opportunity to get easy change.

But it is said, indeed that is the effect of the statement yesterday by Mr. Newberry, that, notwithstanding the expenditure of approximately a quarter of a million dollars in the primary, there was no violation of law and no particular disregard of the rules of ethics or of morality governing the matter. That subject has been made so clear by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and the others who have spoken that I do not feel justified in again reviewing the testimony in detail, which shows that the campaign was conducted in flagrant disregard of the Michigan statute.

In order to escape that conclusion the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has claimed that under the Michigan statute it is only unlawful to hire workers if those workers are for the purpose of bribing voters. He has repeatedly taken the position in this body that it is not unlawful to hire workers at any price, or in any number, for any length of time, if they are only to use persuasion, argument, or other personal influence. Yet upon that question the Michigan statute is so clear that it is difficult to understand how a layman, much less a lawyer, could place such a construction upon it. The Michigan statute expressly says that it is the purpose of this law to prevent the hiring of workers at the polls or prior thereto.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] says that that was impliedly repealed by the subsequent act of 1913 or 1915, which states 11 purposes for which money may be expended, but upon an analysis of those 11 purposes nowhere is it stated that workers at the polls or prior thereto may be employed.

So it can not be successfully contended that the subsequent act repealed or modified the act of 1909 in that the latter measure expressly prohibited the hiring of workers. The statute says that it is the purpose to proscribe the prevailing custom. That does not mean that the custom prevailed in Michigan of bribing voters. That means that the prevailing custom which it was attempted to end was the hiring of workers, either on election day or prior thereto, to advocate the cause or by personal influence to promote the candidacy of the candidate. No other construction can fairly be given.

I repeat that the subsequent statute—whether it was enacted in 1913 or 1915 the Senator from Michigan did not recall nor do I—did not permit the hiring of workers. It defined and legalized expenditures for 11 different purposes, and upon an analysis of those 11 different purposes it will be seen that there is no express or implied mention of the hiring of workers. The hiring of workers is prohibited by law in Michigan, and if the Michigan statute is to be given any force whatever it must be given that construction.

Surely at this stage of the debate it is not necessary to repeat the list of the many persons who were hired as workers.

The evidence shows that all the county chairmen, many public officers, many men who were in positions of responsibility as related to fraternal organizations, heads of banks, mercantile establishments, real estate concerns, men engaged in every sphere of industry, were hired to work for Mr. Newberry, and in every instance the hiring constituted a violation of the Michigan statute.

But the statement is made that the Senator from Michigan—the sitting Member—had no personal knowledge of these transactions. When it was brought to his attention that enormous sums of money were being wrongfully expended he ought to have made an investigation. He was put upon notice and inquiry. He can not be heard to say, "With many newspapers in the State charging all forms of misdeeds and crimes committed in my name and in the name of the committee which was conducting my campaign, I wash my hands of the matter; let them do what they please," and then escape responsibility for it because he did not know the details of it.

Do Senators know what that precedent means? The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] spoke of that feature. If by your vote in this case you say that a citizen can become a candidate for the United States Senate, leave the State, do what he pleases in connection with the conduct of his campaign, organize a committee or direct its organization, make no arrangements for the financing of his campaign, knowing that it was to be an expensive campaign, and then escape responsibility for the manner in which it was conducted, it means that powerful influences who want representatives in the Senate or in other legislative bodies may expend any sum that they choose and the beneficiary of those expenditures, instead of being denied the fruits of dishonorable methods, be lauded and applauded.

For my part, measuring my words, I regard it as more wholesome, in so far as the public interest is concerned, to put upon the candidate the responsibility of supervising the financing of his campaign and to deny to outside secret influences the privilege of corrupting an election in order to secure as their choice a favorite. You can take that statement and measure it, and you will find that it means that in so far as securing legislation in the interest of the public is concerned it is better to say to the millionaire, "Go out and do anything you please to secure your nomination or election, organize business men's committees, hire workers, pay county officers, buy up in that way the influences that ordinarily control the politics of your State, and then openly and boldly walk into the United States Senate and claim your seat." It is better to recognize that practice than it is to say to a candidate, "You can spend but a small sum of money, but if you can be clever enough to conceal your connection with it and your responsibility for it, you may become the beneficiary of all the wealth of men who may see fit to conserve their selfish aims and appropriate and expend for the promotion of your personal ambitions unlimited sums."

The statement was made yesterday that under the Michigan law those advocating the election of Mr. Newberry could lawfully expend a billion dollars in order to encompass his nomination. That is the conclusion to which this precedent would lead. If a quarter of a million dollars may be passed out through the hands of an executive committee to control the choice in a primary, why not a billion dollars? And yet every fair man realizes that the expenditure of such enormous sums in an election means the debauching of the electorate, means the degradation of public office, means in the end the downfall of the Republic and all its institutions that have been made dear to patriots by the labors and votes of the millions who have glorified the name of America by heroic service in the past.

No; you can not make the United States Senate a millionaire's club. God protect the Republic against the day when it becomes such. A man is no better and no worse by reason of the fact that he is poor or rich. I do not subscribe to the doctrine that a candidate is to be looked upon with disfavor merely because by intelligence, thrift, and activity he may have amassed a fortune; but I do say that having amassed that fortune you can not use it legitimately to buy yourself into power. If you can not do it yourself openly, you can not properly be the beneficiary of it when it is done by others in your behalf.

The Senator from Michigan on yesterday did not discuss a single fact in this case which would throw any light on the question of his title to his seat. The evidence shows that in a telephone conversation he was told by his attorney in fact, in response to his inquiry as to when the campaign would close, that this would happen on a certain day. That attorney in fact wired him the following day—I am stating merely the substance of the message:

I made a mistake. The greater portion of these expenses will not terminate until the primary is held some 30 days later than the time I stated. Have written.

What were the contents of that letter? In view of the fact that those communications were explained by Smith, his attorney in fact, as relating to the practice of drawing funds out of Mr. Newberry's account and the accounts of other individual members of the Newberry family and putting the proceeds to the credit of John S. Newberry, whose account was nominally financing the campaign, it appearing that Mr. Newberry was complaining about the balances, I would like to have asked him, "Why did you make that protest? If you were not interested in the financial end of this campaign, why were you protesting against the continuance of the expenditures? Why were you asking about the balances?" What sums were drawn from your account and placed to your brother John's credit?

Why, of course he was interested. His account was being depleted to replenish the account of John S. Newberry from time to time, and while it must be admitted that the sitting Member did not know and under the method of campaign that was adopted could not have known the intricate details of those expenditures, he must have known from the newspaper reports, from the letter of Vandenberg, from the condition of the bank accounts, that public sentiment in Michigan was being justly aroused, that morality was being disregarded, that sums beyond reason were being expended in his behalf, and as an honest man, as a courageous man willing to face and meet the responsibilities which by virtue of his position rested upon him, he ought to have taken charge of the situation, investigated the methods that were pursued, and stopped the scandalous expenditure of moneys which have made Michigan's name contemptible among her enemies, if she has any, and pitiable among her many friends. Any other construction of the duty that devolves upon one who would claim a seat in this body, where Webster's eloquence thundered, where Calhoun and Hayne wrought miracles in debate, where Senators glorious throughout the history of the Republic have valiantly met their responsibilities and courageously performed their duties—any other construction of the relationship of this candidate to his candidacy makes for corruption and inefficiency and dishonor in office.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I would not speak, except that I can not escape the feeling that, having sat as a member of the committee which heard the testimony in the case, and having submitted my views as one of the minority of the committee, I feel that it is a duty incumbent upon me to review some of the testimony.

Mr. President, this case has aroused interest, not because of the eminence of the family of the sitting Member but because there is a vital principle involved. Between the alpha, and, if it ever should come, which we hope it will not, the omega of this Government there runs as a dark and perilous thread the constant attempt of wicked wealth—all wealth is not wicked; I say of wicked wealth—to control this Government. When we were weak we had some reason to fear the attacks of external strength, but I have come to believe, from a reading of history—and I have read no more than other Senators—that nations such as ours, and, indeed, most of the first-class powers of the earth, have but little to fear from the aggressions of external strength. It was not external barbaric strength that overcame the Roman Empire.

When the schoolboy reads of the bats and owls that inhabit the forum and that haunt the voiceless places where once eloquence spoke, he is taught that the Roman Empire fell because the vandals, barbarians, or the Goths swept down upon it. That is partly true, but not wholly true. The Roman Empire had degenerated itself and reduced itself into a condition of ineptitude and debility, because it permitted without rebuke just such scandals as that which we are facing to-day. It was only when the Prætorian Guard sold the imperial purple for so much gold counted out upon the drumheads that imperial Rome was reduced to a position of such debility that she was easily overcome by the barbarians.

I join with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who has just concluded his address, in the assertion that in this Government the suggestion must find no place that a man is debarred from public office because of his wealth. The fact that a man may be rich or poor should have nothing to do with the contest for an office. There is no reason, in logic or in morals, why a millionaire may not be President or Vice President or Senator or governor; there is no reason why a poor man may not be President or Vice President or Senator or governor or occupy any other office to which he is called by the free and unpurchased vote of the electorate.

What are the facts? Senators are called upon here to vote as jurymen in a case which causes us not a little embarrassment.

It is a delicate subject, a subject which involves the seat of a fellow Member. I shall therefore ask Senators to recur to the record alone, for upon that record they must form their judgment and cast their vote in this case. What is the testimony in the case? I have grouped here some of the salient points of the testimony that throw a clear and unbroken light upon this case.

Before the Committee on Privileges and Elections Mr. Frederick P. Smith was examined, and testified, in part, as follows:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. What do you call your position, secretary or executor?

Mr. SMITH. No; I call myself agent.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You are their confidential financial man, are you not?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You have, I think it has been said here, powers of attorney from both Mr. Truman and Mr. John Newberry?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; practically all of the interests in the office.' I carry their powers of attorney.

It might be said at this point that Mr. John Newberry is a brother of Mr. Truman Newberry. What in my judgment is a beautiful affection exists between those two brothers; each knows what the other is doing. It has existed since their boyhood, and it is to be admired; but that affectionate regard between the two brothers can not now be denied and avoided so as to justify the statement that during the Newberry campaign one did not know what the other was doing. I resume the quotation from the testimony:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And there are others also interested?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. What others?

Mr. SMITH. Mrs. Truman Newberry's individual interests and Mrs. John S. Newberry's individual interests, and their sons.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. What did John Newberry say to you?

"To you"—the financial agent of the Newberry family—

Mr. SMITH. He came to me, as near as I can remember it, the latter part of February or the first part of March—it was the late winter—and told me that if the committee made any demands for campaign funds, if his brother should be in the senatorial race, to give them the money. I do not remember whether he mentioned Mr. Templeton's name or not. I knew Mr. Templeton quite well. The first call was from him. The checks that were given after that were all given to Mr. Templeton the same as the first one.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You have given us, in substance, all that transpired, have you?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. No other discussion, except to direct you, if they wanted money and came and asked for it, to give it to them?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. No limits as to amounts placed on you?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And no reports made to him as to the amounts you paid?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir.

That is the sworn testimony of Mr. Fred P. Smith, who holds the power of attorney of Truman H. Newberry and his brother.

A man may not under our plan of government announce himself as a candidate for an office and then close his eyes and willfully be oblivious to all that takes place in the course of the campaign in his behalf.

There was once a man in Delaware, whose name I will not mention, because any resentment the American people ever cherished against that man has perished in the misfortunes that came upon him later; but he was a perpetual candidate for the Senate, an all-around corrupter of men, and he made it a part of his policy or plan of action when his committee were in session or when the caucus were about to discuss any question involving the improper expenditure of money to say, "Gentlemen, just suspend your conversation at that point until I retire from the room, so that I will not be legally guilty, and when you have concluded discussing that subject, rap on the door, and I will return, and thus I will be legally innocent."

Such a thing might have been done in Delaware 20 years ago, but it can not be done anywhere in the United States to-day. A candidate for office may not wash his hands with invisible soap in imperceptible water or retire from the room while his agents contrive corrupt schemes, and then return and say, "I know nothing about it."

The sitting Member, in good temper, as became him, came before the Senate yesterday and made a statement. He stated that he was entirely oblivious of the expenditures in his behalf; that when the campaign, which attracted attention throughout the length and breadth of the United States, was concluded, to his astonishment he read that he had been elected at a cost of some $176,000, but that all through his campaign he had been oblivious to that feature thereof of which everybody else in the United States was aware, namely, the improper expenditure of money.

Let us see if he was entirely oblivious to every angle and every feature of the campaign:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Mr. Truman Newberry asked you about the expenses at times, did he not?

Mr. SMITH. I do not remember that he did.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You reported to him every day what was going on, did you not?

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you not send him a telegram every night of what occurred during the day?

Mr. SMITH. I sent him a telegram generally at night regarding what the papers said.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. About what the newspapers were saying?

Mr. SMITH. About what the newspapers were saying.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. I do not want anybody to accuse us of absolutely misleading the witness when it is plain he is mistaken. May I call your attention to page 219, to the following telegram:

DETROIT, MICH., July 28, 1918.

Lieut. TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Third Naval District, 280 Broadway, New York.

I misinformed you this morning the date of close of regular expenses. Should have said August 27. The circular work, advertising, clerical help, postage, and all regular overhead expenses will naturally continue until primary. Have written.

FRED P. SMITH.

Did you send that telegram?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I did.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Then, it was not about when the primary was; it was when the expenses would cease that you were talking with him and writing him about. Is that right?

Mr. SMITH. That is probably it. I do not know what the conversation was, but I had told him July 27. I misinformed him as to the month.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You had been talking to him. He wanted to know when these expenses were going to stop, did he not?

Mr. SMITH. I do not believe so. I think his conversation was about the drain on the balances in the office, and he was complaining about the money that was being spent.

The sitting Member's complaint was about the drain on the balances in the office. How may a man complain to his agent about the drain on his balances, be told by that agent that he must endure that drain for another 30 days, and then come here and say he was oblivious to everything which took place and say that to his astonishment and amazement he woke up and found himself elected to the United States Senate?

Passing over, as time requires me to do, much of the testimony we find the following questions by former Senator Wolcott:

Senator WOLCOTT. I want to find out about the checking out of these funds by you, Mr. Smith, to the Newberry primary committee. Those checks were all drawn against what account in your office?

Mr. SMITH. Against Mr. John S. Newberry's account.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you positive they were invariably drawn against that account and no other?

Mr. SMITH. Absolutely.

Senator WOLCOTT. You spoke of transferring funds from the other accounts into his.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir. It is a procedure that has been current for years. When one account gets low it is fed from the others. We have 12 different accounts. Of course, we do not feed from the corporations, but the personal ones. I have done it this last week.

What does that mean? It means that when Mr. John S. Newberry's account grew low by reason of his contributions to his brother's campaign Mr. Frederick P. Smith, attorney in fact, drew drafts upon the account of Truman H. Newberry and deposited them to the credit of John S. Newberry, and then drew against the account of John S. Newberry for expenses of the campaign.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How much were those drafts?

Mr. ASHURST. John S. Newberry's aggregated $99,900.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you transfer funds from Truman H. Newberry's account over to John S. Newberry's?

Senators, listen to that.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you transfer funds from Truman H. Newberry's account over to John S. Newberry's?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is there a record of that amount?

Mr. ASHURST. I will find it.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; or Mr. Truman's to John S., or from Mrs. John S., around either way, and always have done it.

Senator WOLCOTT. All these funds in those various accounts, barring the corporation accounts, went to supply ready money to John S. Newberry's account?

Mr. SMITH. No; I do not think they all did in this case.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then the funds in their two accounts went to keep the John S. Newberry account up to a sufficient fund, so as to enable you to have enough money out of that account to take care of these primary expenses?

Mr. SMITH. In cases where there were overdrafts they would make up enough balance to cover the overdraft.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were those funds advanced from Truman H. Newberry's account and Mrs. Truman H. Newberry's account to John S. Newberry returned in due course to those accounts from which they were originally taken?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

On business transactions, be they ever so small, business men keep accounts; at least, they keep accounts where the transaction is regular on its face and no inquiring eye or exploring hand is feared.

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you the books showing all these transactions?

Mr. SMITH. No; I have not.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were those books taken by the cashier down to Grand Rapids?

Mr. SMITH. I do not remember about it. I did not pay any attention to what he took.

Briefly, as in keeping with this case, the books are gone or lost—lost! On yesterday the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] rose at the conclusion of the speech of the sitting Member and addressed the Senate.

The Senator from New Jersey is a member of this committee. He was so disgusted that he animadverted upon the methods adopted by the Newberry committee in its failing to keep the books so that they could be examined.

Business men know that when men have transactions of which they are not afraid the muniments and the memorials thereof are placed away for safe-keeping; a business man knows that when men have transactions, and the written records or the muniments thereof may later arise to confound persons, they pay but scant attention to what becomes of the papers. These questions were asked:

Senator EDGE. What was the reason for adopting what would seem to me to be a very complicated system of bookkeeping for a temporary activity like an election campaign is necessarily? It seems to me that it would meet all the necessities of the law in making your report if you had kept the usual ledger, journal, and daybook and entered the accounts in the ordinary way. All this percentage is not required at all under the law.

Mr. FLOYD. No. * * *

Senator EDGE. It is quite simple to do that without working out a percentage basis. You would simply charge publicity at whatever it is, the men employed in that particular work, copy writing, etc.

Mr. FLOYD. We did that indirectly.

Now, who asked those questions? Some partisan, seeking to make political capital out of this misfortune that has happened to the sitting Member? No; it was an efficient, upstanding Republican who first criticized the indirect methods and the concealment of the books.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Did the treasurer of this campaign committee keep a bank account?

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator let me answer that by reading some more of the testimony? I do not want to misquote the testimony.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And if he did, I want to know if that bank account or checking account was produced.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator, I know, would prefer to have the testimony rather than my remembrance of it. I will read that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In other words, I want to know if that was among the lost papers.

Mr. ASHURST. I will reach that point.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you ever inquire of this cashier what he did with the books and checks?

Mr. SMITH—

The financial agent—

No, sir.

These were transactions involving thousands of dollars. It will not do to say that it was an opulent family, and that they paid no attention to books because their opulence was great, and the expenditure of a couple of hundred thousand dollars made no difference. That argument will not stand up when we find in the record a letter from Truman H. Newberry saying: "Those stamped envelopes you sent me were too small. Do not waste stamps in that way. Send ones that are larger," showing that he was giving patient, careful attention to the details of his campaign.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you ever make any investigation about their whereabouts after they came back from Grand Rapids?

Mr. SMITH. No; I did not.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Well, do you know the total amount that you charged against John S. Newberry on the books?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know what was charged—

Here is the fiscal and financial agent, the attorney in fact, holding their power of attorney—

but I know that the credits, taking credits for what came back, because there were moneys coming back along about the time that the report was made up. It made, as near as I recollect, either $99,000 or $99,900.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No. I understood the Senator to state that no records could be obtained for the examination of the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. So far as the committee was concerned.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Now, I want to know what records were kept that disappeared. Was there a treasurer's bank account and a checking account that disappeared?

Mr. ASHURST. Some of the testimony was to the effect that such books were kept, but such books as were kept were not available to your committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. KING. If I may answer the Senator, all the books that were kept by the committee which would throw any light upon the expenditures or the receipts were lost or were claimed to have been lost. Check books, bank accounts, deposit slips, everything, vanished as well as the checks themselves. It was alleged that they were taken from the offices where they were kept and deposited in a barn where the Newberry accounts, the accounts of the estate and the representatives, were usually kept, and they all disappeared. That is the only explanation. Mr. Newberry upon the floor did not discuss their disappearance, did not account for them, did not attempt to account for their disappearance, nor to explain the contents of his own bank account or his brother's bank account, the amount that was drawn from his own bank account or his brother's account or from the 10 other accounts of Newberry's that were controlled by this one man, Smith, who had power of attorney over them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And there is no evidence in existence to either confirm or disprove the report of expenditures made under the law?

Mr. KING. They have either lost or have deliberately destroyed all the evidence which shows these enormous expenditures that would condemn Mr. Newberry before any honest jury.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Arizona——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The evidence does show that not only was a considerable sum, not embraced in that account, found to be due after the account was filed but also that considerable sums which were actually expended were not accounted for at all.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield to all Senators, but, of course, I do not want to consume my hour in yielding.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This is an important matter, and I hope the Senator from Arizona will permit full inquiry and discussion.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield first to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. In this connection permit me to say, as the Senator will recall, that after the committee had discovered that all the Newberry books were either destroyed or stolen or taken away and we discovered that their accounts had been kept in the banks—that is, John Newberry's account, Truman Newberry's account, all these other Newberry accounts—and we asked to have the bankers subpœnaed to bring their books showing these accounts, then it was that the majority of the committee voted down our motion to call those witnesses before us.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has stated the matter with accuracy.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I trust the Senator will excuse me for pressing the matter.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think this phase of the question is very, very important, the disappearance of all papers and documents to prove or disprove the accuracy or correctness of the report when nearly $200,000 were used in the campaign. Disappearance of evidence is frequently affiliated with other acts of fraud. Now, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield further.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand $140,000 was paid out to newspapers for advertising and publicity purposes in the State of Michigan.

Mr. ASHURST. That is about the sum.

Mr. KING. One hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars plus.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Are there any documents, any records, any receipts, any checks, any vouchers, to show what newspapers got that sum of money, what sums each received, and how generally it was distributed and expended?

Mr. ASHURST. The vouchers or receipts or papers which would prove or disprove anything along that line mysteriously disappeared, and were not available to your committee.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will allow me, they were destroyed, and destroyed by the order of Mr. King, or some of the campaign committee of Mr. Newberry.

Mr. ASHURST. In other words, this status of affairs arose; although the Nation had become shocked, and the sitting Member says he was shocked with the excessive expenditures, and although the lieutenant governor and the former governor and thousands of citizens complained and demanded an investigation, the Newberry managers said, in effect, "We thought these books showing the expenditure of a couple of hundred thousand dollars were of no value and no importance." At least, Mr. President, the accounts were in the custody and control and charge of the sitting Member and his agents, and were not available to your committee. That is the ultimate fact, and your committee did not destroy them, but tried to get them, and could not.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. I think the record will show beyond peradventure that the facts in this case are that there was not a single book destroyed, that there were no books kept, as you and I use the term books——

Mr. ASHURST. Let me interrupt the Senator before he goes further, to ask how could the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] complain before the committee about the indirectness of the bookkeeping, if there were no books kept?

Mr. SPENCER. I do not want to intrude upon the Senator's time——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield. The question is important, and I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. I thought the Senator might like to know what the exact facts are.

Mr. ASHURST. I should be glad to know.

Mr. SPENCER. There were no books kept. The term "books" was used by some one before the grand jury and ran through the record. What the testimony shows was that they kept a kind of a card index, or a memorandum of every contribution and of every expenditure, and then, at the end of the campaign, they tabulated them all in two exhibits, No. 135 and No. 136. First they came before the grand jury, and then we had them, and those were called books. They were the original books of entry as to all the expenditures of the committee, and there was no book destroyed.

The testimony of Mr. King, whose namesake inadvertently made the remark a moment ago that the books had been destroyed by order, is uncontradicted; that the only things which were destroyed were the stereotyped formal letters, which accumulated in mass, and were no good to anybody, and when the campaign was over he said, "Let them go," and the janitor took them out. But there was no evidence in the record of the destruction of a single book. Let us get the facts clear.

Mr. ASHURST. Now, I am going to talk for a moment along the line suggested by the able Senator from Missouri. Let us assume that no books were destroyed, we will say. Mr. President, I have not laid emphasis on the books. Did Senators pay enough attention to what I said to know what I referred to? I did not say "books" alone. I said the memorials; I said the muniments showing the guilt or innocence of the parties. I do not care whether you call them ledgers, journals, daybooks, cashbooks—I care not what you call them—check books, letter books; I asseverate here, and the record shows, that whatever memorials or muniments of writing were kept were not available to your committee, and were destroyed, with the consent of the sitting Member's friends and agents.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment. Of course, this is coming out of my time——

Mr. SPENCER. I do not want to have this taken out of the Senator's time.

Mr. ASHURST. I feel that it is my duty to yield.

Mr. SPENCER. There is no question about it.

Mr. ASHURST. I feel I ought to be corrected if anything has been misquoted, but will the Senator make it as brief as possible?

Mr. SPENCER. I will take but a moment. Is the Senator referring, in what he calls memorials, to books or memoranda having to do with the expenditures of the committee?

Mr. ASHURST. I am.

Mr. SPENCER. Then he will find the complete record of them printed in our record. They were not destroyed. He should not say they were destroyed, but that we have not got them.

Mr. ASHURST. I am referring to the books and papers and memorials which the Senator from Missouri, because he is a member of the committee, knows disappeared, having first been taken by Mr. Newberry's agent to a barn, and from that point they disappeared.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator is mistaken as to the fact. Those were never taken to Mr. Newberry's barn.

Mr. ASHURST. I said a barn.

Mr. SPENCER. Or to any barn. I am not quibbling about words.

Mr. ASHURST. Then the testimony is false. That is the testimony.

Mr. SPENCER. No; the Senator is confused. The books of account of the committee were not. It was the private checks and books of the Newberry estate which were taken to the so-called barn and lost. The Senator is merely mistaken as to the testimony.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. KING. I challenge the accuracy of the statement of the Senator from Missouri which he made a few moments ago in reply to a statement I made. The facts are these, that the books of the Newberry estate and of Truman Newberry and of John S. Newberry and of the Newberry accounts relating to the expenditures in connection with the campaign were taken, as the record shows, to the Newberry barn, and are lost. The record also shows that whatever accounts, books, receipts, documents, memoranda, whatever you may be pleased to call them, were kept by Mr. Floyd, or by those who were conducting the campaign and making the distribution of the money, were deliberately destroyed, and the record will show it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is that disputed?

Mr. SPENCER. It is absolutely disputed, and the Senator can not point to a word in the record to prove it. I can point to the record——

Mr. KING. I have not yielded to the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. I can point to the record where the contrary is shown.

Mr. KING. I challenge again the accuracy of the statement of the Senator from Missouri. I repeat, they were destroyed.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield in my time?

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield for another sentence; but I trust the Senator will let me finish.

Mr. KING. Mr. Floyd was brought in a day or two before the report was to be filed, and he, from the memoranda, the receipts, the books, and the reports, whatever they were, made up a pretended account of the receipts and disbursements, and those two exhibits are here, but I deny from the record that they are accurate, or that they contain a true record of the receipts or the disbursements which were made during the campaign.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I hope my impatience will not be offensive, but it will be remembered that this comes out of my time.

Now, I am going to reach a lowest common denominator upon which we can all agree, that the checks, books, papers, muniments, and memorials in writing relating to the expenditures in the Newberry campaign were not available to the committee. There is a common denominator upon which we all agree——

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator will have to change his denominator.

Mr. ASHURST. That we all agree upon, and the Senator from Missouri would not want to resort to such a procedure as to say they were available, because he is a frank man. They were not available to your committee. The books, whatever they were; the papers, records, memorials, and muniments, whatever they may have been, evidencing the expenditure of money, were called for by some of your committee. My learned friend who so well represents the State of New Jersey in part, who has just come into the Chamber, was, I repeat, so struck with the indirect method, efficient type of statesman that he is, that he criticized the Newberry committee, which I have just read, because of their method of keeping books, their indirection.

Mr. SPENCER and Mr. EDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator will find in this record Exhibits 135 and 136, to which I referred, on pages 812 to 860, inclusive.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. I would not have known that if he had not told me. Now, I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Inasmuch as the Senator from Arizona has brought my name into this debate——

Mr. ASHURST. I was complimenting the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. Permit me to state in a very few words what that particular criticism referred to.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator did not explain that in his speech; will he not do it after I conclude?

Mr. EDGE. I can do it in two minutes.

Mr. ASHURST. I will give the Senator one minute.

Mr. EDGE. I can do it in 30 seconds.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

Mr. EDGE. That was a criticism, and a very proper criticism, of the method of keeping the so-called books, which were in the nature of memoranda. I admit that I thought the method adopted was an entirely unbusinesslike one, and so commented at the hearing; but so far as the Senator refers to the refusal to have other papers and books brought before us, I can not get the connection at all.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator must not imagine that I have put into his mouth words that would seem to make him say he was criticizing the nonproduction. I say that the methods pursued respecting such fragmentary and meager papers as we had were so indirect as to draw a rebuke, and a just rebuke, from that model of efficiency in business, the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his very kind reference; but I must repeat that my criticism of the method employed in keeping the accounts was directed at that particular method of keeping a record of their expenditures and disbursements, and that we could very much more readily have arrived at our decision if they had been kept in the usual ledger form. I adhere to that view.

Mr. ASHURST. I agree with the Senator.

Now, some more of the testimony. I am not going to say what somebody said or somebody heard somebody say, but let me confine myself to the testimony. Mr. Paul King—and it will be remembered that he was the young man who had full charge of the Newberry campaign—with the consent of the sitting Member, said in his testimony:

I consider myself a free agent, a free lance, to do just as I felt should be done in the management of that campaign, in the way I conducted it. All questions were referred to me for decision and were passed upon to the best of my ability. With the assistance of Mr. Templeton, I conducted that campaign. I am glad of it and proud of it.

Mr. President, in the eventide of life, when he comes to reflect upon the impetuosity of youth, he will regret the statement that he was "glad and proud of it." I believe when men come toward the sere and mellow years, impetuous statements that looked so well in youth may not appeal to us. When the silver of the years touches our temples we begin to think we might well have left some of those things unsaid, and I rather think he might have left unsaid the statement that he was glad and proud of the campaign. I think, however, he tried to tell the truth.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you report every day to Mr. Newberry?

Mr. KING. I wrote to him very frequently, and when I was out meeting people I wrote him practically every day, telling him whom I met and what they said and how they felt about his candidacy.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. How the campaign was progressing?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And went down to consult with him frequently?

Mr. KING. Several times; not frequently.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. About matters of policy?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. (H., 469.)

I was the organization manager of that Newberry campaign, and I started out to make an organization that was the best one Michigan ever had, and I tried my best to do it, and I think I did. (H., 472.)

The man's impetuosity did not lead him into saying something there that was untrue. He said: "I started out to make that the best campaign organization that Michigan ever knew." It is true that he did it, because in the long and proud history of that State, from the first year when she elected a Senator down through the silent years, she has contributed statesmen here, she has contributed to the wealth and strength and glory of this Republic, but it was her unique distinction to give us a specimen of a political machine that could move with a celerity and a momentum theretofore unknown in politics.

The Quay machine and the Platt machine were mere tyros compared to this one. This machine, without slipping a cog, without the presence of even the candidate to commit himself, moved forward, and remorselessly crushed or drove out of the campaign every other man, rich or poor, who got into it. So Mr. King's boastfulness that he had the best organization Michigan had ever had is justified by the record and by the results. Later he was congratulated by the sitting Member.

Let us examine some of the testimony about hiring men to work. I realize that speakers who go about telling of our merits and concealing our demerits do so with the expectation on every one's part that they should get their expenses, a hall, a band, and a supper. I would not be such a fool and such a Pharisee as to claim that I do not know anything about those things. We all know about them. I am not talking about the supper for the candidate and his managers; I am not talking about the band, the hall, the advertisements, and so forth. I am talking about going to men and handing them money to go about and "work" for the candidate.

That was against the law in Michigan. All the obliqueness, all the tangled lines, all the sinuosities of sophistication, can not drive away from them the knowledge of the fact that the statutes of Michigan prohibited the hiring of workers in election campaigns.

Paul King said further:

Mr. Newberry approved of my plan of publicity.

On April 14, 1918, Mr. Newberry wrote Mr. King that—

I am glad Mr. Warner (three times governor of Michigan) is scared out for the present, and as long as we keep up our publicity work at full pressure it will be harder and harder for any new man to get any kind of a start that will make it seem worth while for him to be a serious candidate.

Men who manage campaigns are not babes in the woods nor an Alice in Wonderland. When men running a campaign, shrewd, bold, daring men, receive a letter from their principal instructing them to "Keep up your campaign publicity at full pressure and you will keep all the other men out," they know what that means. They know that such an order means "Go the limit."

Mr. Thomas P. Phillips testified as follows:

I reside in Detroit and received $60 a week from the Detroit News before I went to work for the Newberry committee. Mr. King hired me at $100 a week as publicity man for the campaign. I made four trips to New York and saw Mr. Newberry and took some moving pictures of Mr. Newberry. I talked to Mr. Newberry, and from what I gathered of his past life I wrote certain publicity. (H., 352).

I do not think there is anything wrong in his going to New York and getting the past history of the candidate. The gravamen of the offense was in the sitting Member saying he was oblivious of everything that took place. Mr. Phillips continued:

Mr. King told me that he had made arrangements to take more moving pictures of Mr. Newberry and asked me to go to New York and see that the pictures were made.

I am not going to condemn that. I suppose in all campaigns we are glad to see ourselves in pictures, so I will pass that over, but it cost $3,788.

Mr. John S. Newberry (brother of the sitting Member, and who contributed $99,900 to the Newberry campaign fund) testified, inter alia, as follows (H. 317):

Senator POMERENE. And you want the committee to understand, do you, that you placed no limit upon the amount which Smith was to draw out of your account for the financing of that campaign?

Mr. NEWBERRY. No, sir; I never thought about it. I just said, "Go ahead and use what money you want."

That man told the truth. He might have violated some law in his unlawful expenditures, but John S. Newberry would not commit perjury. It was a small matter from his viewpoint to spend this money in his brother's behalf, but he scorned to commit perjury and testified, "I placed no limit. I said to spend all the money that was necessary, and I contributed $99,900."

I continue reading:

Senator POMERENE. Do you mean to say you do not know whether any money was borrowed from one or the other?

Mr. NEWBERRY. No, sir; I don't.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. The fact is that since your father's death your brother has practically run your business affairs?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Yes, sir.

If that be true, then Truman H. Newberry, having charge of his own brother's affairs, was contributing to his own account when his brother contributed $99,900, because he had practical charge of the affairs of John S. Newberry.

Let us take a specimen of the methods resorted to by the Newberry managers. George Murray was president of the Railway Men's Relief Association, with 10,000 members, with headquarters at Muskegon. He was editor of the monthly magazine published by his association.

In May, 1918, Mr. King and Mr. Floyd came to him and paid him $300 to work for Mr. Newberry, and an additional $400 was paid to the magazine and went into the association's funds.

Up to that time Mr. Murray had not advocated the nomination of Mr. Newberry in his magazine nor had he published anything about Mr. Newberry's candidacy until Mr. King and Mr. Floyd told him "that they would take care of him on the proposition." (B. E., 195.)

After being paid this money Mr. Murray started out to work for Mr. Newberry and to line up the railroad men for him.

Mr. Murray then started making speeches among the railway men for Mr. Newberry and in all attended 33 meetings.

In the month of July an advertisement was published in Mr. Murray's railway magazine, and in August Mr. Murray published a personal letter "direct from him to the railroad men." In this letter Mr. Murray says:

MUSKEGON, MICH., July 30, 1918.

To my friends in the railway service:

I feel it is due you all to know why I am indorsing and supporting the candidacy of Commander Truman H. Newberry for the office of United States Senator.

There are no facts given. He does not say his candidate is in favor of woman suffrage, he does not say he believes in a man's right to strike for a better wage, but he finds refuge behind that general statement, "I believe he is a good man."

Behind the general statement, "He is a good fellow," more evil has been done to the public at the ballot box than behind any other sort of statement I can recall. He did not say he received $700. He said:

Mr. Newberry's record, public and private, is such as to inspire the confidence of every man. * * *

I have investigated his character, and find that it stands the test. * * *

I trust that my friends among the railway men of Michigan will put their shoulders to the wheel and make this result absolutely certain. The primaries come on August 27. * * *

I personally indorse Mr. Newberry's candidacy, the man, and the principles of sturdy Americanism which he represents.

On August 8, 1918, nearly three weeks before the primary election, Mr. Vandenberg, of the Grand Rapids Herald, wrote to Mr. Newberry as follows:

DEAR SIR: I desire to direct your attention to certain phases of the Michigan Republican senatorial campaign, which seem to demand very clear and explicit public statement from you well in advance of primary election day. * * * I direct your attention to these specific charges which have appeared in responsible newspapers.

He then goes on to point out that charges of illegal and excessive expenditures of money have been made against Mr. Newberry. Mr. Newberry replies courteously and says in conclusion:

I thank you for writing me and appreciate the opportunity thus offered to state the truth.

I have not paid nor am I obligated to pay anything in connection with the senatorial primary, nor have I any official information thereof beyond the assurance of the Newberry committee that their accounts will be filed as required by law and all expenditures made only for such purposes as allowed by law. I have forwarded your letter to the committee, requesting them to send you a clear, comprehensive, and adequate statement for publication with your letter as you suggest.

He then wrote a letter to his own business manager, inclosing Mr. Vandenberg's letter, and in writing to his business manager he said, under date of August 9:

I am inclosing a copy of my noncommital reply to the Grand Rapids people, which covers the situation in a rather flimsy manner.

Mr. OWEN. What kind of a manner?

Mr. ASHURST. A rather flimsy manner.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would it interfere with the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CARAWAY. While the Senator is speaking of the letter which Mr. Vandenberg had written to the junior Senator from Michigan, the Senator will recall that Mr. Newberry telegraphed to Vandenberg in effect: "I am informed that the Newberry senatorial committee can justify this expenditure." Who informed him of that? That was on the 11th day of August. If he had that information on the 11th day of August about these expenditures, and knew what they were, and that they were justified, when he held up his hand on the 14th of August and swore before Almighty God that he did not know of any money that had been expended, at that time did he tell the truth?

Mr. ASHURST. I perceive.

Mr. CARAWAY. One of those statements was not true.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes. It is disclosed by Government Exhibit No. 60 (B. E., 253) that the sum of $176,586 was disbursed by the Truman H. Newberry senatorial committee, according to statements on file in the office of the county clerk of Wayne, Mich., and this does not include several thousand dollars disbursed later in payment of additional expenses incurred.

The majority of the committee say: "The amount of money spent at the primary was large—too large—* * *," and, further, "Your committee condemns the use of such a large sum of money in any primary campaign * * *." To these expressions I will simply add that the law and public policy also condemn the use "of such a large sum of money in any primary campaign."

The men who managed the campaign for Mr. Newberry, the sitting Member, exhibited fertility, efficiency, and industry that could well be admired, if employed in transactions not discreditable, but in this episode, as is apt to be the fate of most feats of left-handed wisdom, their mystifying methods and their juggling of accounts aroused a public resentment which in no small degree contributed to the very results these campaign managers thought they were avoiding—detection and trouble.

The failure of the Newberry campaign committee to keep regular accounts, the shifting of records and papers concerning the campaign from one place to another, the juggling of money from one account to another, and the adoption of mysterious and unusual methods and roundabout ways regarding matters that might just as well have been performed in the open are not the methods and habits of candidates seeking to obey the law.

The Lorimer case has been mentioned. Mr. Lorimer denied the charge which was made against him; and Lorimer never wrapped the Stars and Stripes around him while he and his agents bribed the electorate.

He who in possession of evidence, in the form of books, papers, and vouchers, tending to exculpate him carefully preserves the same and is anxious and willing at the proper time to exhibit the same.

He who knows of the whereabouts of vouchers, books, and records which he suspects may in the future confound and embarrass him spends but little time or effort to preserve such evidence.

The testimony in this case shows that the senatorial campaign in Michigan in 1918 partook more of the character of an auction than an election. From its inception to its conclusion it was a reckless and illegal foray of opulent men—a foray conducted with a disregard of public morality and with a boastfulness that would be comical if it were not sinister. If the desperate and dubious expedients resorted to in the senatorial contest in Michigan in 1918 to obtain a seat in this body were to become the general rule or the custom of persons seeking membership here, then no man of limited means—indeed, no man of ample fortune if honest—could enter the senatorial contest with even a conjectural probability of success.

To encourage the methods practiced in the senatorial contest in Michigan in 1918 would be to embolden and to multiply the most baleful assaults that can be made upon representative government.

The testimony shows that the sitting Member was privy to and inevitably, in the nature of events, had knowledge of those facts concerning his own campaign, which scores of thousands of men in Michigan well knew. He was warned by the editor of the Grand Rapids Herald and by Lieut. Gov. Dickinson as to the improper course of his campaign. His agents and managers kept him fully and constantly supplied with reports, but he failed to put a stop to the disbursement of moneys made by his agents, with the obvious purpose of improperly influencing voters, and it is puerile to say that a seat in this body thus obtained may not be declared vacant because, forsooth, the candidate says he was oblivious to that one feature of his own campaign, which overshadowed all others of the contest, which feature was so widely discussed and so notorious as to be known not only in Michigan but throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Of all the persons interested in that campaign Truman H. Newberry, the sitting Member, was the most interested. He was the candidate; he was the man for and in whose behalf the expenditures were made; he was the luminary around whom all the satellites revolved; from him they received their light and heat and life. To him the daily reports were made; from him the managers received suggestions, words of encouragement, and orders to proceed "at full pressure." He was the motive power of the "organization" built to secure for himself a seat in this body—an organization which moved with a celerity and momentum that crushed or purchased opposition to its plans or purposes.

The credentials of the sitting Member are stained by fraud and tainted by illegal expenditures of money. His seat should be declared vacant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The question is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] as a substitute for the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dial	Harrison	McCormick
Ball	du Pont	Heflin	McKellar
Broussard	Edge	Hitchcock	McKinley
Bursum	Elkins	Jones, N. Mex.	Moses
Calder	Fletcher	Jones, Wash.	Myers
Cameron	Glass	Kenyon	Nelson
Capper	Gooding	Keyes	New
Caraway	Hale	Ladd	Norris
Curtis	Harris	Lodge	Oddie

Owen	Robinson	Swanson	Warren
Page	Sheppard	Townsend	Watson, Ind.
Pepper	Smith	Trammell	Willis
Pittman	Smoot	Wadsworth
Poindexter	Spencer	Walsh, Mass.
Pomerene	Sutherland	Walsh, Mont.

Mr. HARRIS. My colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] desires to speak upon this matter, but would much prefer to speak to-morrow, as he is not feeling very well this afternoon. Therefore I shall move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is no other Senator ready to speak?

Mr. SPENCER. I understand not; but if any other Senator desires to speak this afternoon I shall, of course, not make the motion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is only 20 minutes after 4 o'clock.

RECESS.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 11, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 10, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, somehow and everywhere the darkness settles only to be lifted by the morning light. Surely in Thee we have our Fatherhood and over us is brooding Thy loving, patient heart. We would not hide from Thy face, but we would look up and beseech Thee to freely grant us pardon of all our sins. Enable us to be wisely jealous of all Thy rights and help us to value this day in its immediate duty and see in it a helpful service for our country. As our time ebbs and flows lead us forward, onward, and upward until we reach the evening of life's little day. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REAL ESTATE HELD BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the following report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs printed as a House document for the use and information of the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document a report which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs concerning real estate held by the War Department.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, why should it be printed as a House document?

Mr. KAHN. It is not a bill, and I do not see any other way in which it can be printed.

Mr. MANN. Well, is it a report to the House?

Mr. KAHN. It is a report to the full committee of the Committee on Military Affairs, and it contains a great deal of useful information.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was made as a report of the Committee on Military Affairs, in which case it would require it to be printed as a House document.

Mr. KAHN. The House subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understand it, the Committee on Military Affairs should be authorized to report this as a part of their proceedings?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. However, it is a very important question, and I think it would have more general attention if it was published as a House document. It seems to me it would.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is a report from a subcommittee to the full committee. Now, the full committee has not considered it?

Mr. KAHN. No. And the full committee has not had an opportunity even to see it, because it is not printed.

Mr. WALSH. Why does not the chairman of the committee have it printed as a committee document?

Mr. KAHN. The chairman was of the impression that the Members of the House were very much interested in the whole subject, and the committee thought it might be well to have it printed.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a statement of facts, as I understand it, in regard to the real estate the Government owns.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it expected that the full committee will take some action on it?

Mr. KAHN. The full committee will take some action on it later.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. That it be printed as a House document.

Mr. DYER. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently no quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was called and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Barkley	Fess	Lanham	Rainey, Ala.
Beck	Fish	Larson, Minn.	Rainey, Ill.
Beedy	Focht	Lawrence	Rayburn
Black	Free	Lee, N. Y.	Riordan
Bland, Ind.	Fulmer	Lineberger	Rodenberg

Dupré	Knight	Park, Ga.	Wingo
Echols	Kreider	Patterson, N. J.	Winslow
Edmonds	Langley	Pou	Woodyard

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty-nine Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 188, noes 71.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to suspend further proceedings under the call. Those favoring the motion will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 272, nays 56, not voting 102, as follows:

Mr. EDMONDS with Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH.

Mr. KRIEDER with Mr. RAINEY of Alabama.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Pennsylvania with Mr. FULMER.

Mr. ANDERSON with Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is dilatory, but he is open to conviction, and will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is the only motion to adjourn that has been made to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is that all the gentleman wishes to say? Then the Chair will rule. The rule says that no dilatory motion shall be entertained by the Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be going a long way to hold the first motion to adjourn dilatory. I know the rule about motions to adjourn having been held dilatory, but this is the first motion to adjourn that has been made to-day, and I feel that it would be going rather a long way to hold it dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the fact that it is the first time to-day that the motion to adjourn has been made proves that it is not dilatory. The Chair believes that it is well known to all Members of the House that when this anti-lynching bill has been up before, or has been imminent, there has been a deliberate attempt at obstruction led by the gentleman from Tennessee, and to-day on the vote just taken the gentleman from Tennessee demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call, a mere formal motion on which a record vote meant nothing. That obviously was done to kill time.

In deciding what is dilatory the Chair thinks he should be very careful, because his decision is final; but, on the other hand, he does not think there can be any question in the minds of any of the Members of the House present that the purpose of the gentleman from Tennessee in making this motion is delay, and not the expectation or intention of accomplishing any other result by the motion. Therefore the Chair thinks that the motion is dilatory.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Chair and the majority are in such a hurry to ruin the Constitution. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the antilynching bill, H. R. 13, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is dilatory.

Mr. LANKFORD. Obviously so. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 13, and on that motion he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 224, nays 92, answered "present" 3, not voting 111, as follows:

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. HERRICK. Not when my name was called. I just came in a minute ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify under the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

ANTILYNCHING BILL.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 13, to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, what a happy world this would be if there were no crime anywhere; and what a happy people the American people ought to be, for they above all the rest of the world have privileges that no other people enjoy. Of all the nations in the world this Nation certainly should be the most law-abiding, for here as nowhere other in all the world the powers of the Government come up from the people to the State, while in every other nation rights go down from the State to the people. The privilege of being an American citizen is the greatest privilege that can be granted to man. The responsibility that an American citizenship carries is great, and the responsibility should be assumed along lines that are in keeping with the privilege. There ought to be no man anywhere in America either above or below the law. This is a government of laws and not of men. The law should be supreme. The humblest citizen, no less than the most exalted, should have the protection of the law. No citizen or combination of citizens should be permitted under any circumstances to arrogate to themselves the right to control the law. No mob violence should be tolerated in America. America has made the most wonderful progress of all the nations of the world. She is the leader in belief of liberty to the citizen. She believes in the uplift of the human race everywhere. We boast of the freedom we have extended to subject races in other lands, and yet we forget the humility that is imposed on 12,000,000 people in our own land.

The bill under consideration pending before the House is one that seeks to remedy an appalling evil, one which ought not to be permitted to exist in a civilized nation, one which is the most serious blot on American supremacy among the nations of the world. The bill that is pending before us seeks to remedy that awful evil. We do not hesitate to say that we are willing to divide the police power of the State with the Nation to enforce prohibition, but we hesitate, or many do, to divide the police power of the State with the Nation to preserve human life.

The question is, Is human life less sacred than the appetite of the individual which we seek to control through our prohibition legislation? Human life should be taken only after the most sacred and painstaking legal consideration. Crime should be punished by whomsoever committed, but it should be punished only after a fair trial in the courts of the land by a jury of our peers. [Applause.] The Constitution of the United States guarantees life, liberty, and property. Is life less sacred than property, less sacred than liberty, that we should permit to go unpunished mobs here and there and everywhere who take unto themselves the right of life and who punish by lynching some one, perhaps, who may be charged with a heinous crime for which the courts would punish that person if the case was properly presented and tried?

The time has come when we can not call this the land of human dignity and human liberty unless we eradicate this appalling evil. Among the greatest achievements ever accomplished by civilized nations was that accomplished by America when it freed the slaves. It gave to the world the evidence of our desire to place men where they could have an opportunity to make progress as men and not as chattels.

They have made this progress to a greater extent than that of any race that history reveals. To-day the Negroes of America have among them teachers, preachers, doctors, artists, merchants, manufacturers, bankers, and are engaged in every useful occupation which America affords. They have men of education and refinement among them. Their heart beats with as much love for their offspring and for the liberties that they ought to enjoy as the heart of any other man in any other race. Why should we as a great Nation, claiming the leadership in the world's progress, any longer hesitate as to what our attitude shall be with respect to the treatment of this great people?

The antilynching bill pending before the House is not a bill in favor of the protection of the Negro particularly. It is in favor of law and order. [Applause.] It is in favor of law enforcement. It is a bill to provide for the enforcement of the law in sections of the Nation where the political units of the Nation refuse to enforce it themselves.

Will anybody doubt the wisdom or the justice of the law that will punish crime? Does anybody deny that this law pretends to do anything more than that? Will anybody doubt the necessity and importance of giving to the world a declaration such as this law will contain, and that is that America now and henceforth proposes to wipe this stench from the annals of its activities? Will anybody doubt that life should be protected and that mob violence should be eradicated and eliminated? Will anybody say, no matter who he is or how much he may be opposed to any freedom for the Negro, that he is not entitled to the protection of the law in the land where he has been accorded the rights of citizenship? Will anybody say that the nation which commands his life in time of war, drafts him into the service, where he must give everything he has for the freedom and protection of the nation under which he lives, that he is not entitled to the protection of the nation which he is giving his blood to preserve? [Applause.] Will anybody say that mobs may be organized anywhere and that no law exists for their punishment? Will anybody charge or assert that because some man, forsooth, who may be a Negro, is charged with the commission of a crime, that he is not entitled to a trial before a jury of his peers? Why do we organize the courts? Is it for the purpose of protecting only one class, or are they representative of the citizenship of the Nation?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No; not now. I am not in favor of permitting anywhere in this land the organization of any number, no matter how powerful they maye be, to take the law into their own hands.

Many men have been lynched because it has been said that they committed rape. No man who would commit rape should be allowed to live, but he ought to be tried and convicted by the courts, I do not care whether the man be black or white. Such a crime should not go unpunished any longer than it takes to try and convict the man who commits it, but who shall say that the courts are not to be permitted to try the case? Shall some mob somewhere be permitted to take a man charged with crime from his own home, perhaps a man it may be who is innocent, and who frequently is, and lynch him because his skin is black? How many of these lynchings have happened in the case of white men? Not many. That would not last long. These people who presume to arrogate to themselves the right to dictate the law of the land while they are violating the law would not go very far in the communities where they lived if they undertook to lynch white men, and why should they go along very far when they undertake to lynch black men or black women? If the courts are impotent in the sections of the country where these crimes are committed to punish those who commit the crimes, then there ought to be some remedy. What is the remedy? This bill proposes the remedy. I want to see it passed. I want to see the laws of the land enforced as to everyone, the rich and poor, black and white, Jew and Gentile. Everyone in America, no matter what the color of his skin may be, as long as he behaves himself is entitled to the protection of the law. Everyone in America who fails to behave himself and violates the law should be punished.

I am in favor of law enforcement to the letter, not only in connection with this sort of crime but in connection with all crime. I do not believe there is any man in America who should be powerful enough to escape the punishment that is justly his for any crime that he may commit, after a fair trial; but he ought to have the right of a fair trial.

The laws of the land provide that he shall have. If he does not have, then the laws of the land are violated. I know of no crime that anybody can commit against which the law should be more rigidly enforced than this crime of lynching. A man may commit murder and he may do it in a passion, in the heat of the moment, but you would not lynch him for that. You would give him a fair chance to be tried, you would give him a chance to be tried before a jury of his peers. If the evidence was against him, you would convict him, but if it was proven that he was not guilty of the offense of murder he would be either acquitted or perhaps be convicted of a less crime. Nobody can say that a mob, organized deliberately for the taking of life and foiling the law of the land, does what it does in the heat of passion or without deliberation. There can be no question but that the organizers and participants in a mob should be tried, and should be tried instanter—without delay, and a quick and sure punishment should be meted out for the crime they commit; but even then I would not advocate that those people should not be permitted to be tried. I would not let some other mob take the law into his own hands to punish those who were guilty in the first mob. I would insist even then that they should be tried. Every man who commits a crime in America is entitled to a trial. He is entitled to the protection of the law. If the law provides that his life shall be taken because of the crime that he commits, then his life ought to be taken; but it does not provide anywhere in the law, it is not written on any statute book anywhere in America, that any number of men outside of the law, even officials of the Nation, shall be permitted to take the law into their own hands and hang innocent men or even guilty men. So, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill and I am anxious to see it passed, and passed without delay. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MADDEN was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the same privilege which has been accorded other Members who have spoken upon this subject. If I fail to conclude my remarks in the time allotted me, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise them in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the gentleman who has so long and ably represented the first district in Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] in what he said about the desirability of law enforcement. Americans ought to be and in the main are a law-loving, law-respecting people. The law should be supreme, and no man who has spoken on our side of the House and no one over here who shall speak upon this question but will deprecate mob murder. No man can justify or excuse it. I have a few words to say in explanation of why it occurs, but no man will go further than I or than our side will go to prevent lynching in America.

I believe also that we should respect the fundamental law of the land, the Constitution of the United States, and I assert that there is not a judicial officer in the State of Missouri, where lives the author of this bill, from the chief justice of the supreme court down to the humblest justice of the peace, who will say that this measure is warranted by the Constitution.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. How does the gentleman know that? Has there been any adjudication upon the subject?

Mr. TILLMAN. Everybody, even the gentleman from New York, knows that this particular bill has not yet passed, and this fact answers his query as to whether or not there has been a judicial interpretation upon this measure, but if the gentleman respects the Constitution and will listen to me, I think I can convince him that the highest court of the land has said emphatically in so many words that the principles and provisions of this bill are without constitutional warrant.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. The gentleman will admit that this bill has not yet been passed into law.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have just so stated, but a similar question or exactly the same question has been passed on. This bill is based upon the fourteenth amendment, and I will get to the legal proposition later and ask that I be not interrupted for a time.

The partisan majority have selected an unpropitious time to propose a measure which in its scope and purpose is radical, revolutionary, and sinister. Its proposal precipitates sectional bitterness and sectional strife. This, too, in a season of peace on earth and good will to men, and yet in this season of blessed peace you are declaring war against the philosophy of our system of government and are seeking by this bill, utterly without constitutional warrant, to impair, if not destroy, all that is left of local self-government and State sovereignty.

To-day England, our ancient enemy; Japan, our late potential foe; France, always our friend and ally; and our own Government are entering into peace agreements that promise partial relief for generations from war and war burdens. Nations now are stripping for peace, not arming for conflict. To-day Great Britain and Ireland have just settled a seven-century quarrel. Yet in the midst of preparations for world peace the haughty majority in this House, blinded by party passion and obsessed by a pitiless lust for punishing the section which furnishes the small minority in this Chamber, have tossed between your side of the House and ours an apple of discord in the form of House bill No. 13, which you well know will provoke violent controversy, and which we know and you know will aggravate, not cure, the inexcusable crime of lynching.

Let us have peace at home and throughout the world. You will get this iniquity through the House by your usual strong-arm methods, but never through the Senate. We lose patience sometimes with the Senate because of its perennial and copious outpourings of words, because of its archaic rules permitting unlimited debate, but its lack of cloture once saved us from the force bill, and it will save us from this vicious but silly assault on the Constitution.

While I am not enrolled as an accredited adviser of the Republican organization, I doubt if there is any party advantage to you in the tactics involved in attempting this character of legislation. I know this will weaken your party in the South. You have made gains in the South through your protection policy. You will neutralize these gains by the advocacy of this bill. Party history will repeat itself. At the close of the war between the States the radicals were in control in both House and Senate, and party strategy suggested to them punitive legislation toward the prostrate and stricken South. Thaddeus Stevens, forceful, truculent, and cynical, a fanatical hater of the South, but with a keen, logical mind, dominated the Thirty-ninth Congress, and on December 5, 1865, introduced the fourteenth amendment. This amendment was not adopted until after a three-year spirited struggle. Conservative men of the North and West stoutly opposed it. Its clear purpose was to punish the South, to elevate the Negro to equality with the white race, to centralize power in the hands of the Federal Government, and to perpetuate the radical Republican Party in power. At this time your party disfranchised the intelligent southern white man and enfranchised the ignorant southern black man. The adoption of the fourteenth amendment and accompanying legislation all but destroyed the Republican Party. In 1874 they lost the House, all but lost the Senate, and in 1876 lost the Presidency. Tilden and Hendricks were elected, but be it said to their shame the Republicans stole the Presidency after the Democrats had won it.

Under the fourteenth amendment various radical congressional measures similar to the one attempted by H. R. 13 came before the Supreme Court for interpretation, and this tribunal repudiated the radical ideal of the scope of measures similar to the one under discussion, holding that the police power of the States still was in force. The Supreme Court, in a leading case seven years after the adoption of amendment 14, interpreted the amendment in its relation to wrong done by individuals to individuals, exactly the issue before the House to-day, and held in United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542) that this amendment offered no protection from individual invasion of individual rights, and that Congress had no authority to make affirmative laws for its enforcement.

The recent case that reaffirms this doctrine, and which is conclusive as to the unconstitutionality of this measure, should it be made a part of the statutes, was the opinion delivered by Judge Brewer in James v. Bowman (vol. 190, U. S. Supreme Court). This case involved the construction of the fifteenth amendment, and it is the veriest quibble to say that because this decision interpreted legislation under the fifteenth amendment that it does not control in a judicial interpretation touching exactly the same language used in the fourteenth amendment.

Listen to the language of the fourteenth amendment:

> Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

I ventured to interrupt the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] when he was asking for the adoption of the rule making this bill in order, and suggested to him that the word "State" was clearly the subject of the verb "deny," and yet the gentleman from Kansas denied this clear inference and said in effect that it meant no individuals or individual should deny, and so forth. If his contention is correct, then this last clause should read:

> Nor any individual deny to any person within its jurisdiction—
>
> Within the individual's jurisdiction—
> the equal protection under the law.

The pronoun "its" as used in the amendment has the word "State," of course, for its antecedent.

The fifteenth amendment provides that the right to vote shall not be denied or abridged by any State—mark you, by any State, not by any individual or individuals—on account of race, color, and so forth.

The prohibition in the two amendments are identical. Now, Judge Brewer, a Republican and one of the best lawyers that ever graced the Supreme Court bench, flatly says that the clauses in both the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments "relate to action by a State and not by individuals."

Louis XIV said, "I am the State," but no private individual and no group of private individuals in America can arrogate to themselves State sovereignty, or have this dignity conferred upon them by congressional legislation. In this connection I appeal from Louis XIV to the Supreme Court of this Nation. I appeal from the dictum of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] to the judicial opinion of a greater Kansan, Judge Brewer. This sorry measure, if any supreme bench could be found to declare it warranted by our organic law, would mean the changing of the American Republic. The State legislatures and State courts would be reduced to pitiable impotency. Citizens of any and every State would be in the same attitude as were subject citizens of the Roman State under the most tyrannical of the Caesars; they would be under the surveillance of the central government, looking to it for protection in their persons and property and dreading its arbitrary power should they willfully or without intention go contrary to any of its regulations or requirements.

If a law can be enacted and enforced, providing that counties must be penalized in the sum of $10,000, every citizen thereof being innocent of wrongdoing, should a man afterwards lynched be carried through the same, then we will take a backward step of nineteen centuries.

Gen. Lew Wallace, in "Ben Hur," relates an incident, although fiction, it was typical of many actual occurrences in parts of the Roman Empire of that day. Ben Hur was upon the roof of his mother's palace watching the Roman soldiers march by, and inadvertently loosened a tile, which fell upon Valerius Gratus, the new procurator of Jerusalem, knocking him senseless from his horse. For this act Ben Hur, his mother, and sister were arrested. Ben Hur was sentenced to the galleys for life by Roman officers, not in the local courts of the Jews, and a detachment of Roman legionaires went to his mother's palace and nailed on its walls a notice in choice Latin, "This is the property of the Roman Government." In the haughty Roman mind this sententious announcement was thought sufficient, and it was.

Now, you propose a more drastic law than Caesar Augustus sanctioned, worse than any purple-clad Roman Emperor ever promulgated. You propose to invest a centralized Government with the power to visit upon innocent taxpayers of counties guiltless of wrongdoing a flat fine of $10,000, and by Federal decree to proclaim that this huge sum, the money of some one-time sovereign county in some one-time sovereign State, as the property of the Federal Treasury. It may be in a small mountain county of West Virginia or Kentucky or some sparsely settled county of Wyoming or Montana or a desert section of Arizona or Nevada, where a levy of $10,000 would mean to the taxpayers thereof immediate bankruptcy. Woe to the Members from those sections who vote for this infamous measure when these counties are called upon to pay such a penalty. Such Members will certainly be mobbed politically, if not physically lynched. [Applause.]

Gentlemen say this is an important measure. Oh, supremely important; so important that the Judiciary Committee must report the same during the special session. The Attorney General's office must be drafted to overrule Judge Brewer with regard to its constitutionality. The Rules Committee must strong-arm it to a place on the calendar and to a vote. Indeed, it is heavy stuff. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] should have withheld his declaration as to the decadence of the House of Representatives until the advent of this flash of real statesmanship, then he would have felt more hopeful of the House. Soldiers' bonus bills, tariff, revenue, refunding bills, the great supply bills, and a thousand important measures must halt and wait until this most important matter is considered. The great world question of stabilizing exchange, so necessary for our foreign trade, must wait on this great bill. The proud English pound sterling is still 70 cents below its prewar value. The French franc, the Italian lire, the Austrian crown, the German mark, are almost valueless, and the all-important thing to do is to take legislative steps to appoint a commission to cooperate with foreign powers to stabilize world currency, but this world-wide issue must wait until this Republican Congress stabilizes the value of dead rapists. [Applause.]

You have been deflating many things. You have deflated corn from $2 a bushel to almost nothing, but now you propose to inflate dead criminals from almost nothing to $10,000 each. Seriously, why not address yourselves to the task of creating a foreign market for our surplus corn, wheat, copper, live stock, and manufactured products instead of creating an artificial and inflated home market for surplus criminals, white or black?

The bill provides, first, that a mob or riotous assembly is composed of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of unlawfully depriving a person of his life as a punishment for crime. Under this freak measure if four or a less number of people lynch a man they are not affected by this proposed legislation.

Second. That if any State or governmental subdivision fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage such State shall by reason thereof be deemed to have denied to such person "the equal protection of the laws" of the State.

Third. That any State or municipal officer charged with the duty and authority of such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by the mob, or who has such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable effort to prevent such person from being put to death, shall be guilty of a felony.

Fourth. Any State or municipal officer charged with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting any person participating in such mob who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable effort to apprehend and prosecute to final judgment under the laws of such State shall be guilty of a felony, and so forth.

Fifth. Any person who participates in a mob, who takes from the possession of any State or municipal officer any prisoner held by such officer and puts such prisoner to death shall be sent to the penitentiary for life or not less than five years.

Sixth. Any person who participates in a mob, who obstructs or in any way prevents a State or municipal officer in discharging his duty to apprehend, prosecute, protect, or punish any person suspected of or charged with any public offense and puts such person to death shall be guilty of a felony and punished as above stated.

Seventh. That any person who participates in any mob by which a person is put to death shall be guilty of a felony and punished as above stated.

Eighth. That any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or any county into which or through which the victim is carried before he is put to death shall forfeit $10,000 to the family or, if he has no family, to the Government.

Ninth. That the Federal judge in whose court such forfeiture is recovered shall have the power to issue a mandatory order commanding the tax-levying officer of such district or county to levy a tax on the property of all the taxpayers of the entire county for the payment of such forfeiture, and if such State officer refuses said Federal judge shall have the power to commit such officer to jail as for contempt of court.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. REAVIS. Under the terms of this bill as presented to the House it is not essential that the crime be committed in the county.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; if the mob simply passes through the county it must respond in a fixed penalty of $10,000.

Mr. REAVIS. If they pass through there in the nighttime——

Mr. TILLMAN. Without a single citizen of the county ever knowing it, the mere ingress into a county costs that county $10,000. [Applause.]

In the speeches so far made on this bill no proponent of the same has deplored the awful crime which provokes many lynchings. The majority of the Judiciary Committee, in its report recommending the passage of the bill, seem to view with silent unconcern this important feature of the subject. I am opposed to the abominable cult of mob murder. It is barbarous, indefensible. The southern press, southern ministers, public men, judges, and officers condemn the frightful practice and do everything in their power to prevent it, and yet they deplore and attempt to stop the shameful and brutal crimes against women, and while these crimes are not the only ones for which mobs visit upon criminals what they consider wild justice, if that crime can be prevented I think it would be easy to stop lynching altogether.

The attitude of the majority and other partisans of this measure in stressing the enormity of lynchings and in ignoring the crime largely responsible for the same is bearing and will continue to bear its inevitable fruit.

Mr. KEARNS. Is it not true that every State in the Union has a law that gives to anyone who is injured by mob violence a certain indemnity?

Mr. TILLMAN. He has the right of suit, or his estate would have, against the party or parties who commit a tort against his person.

Now, please let me proceed without further interruption.

My good friend, Dr. FESS, the imperial highbrow from Ohio [laughter], spoke for this measure on December 19, as did others, decrying lynching and not condemning assault upon women. The motion to consider the bill in the Committee of the Whole was passed on the 20th, and on the 21st the Washington Post says the following outrage happened in the Capital City of the Nation, the Capital of a proud people, who respect womanhood:

> Thomas Minar, colored, of 2002 Eleventh Street NW., was committed to jail yesterday by Police Judge Hardison and charged with assaulting Mrs. Helen Lowe, of 1107 Eleventh Street NW., Monday.
> According to the story told by Mrs. Lowe, as she entered the hallway to her apartment she was attacked by the Negro, who was lurking in a dark spot, and was choked and struck several times in the face. The alleged assailant of Mrs. Lowe is said to have been frightened off when a door was opened in another apartment in the building.
>
> When the victim of the attack entered court yesterday morning and saw Minar sitting at the trial table, she turned to her husband and trembling, seized his arm and collapsed.

This wretched bill and the conduct of its friends and proponents will multiply assaults upon women and thus increase materially the number of lynchings.

This is a delicate subject to discuss in polite English, and yet I feel that the issues presented by it should be debated with candor and in plain speech. We are so builded that we sometimes lose control of ourselves when our loved ones are made victims of foul assault, and I make this trite observation, not in defense of lynching but in explanation of its prevalence. There is no man in this House, I take it, who would not rather see his daughter, mother, wife or sister dead than to see her made the victim of a brutal assault, and girls and women in many sections of the South where criminal Negroes live are in constant danger of a fate a thousand times worse than death. The feeling of the average man as regards his women's honor was well set forth in stirring verse by Lord McCauley in the Roman ballad "Virginia." Virginia, an innocent schoolgirl, with her small tablets and satchel, not dreaming of shame or harm, went bounding home from school and was seized by Marcus, who wanted her for his master, Appius Claudius, for a shameful purpose. Her father, grim old Virginius, in kindness to her as well as to himself, snatched a knife from a booth, determined to save his daughter:

> From nameless evil that passeth taunt and blow,
> Foul outrage which thou knowest not, which thou shalt never know.
> Then clasp me round the neck once more and give me one more kiss,
> And now my own dear little girl, there is no way but this.
> With that he lifted high the steel and smote her in the side,
> And in her blood she sank to earth, and with one sob she died.

His further purpose in doing this was set forth in the couplet that follows:

> Still let the maiden's beauty swell the father's breast with pride,
> Still let the bridegroom's arms enfold an unpolluted bride.

That feeling in the breast of Virginius impelling him to slay his own daughter dwells in the breast of every red-blooded father in America to-day, and I lose patience with men who dwell at length on the enormity of mob murder, and it can not be defended, and yet offer no word of complaint because of the crime largely responsible for it. The solemn truth is that the most dangerous and deadly animal living is not the man-eating tiger of the jungle, nor the blood-thirsty lion of the desert, nor the hooded cobra of India, not the diamond rattlesnake of the western plains, but the lewd brute, black or white, who would defile or pollute pure girlhood or womanhood. And all through the South to-day a million sweet-faced Virginias with tablet and satchel go singing on their way to school, not knowing what lechery and outrage mean, pure as the lily's spotless leaf, but covertly watched by the vulture eyes of black criminals, ready and eager to assault and to ruin them. [Applause.]

Several years ago Margaret Lear, 14 years old, was coming home from the Shreveport, La., High School. She lived with her mother, a poor widow, on the edge of the city, and her way took her past a Negro saloon. Out of that saloon staggered a Negro named Coleman, "drunken," from the testimony, "on cheap gin." He followed her to a ditch on the edge of a field, assaulted her, and then shot her. When he had gone the child dragged herself along the field to her mother's gate, and there, clutching the pickets, she died. She was the daughter of a widowed mother. She had no father to protect her, "no brother in a sister's quarrel bold," and it seems to me more desirable to protect the life and virtue of the orphan Margaret Lears of the country and more important to vote penalties to keep the wolf from the door of their widowed mothers, after they are murdered by black brutes, than it is to vote penalties to the survivors of lynched victims. The Negro Coleman was saved from a mob by the authorities and was legally tried and executed.

What a handsome insurance policy without premiums required you are presenting to millions of potential criminals. We Democrats voted our soldiers a $10,000 policy, the maximum, but required them to pay for it. You are voting the vicious criminal element of the country a princely nonforfeitable policy, no premiums asked. The soldiers' compensation measures must wait while you vote generous gifts to rapists and murderers, and do you not know that these policies will encourage the vicious to take chances on committing crimes for which lynching is usually meted out, knowing that if they are lynched their families will be well cared for? The insurance companies are well aware of the danger of losing money by suicide and guard against it. Do you not know that under this bill, if it passes, lynching bees will become popular, because they will pay huge dividends? Aunt Malinda will want to cash Rastus in. Alive he is a liability; dead he is a fortune, and she and five confederates will form a battalion of death, and when Rastus visits a hen roost or threatens to commit or does commit some public offense, as mentioned in section 1, he will be lynched by five men in masks in due and ancient form, strictly following the terms set out in this threatened legislation. The bereaved widow of the departed can settle with the mob on easy terms and have money enough left to attract a better-looking husband. [Applause.]

It is said that the Negro Coleman, who murdered Margaret Lear, was drunk on cheap gin, such as was then manufactured by Lee Levy & Co. at 206 Market Street, St. Louis, Mo. One potent influence that prompted many southern Members to vote for prohibition was to remove, if possible, from the Negro intoxicating liquor. It inflamed him and rendered him more liable to commit the crime for which Coleman was hung, and I am afraid that some of the wets from the North are urging this legislation to even up with southern Members who supported prohibition.

The author of No. 13 is a stalwart wet.

The author of this bill represents the twelfth district of Missouri. In his district are the following wards in the city of St. Louis containing Negro citizens:

Ward 5	4,708
Ward 6	7,665
Ward 7	1,742
Ward 16	9,412
Ward 17	13,378
Ward 15 (11 precincts out of 14)	1,211
Ward 23 (13 precincts out of 15)	4,977
Total	43,113

The Negroes have a majority in ward 17 and clearly hold the balance of power in this district, and at the last election Mr. DYER was opposed by a Negro named Robert Owen, the nominee of the Farmer-Labor Party, and Samuel Rosenfeld, a Democrat. The following item published in the Times of October 23, 1920, may be of interest and may be regarded as significant:

Frequent interruptions marked a mass meeting of more than 2,000 Negroes at Louisiana Hall, 911 North Vandeventer Avenue, last night, when Congressman DYER, Republican candidate for reelection, made a plea for the support of his candidacy.

Hecklers from rival camps were on the outskirts of the audience and for a time made it impossible for DYER to go on.

DYER appealed to the voters to vote for him, declaring that every vote cast for Robert Owen, Negro nominee of the Farmer-Labor Party, would mean a vote for Samuel Rosenfeld, whom he branded as a "Texas Democrat."

Not so bad, the inference is, for the Negro Owen to go to Congress, but for heaven's sake do not discredit the State by sending a "Texas Democrat" to Washington. The item proceeds:

Henry Lincoln Johnson, a Negro Republican national committeeman from Georgia, urged the Negroes to vote the straight Republican ticket, saying that during the régime of President Wilson 3,961 Negroes have been lynched, 23 of whom were women, and all of whom were members of the Nation's overseas force.

The majority report mentions only 10 Negro ex-soldiers and only 2,522 Negroes altogether, as having been lynched in the last 30 years. Now, that was an interesting meeting. Louisiana is a warm State, and Louisiana Hall, in St. Louis, the night of October 22, 1920, was a warm hall, as it was crowded with over 2,000 perspiring Negroes, and there was much heckling on the outskirts. So from the Times's description we know that meeting was noisy, turbulent, and Republican, even if it was not as fragrant as a gentle summer zephyr that had just swept over a bed of violets. [Laughter.]

Henry Lincoln Johnson, who is he? He is the Negro appointed recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia by the President, and whose nomination went out of the Senate Chamber on the toe of the Senatorial boot. He further appears in the published hearings on the subject of "Presidential campaign expenses," on page 952. I will put him on the stand and allow him to speak for himself. I quote from the published testimony taken under Senate resolution No. 357:

Senator REED. You must be quite an influential man.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I do not know about that. I am simply a fellow, Senator REED, who has been under considerable tribulation. I have never hesitated to speak out about the matter of the barbarous incineration of human beings in Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. How much money did you receive from the Lowden forces?

Mr. JOHNSON. About $9,000.

And the Georgians say he has since been called the Nine Thousand Dollar Georgia Peach. Now, Henry Lincoln Johnson did not want the St. Louis Negroes to vote for Robert Owen, lest a Texas Democrat might be elected to Congress from the twelfth Missouri district, and lest the House be further handicapped with some new JOHN GARNERS, SAM RAYBURNS, or EUGENE BLACKS, or others of the sterling men composing the exceptionally strong delegation from the Lone Star State. This Negro Johnson, who suffers agony at the lawlessness of southern Democrats, further deposes and testifies under oath in room 653, Federal Building, Chicago, Senator WILLIAM S. KENYON presiding, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. What do you say about the expenditure of money by Clark Grier?

Mr. JOHNSON. He spent it around, down over a little hall over the drug store. He called all the boys in and excluded all the rest of us, saying he had personal conversations to have with them.

Grier handled the Wood corruption fund, and when he lost in the convention, Johnson further says:

Mr. Grier lost his head and just went around like a wild man, hollering to the delegates, and he said to them, "I have given you money and I have paid you money here and you have let Link Johnson come here and carry you astray," and asked for a return of the money. The boys came to me and I said, "Why just keep what you have got." So my friends were left with the money and I was glad to have it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. He paid them before they voted?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes, sir; it was before taking, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. And he is considered a good political manager, is he?

Mr. JOHNSON. We thought he was up to that hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give us any idea of the amount of money the Wood forces spent in Georgia?

Mr. JOHNSON. In a general way, I think they spent about all the way from $65,000 to $80,000.

So Johnson, who got $9,000 of bribe money from the corruption fund of the Republican governor of Illinois, who said the Wood people—Gen. Wood was then head of the Army and is now Governor of the Philippines—spent for corruption purposes among the Negroes of Georgia $65,000 to $80,000, wants lawlessness put down in the South, but only Democratic lawlessness.

Johnson was appointed recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia. And men advocating this unconstitutional measure have voted to deny the ballot to intelligent white women, and yet weep tears enough to turn the water wheel at a grist mill because men who sell their votes and then refuse to stay bought are not given political equality with white men in the South.

A man, white or black, who will sell his vote should be denied the right to vote, and the man who will buy a vote is worse than the man who sells it.

Now, good friends, sweep off a little of the mud on your door steps before you lose so much sleep thinking of the dust that lays at our door.

The Republican Party has never played fair with the Negro and never will. You made him believe that he would be accorded social and political equality with the whites and you knew that to be impossible. You tell him he must have political equality, which means a degree of social equality as well, and yet no Negro has been or will be appointed postmaster in a single city in Ohio, Indiana, or in any northern State, and Negroes have the balance of power in many northern districts. You never place Negroes on your State or county tickets in the North. Moreover, you know this bill is impossible, unwarranted by our organic law, and will never pass the Senate. Your treatment of the Negro, so far as redeeming your many promises to him is concerned, is a full half century of false pretense and deceit.

When the test comes, who is his real friend? The southern man who gives him work and pays him for it, and who votes and pays taxes to educate his children, or the northern Republican who promises him political equality and offices, and desires him to have those things only in the South, where you know that he can not obtain them?

Here is what you are doing for him now in the South: Arkansas is a typical far Southern State, and the Republican Party there in 1920 formed themselves into a lily white party and informed the Negro that there was room for him only on the outside. The Negroes then nominated one of their own race for governor and voted for him.

Virginia is a typical southern border State, and ranks with the best American Commonwealths; and what happened there last fall? They openly repudiated the Negro there. Col. Henry W. Anderson was nominated by the lily white faction, and the Negroes nominated a man of their own color for governor. Listen to plank 6 of the lily white platform. I will say in passing that there were just seven planks enumerated in this southern Republican platform. There are always just seven planks in such platforms—the five Federal office loaves and the two Federal office fishes. Plank 6 reads as follows:

> That the white people of Virginia, constituting over two-thirds of its population, holding 94 per cent of its property, with centuries of discipline and training in self-government, are charged with the solemn duty to all the people of the State to see that the State and local governments of the Commonwealth, are conducted and administered in accordance with these self-evident principles.

And the lily white candidate for governor of Virginia, having the backing of Dr. FESS, chairman of the Republican congressional committee, who fired the opening salvo the other day in behalf of the antilynching bill, boldly uttered the following statement in a public speech at Lynchburg a few days before the election last November:

> The idea of a Negro being elected governor of Virginia is nonsense. If he should be elected, why there are trees in the Capitol Square.

This is a threat that if the Negro were elected he would be lynched, and that Col. Anderson, Dr. FESS's choice for governor of Virginia, advocated and favored such action. I here quote an editorial on the subject taken from the Lynchburg News of November 1, 1921, a paper owned by Senator GLASS:

> BY FRAUD, VIOLENCE, OR BY LAW?
> When Henry W. Anderson suggests, as he did in his address in Lynchburg that there are trees available for Negroes who aspire, with prospect of success to public office in Virginia he virtually says:
>
> "Give the Negro the right to vote as the Republican Party advocates in its platform and upon which platform I plant myself solidly and the promises of which platform I solemnly pledge myself to have carried out, if elected, but if by the exercise of the right of suffrage we give him, the Negro in those 21 counties in which he outnumbers the whites, elects one of his own race to office, why lynch him."
> Mr. Anderson is asking the people of Virginia to undo the work of the constitutional convention of 1902, which disfranchised 140,000 Negroes, and to restore to those 140,000 Negroes the ballot. Asking that, he can not escape the results with a shrug of the shoulder or with pretended indignation. He promises to give those Negroes the ballot. That he protests because Negro election judges having been appointed under the amendment his party forced into the Constitution of the United States at the point of the bayonet does not alter the fact that he solemnly pledges himself to give every Negro, man and woman, not a criminal and not insane, the right to go to the polls and vote for whom he pleases and to elect anyone, white or black, he may have the necessary number of votes to elect to any elective office in Virginia.
> Mr. Anderson urges the election of school trustees by the people. In the same breath he urges that Negroes be given the right to vote for these trustees. In 21 counties in Virginia, including his own county of Dinwiddie, there are more Negroes than whites. What is to prevent those Negro voters from electing black school trustees to choose the teachers for the public schools of those counties? A rope and a tree, says Mr. Anderson.
> There is also fraud at the ballot box. Those desiring to make the choice can vote for Anderson; those desiring to prevent Negro domination by legal methods will vote for the candidate of the party which adopted those methods and saved the State from Negro councilmen, Negro Congressmen, and from the necessity to fight by whatever means were available to prevent the election of even more Negroes to office.

Your trouble is you play fast and loose; you blow hot and cold with your colored brother, and he has about found you out.

We do not deceive the Negro. We encourage him to acquire property, and the majority report shows that the people and the laws of Georgia are so fair to him that he has accumulated there 1,664,368 acres of land and pays taxes on $47,423,499 worth of property. He sometimes leaves the South, but he soon finds the northern Republicans are uncongenial and he comes back home, where the climate and the people are more to his liking.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. ANSORGE] is greatly shocked at the barbarism exhibited at the burning of the Negro, Henry Lowrey, at Nodena, in my State, a year ago. He does not seem in the least disturbed over the fact that the Negro had killed in cold blood in their own home Mr. Craig and his daughter, Mrs. Williamson. While the gentleman from New York holds up my State for this and other murders, which we condemn and strive to prevent, I remind him that there is no State in the Union in which more shocking and revolting crimes are committed than in his own State of New York.

Our Republican brethren from Massachusetts are supporting this measure. They can find no justification, no extenuating circumstances, to excuse or condone the crime of lynching. Nor can we; but Massachusetts statesmen should remember that as late as the seventeenth century on Witch Hill at Salem, 30 miles from cultured Boston, women and girls were burned, mobbed, for so-called witchcraft. I quote a few sentences in the handwriting of Ezekiel Cheever, a part of the official record at the trial of Sarah Osburn, charged with being a witch:

> Q. What evil spirit have you familiarity with?—A. None.
> Q. Have you made no contract with the devil?—A. No; I never saw the devil in my life.

The people who sanctioned witch burning—the Rev. Cotton Mather was a leader in this sport—were not ignorant people. They were Greek and Latin scholars, ministers of the Gospel, and learned men. Deputy Gov. Danforth directed arrests and filled the prisons with persons charged with witchcraft. Of course, these people burned were not witches, but that fact did not deter our Massachusetts friends from burning scores of innocent girls and women suspected of witchcraft. They had a unique method or test at Salem for determining if a suspected person was a witch. They would throw her in a deep pond. If she sank and drowned, she was not a witch. If she did not drown, she was a witch and had to be burned.

Now, the Massachusetts conscience is acutely aroused over the burning of an occasional ravisher in the South. You stopped burning witches without long-distance governmental interference, let us stop southern lynchings without long-distance governmental interference. We can and will do so. It is not a Federal but a local problem.

Speaking of Massachusetts, and I greatly respect the State and her strong delegation in this House, I wish to say that one of the gentlemen from the Bay State [Mr. TINKHAM] is quite active in season and out of season, mainly out of season, in thundering philippics at the South because she limits Negro suffrage. I see the gentleman is here. He is always present when we discuss black men or red liquor. [Laughter.] I find that on page 93 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 21, 1919, the following Members from Massachusetts voted to deny the ballot to women: GREEN, LUCE, WALSH, and TINKHAM. So these gentlemen, particularly the honorable Member last above named, who has so often with dramatic fervor gibbeted the South for denying suffrage to Negroes, by his vote on universal suffrage said in effect that Mrs. Harding, Mrs. Wilson, and Jane Addams are not worthy of the ballot, but that the idle, the criminal, the ignorant Negro men of the South should not be restricted in their free use of the ballot by laws held constitutional.

I find it difficult at times to understand the Massachusetts conscience, or to follow the Bay State reasoning. For example, the Republican Members from Massachusetts want southern counties to pay a flat rate of $10,000 of the only good money in the world for the body of a colored dead rapist, when their forbears never thought of charging a southern planter prior to 1860 more than one-tenth of that sum for a vigorous live field hand.

Our northern friends are always publicly complaining of the South's treatment of the Negro, but not often privately. Whenever a strong and a weak race live side by side, the strong race dominates. It is fate, Kismet, destiny, God. Where the Anglo-Saxon plants his foot, he becomes a conqueror. Ella Wheeler Wilcox catches the true vision in her poem "The White Man":

Wherever the white man's feet have trod,
(Oh! far does the white man stray),
A bold road rifles the virginal sod,
And the forest wakes out of its dream of God,
To yield him the right of way.
For this is the law: By the power of thought,
For worse, or for better, are miracles wrought,

Wherever the white man's pathway leads,
(Far, far has that pathway gone),
The earth is littered with broken creeds,
And always the dark man's tent recedes,
And the white man pushes on.
For this is the way: Be it good or ill,
All things must yield to the stronger will.

Wherever the white man's light is shed,
(Oh! far has that light been thrown),
Though nature has suffered and beauty fled,
Yet the goal of the race has been thrust ahead,
And the might of the race has grown,
For this is the law: Be it cruel or kind,
The universe sways to the power of mind.

It is difficult to find more real philosophy than this anywhere in poetical literature.

You make the Negro think that he should share political honors with the governing white class in the South.

Those best fitted to rule should govern and will govern in the long run. A few times in history, the criminal, the vicious, the depraved have seized the reins of government and made a sorry mess of it. This class ruled for a time during the French Revolution, and the guillotine in the Place de la Concorde worked overtime cutting off the heads of those who wore clean linen and bathed regularly. The reds selected a painted courtesan, as their ideal and proclaimed her as such. The men and women who had made France great and Paris beautiful were under surveillance and suspicion. It was Citizen Jean, Citizen Jacque, citizen everybody. Red terror and red murder reigned supreme. The same thing now obtains in poor afflicted Russia. It is Comrade Lenin, Comrade Trotski, comrade everybody, and the richest portion of the earth, once the mightly Slavic nation, fair, fertile Russia, is a howling, cootie-infested waste. Clothe the illiterate, lewd, vicious criminal black man with a little authority, brief or otherwise, and he will make a mess of things also. A race of tip takers can not become a race of rulers. [Applause.]

Men of the business North, you have more reds to-day than Russia has. A party was formed in New York on December 24, 1921, whose avowed purpose is to overthrow this Government with force. One of the convicts recently pardoned by the President addressed the convention and was loudly cheered, when he said he had no thanks to extend to the President for setting him free. As between the foreign red and our white brother at home, I am for the white American. As between our white brothers of the Pacific coast and the brown alien he distrusts, I am for the white man. You may need the help sooner than you think of the Anglo-Saxon conservative, property loving and property respecting southerner. Some day, sooner than you think, the red terror, speaking in a hundred strange tongues, may seize your factories, your banks, and your stores as they did in Russia. Then racial lines will be stronger with us and with you than party lines.

Many of you, with due respect, are implacable partisans; instead of playing at your favorite outdoor and indoor sport of South baiting, why not stretch forth friendly hands across the border and give us real and substantial help and encouragement in our efforts to stop lynching, which we in all sincerity are attempting to do.

If you are seeking to gain votes by pressing this iniquity, let me suggest to you that no legislative vote is quite so risky as a vote that imposes a tax, and I can imagine no tax so odious and unjust, or so dangerous to him who votes to impose it, as the tax of $10,000 fastened by this bill upon innocent and unoffending counties. The law always looks with disfavor upon penalties, and it is rarely desirable to hold one person for the tort or crime of another.

What will you do with the various $10,000 lump sums you are going to require innocent counties to pay into the Federal Treasury, when the lynched victim has no relatives? Let me suggest that when this fund grows to sufficient proportions, when county after county in what once were imperial commonwealths but reduced by this legislation to impotent, beggarly provinces, have been mulcted in penalties until they aggregate a hundred thousand, then build with this treasure wrung from sweaty and reluctant hands, build with these shameful dollars, a monument out of coal black marble in the image of the Negro Coleman who outraged and murdered little 14-year old Margaret Lear. [Applause.]

We of the South, first of all, are for America, for sovereign statehood, for State rights, and for the flag of Stars and Stripes, with 48 stars, not one big star representing a stateless empire. What are you attempting to do to that flag? By destroying State courts, wiping out State lines, wrecking State sovereignty, as this bill proposes to do, you blot out the 48 stars from the blue field of the flag. You wipe out its white lines. You destroy its red stripes and you are seeking to substitute for the starry banner of the Republic, a black flag of a tyrannical centralized government, a black flag indeed, black as melted midnight, black as the dust on the hinges to the gates of hell, black as the face and heart of the rapist Coleman, who deflowered and killed Margaret Lear. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has used 140 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has used 60 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the argument of my friend on the Judiciary Committee from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN]. He has animadverted upon certain matters that seem to be a little extrinsic. Nevertheless he has presented argument from his own viewpoint, is conscientious in his convictions, and has been fair in his treatment.

Mr. Chairman, under general debate there is now being considered the antilynching bill fathered by my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER]. The bill has been challenged on constitutional grounds. The position thus taken, by opponents of the bill, does not alarm the supporters of it because we are firm in the faith that in the Constitution there reposes ample provision for the protection of the life and the liberty of every citizen, regardless of race or color or of social status. The guaranties for the protection of the citizen are clearly defined in the organic law and particularly in the articles that appertain to life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness.

The right to live comes first, because to live is the greatest of all human rights, and next to the right to live comes liberty—tantamount, almost paramount to life itself; for what is life worth, unless with it goes liberty and freedom?

The Constitution, according to the expressions of its preamble, was intended to insure union, justice, domestic tranquillity, the common defense, the general welfare, and last, but not least, the blessings of liberty.

The terms and provisions of this Constitution, letter and spirit, amply supporting the measure before us, are to be found in the fifth, sixth, thirteenth, and fourteenth amendments thereto.

The demand, based upon facts which can not be successfully controverted, being pressed upon us from almost every quarter by patriotic people for the correction of the vice known as lynching, that is not only injuring the Nation's reputation at home and abroad, but which constitutes a menace to our modern civilization, is urgently insistent, can not be ignored, and calls for the immediate exertion of the force of Federal power.

The fifth amendment says that—no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury. Nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

It is said that this provision constitutes a prohibition against Federal power only.

By the sixth amendment it is declared that—in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury * * * to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

By the thirteenth amendment—the final decree of Civil War—it was ordained that—neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction.

By the fourteenth amendment—an award also due to the arbitrament of war—we are told that—all persons born and naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside—

And, furthermore, that—no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States—

And then comes the great declaration, the sovereign command, saying—

nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person the equal protection of the law.

By the fifth paragraph of the fourteenth amendment Congress is empowered to carry its terms into execution by appropriate legislation.

I have thus read in your hearing the provisions of the American Constitution that undertake to safeguard life and liberty and freedom, neither of which can be impaired or taken away or jeopardized except and unless by due process. But what is due process? Primarily process means notice and due hearing. Where crime is charged there should be presentment or indictment by a grand jury and trial by a petit jury; the accused should be confronted by the witnesses, entitled to compulsory attendance of his own witnesses, and defended by counsel. These rights of the citizen come within the spirit and the letter of the Bill of Rights of the American Constitution, and in principle are the same as were extorted from the barons at the Battle of Runnymeade, when John was the king. It must be remembered that these primary, inalienable rights of man existed prior to the Constitution and are primordial and can not be waived.

Thus briefly have I reviewed the organic law, provided at the expense of blood and suffering, in order that men might be free. Notwithstanding these plain, elemental provisions of the Constitution, written in the light of reason by men who loved liberty and who wanted to live in the pure air of freedom, there are those who have some doubt as to the constitutionality of Mr. DYER'S bill, they who fear the consequences if the measure be upheld by the courts; as for me, I confidently believe that the bill comes well within constitutional limitations, and that if the measure shall become a law, then that law will prove not only a great blessing but shall stand as a great precedent, a rock, for refuge of those whose lives and liberties are endangered.

In the lynching during the past 30 years of more than 3,000 men and women there were, undoubtedly, several hundred thousand participants. Of this vast number of lawbreakers we may be safe in saying that not one-tenth of 1 per cent were ever indicted, much less convicted, for their crimes. In fact indictments for these destructions of human life—in many instances accomplished by the most atrocious methods, characterized by torture and extreme cruelty—seldom were made, and convictions under the very few indictments that were returned were practically nil.

Mr. Chairman, we have been told that the measure contravenes the Fenedal Constitution in this, that the attempted enforcement of it would constitute an invasion of the rights of the several States under that Constitution; that Congress was powerless to act, and that legislators, with folded hands, must sit here, Congress after Congress and session after session, with full knowledge of the constantly recurring, and, in certain sections, ominously increasing criminal destruction, by the foulest methods, of human life, and do nothing to remedy the mischief that was being done. With that group of publicists, who assert that the General Government is impotent in the premises, I can not agree, and from their opinion I must respectfully dissent.

As for me, I know that in not a few of the States of the Union—States in which lynching is practiced as a pastime and enjoyed after the fashion of the Romans, who found pleasure in feeding their victims alive to ferocious animals—the States, in practical effect, have abdicated their prerogative of punishing the lyncher who offends not only against the laws of God and of the State but against the sovereignty of the United States as well. The failure of the State to protect the life of the victim, where the latter is in custodia legis, is due to lack of a sufficient force of vigilant and zealous officers necessary to guard him from violence at the hands of the mob; and in the case where the victim had not been taken into official custody, then the unlawful doing away with him was entirely due to the criminal conduct of certain denizens of the county where the lynching took place.

Where lynching has taken place, the loss of the person's life has been due to the failure of the State to provide protection. Lack of knowledge on the part of the executive and those under him was not a factor to be considered. The person lynched was within the State; the State owed that person complete police protection.

In view of the fact that lynchings are of almost daily occurrence—28 cases of such having occurred since the standing committee reported this bill to the House, as I have been informed—does it not seem perfectly clear that the States are depriving men of life and liberty without due process of law? And since it is obvious that the vastly preponderating majority of the victims are Negroes, does it not seem also true that the States are denying to this class of our citizens the equal protection of the law?

The colored people in my district are well-behaved. They were patriotic and loyal during the Great War. Their boys fought with courage and came home proud of their flag.

Their women worked faithfully for the Red Cross and other activities. Their men, too old for military service, toiled in mine, field, and on railroad, and bought the Liberty bonds. Therefore, we find no complaint against the colored people and no cause for their mistreatment. These are entitled to the equal protection of the law.

According to the opinion of competent authorities, the bill can rest upon the fifth amendment alone, but the supporters of the measure find in the fourteenth amendment a sufficient reservoir of power to enable Congress to act. The command there given is that no person shall be deprived of life without due process of law. Can it be said that lynching is due process? The mandate is the voice of Federal power, and should be enforced by Federal authority. The great declaration is that a person shall not be deprived of his life except by the processes of the courts. But yet these persons are being deprived of their lives, and there are some who argue that in such case there is no deprivation. To me it is plain that if the States are not depriving of life then the Federal Government is depriving of life, and hence the necessity of this legislation. They—the opponents of the bill—take refuge under the phrase, "Nor shall any State deprive," found in the fourteenth amendment, which reads, in part, thus:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person the equal protection of the law.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Under the language of the Constitution that the gentleman has just read, whereby no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, how does he justify the provision in here fixing a forfeiture of $10,000 for a lynching that occurs in a county, though the citizenship of that county knows nothing about it?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. For the very reason that any measure that we pass here should carry in it a penalty to secure the punctual enforcement of that law.

Mr. CLOUSE. Would that apply to the miners down in his own State of West Virginia?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Absolutely. The bill is intended to apply to every State in the Union, to every man, whether he be black or white or red or yellow, in this country. This is not a sectional law. This law is intended to safeguard or enforce the guaranties of the Constitution. I want to know whether or not these provisions that men fought and bled and died for in the Revolution amount to anything; whether Members of Congress are going to come here and sit supinely by when these things go on day after day, week after week, and month after month, and year after year, and not raise their hands to provide a remedy for them. [Applause.]

Mr. CLOUSE. One additional question. Of course, we all agree upon the question that lynching is an intolerable thing, but when I took an oath in this House to support the Constitution the gentleman, or some other gentleman, must show me some constitutional reason for supporting this bill, or else I shall vote against it.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I can not yield further, but answering the gentleman's question I will say that if you do not make anything out of these provisions of the Constitution which guarantee life, liberty, and property, and that these inalienable rights can not be taken without due process of law, then, of course, I would be unable to afford the gentleman any light on the subject.

When the man or the woman is lynched, we are told that the deprivation of life is not to be laid at the door of the State. That although the majority of the victims were colored men and colored women, yet that there were no denial of the equal protection of the law. Such argument I confidently believe to be unsound. At least one of the sources of the power of Congress to legislate on the subject is to be found in the fifth amendment. If the provision therein contained means nothing, then is the entire Constitution a farce, a mere snare, and a delusion.

The mob with bloodhounds drives out of the swamp and the thicket and captures the man against whom suspicion rests, and the mob takes him away and either burns him alive at the stake or causes him to dangle from the limb of a tree; and then, as if to make his death the more horrible, riddles his body with leaden balls; and for this crime, we are told, there can be no remedy except that we wait on the pleasure of the State and see what it will do. We have waited, only to observe for 30 years that instead of growing better the condition in certain sections of our country has been steadily growing worse, during which time we have been greatly concerned about affairs in other lands—Cuba, the Kongo, Armenia, Ireland, the Jews in Russia—all these seem to have agitated the minds of many people in America in far greater degree than the atrocities here at home. When foreigners at New Orleans were mobbed, the Government hurriedly made compensatory reparation to the families of the victims; but in the case of the citizen who has been lynched, his family is treated with perfectly cold indifference.

By a recent amendment the manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors was forbidden. Bills carrying this constitutional provision into execution were passed in both branches of Congress by largely preponderating majorities, and the legislators seemed not to worry over the term "intoxicating liquors," although the bill arbitrarily defined "intoxicating liquors," as liquors containing "one-half of 1 per cent or more." Gentlemen hurried to the Chamber of the House to unite their voice in the mighty chorus, and following the leadership of the intrepid champion of prohibition—the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]—all, or practically all, voting "aye," the Member who is now addressing you being one—as gayly as ever a pack of foxhounds gave voice and followed "bugle," their gallant leader.

But this bill to prevent lynching seems to be a coat of another color. Members, especially from certain communities, having great reverence for the Constitution, express fear and doubt and misgiving concerning the constitutionality of the bill. We, so they say, are about to do violence to this great bulwark of human liberty.

Gentlemen contend that the document that was framed to protect liberty and life will be violated if we undertake to rest upon it a law which will forbid men being burned and roasted alive and hanged and riddled by leaden balls until their bodies fall apart. That the intervention of Congress would constitute an invasion of the States' rights, would give increased incentive to those who practice these brutal and inhuman methods, and would thereby provoke them to an increase of the volume of such lynchings and murders, outrages and crimes, directed against the Constitution and organized society, in this "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

As to the constitutionality of the bill, we are fortified with the opinion of ex-Attorney General Moody, later an associate justice of the Supreme Court; by the opinion of the learned Attorney General, Mr. Daugherty; and that of his splendid assistant, Judge Guy D. Goff; also by the judgment of a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, the lawyers' committee of the House.

The plain language of the Constitution speaks for itself. I have shown you already that by the fifth and by the fourteenth amendments provision is amply made that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." May I ask, do these provisions need any explanation, construction, or interpretation? To insist that the intention of the framers is mooted would be about as illogical as to assert that the taking of a man by a mob and hanging him by the neck or by burning him at a stake until he were dead was due process of law.

Lynchings, while vastly more numerous in the Southern States, are not confined to that region, and although in the large majority of cases originating in that section, the colored man has been the victim, yet the white man has not been exempt. It is even true that women of both colors have suffered the same fate. Of a list of reported lynchings from 1889 to 1918, it is shown that 3,224 were killed by mobs; of those, 702 were white persons and 2,522 were negroes, hanged, shot, or burned; of the total, 11 were white and 50 colored women. Just how many of these were guilty, we do not know. Of the number lynched, Georgia seems to have drawn the grand prize, having 386 to her credit. Mississippi was next in line with 373 as her quota, and Texas followed with the very good showing of 335.

Bear in mind that these figures do not cover the time since 1918, a period of nearly three years. Conditions became so terrible in Georgia as that on April 22, 1921, her then governor, Hon. Hugh M. Dorsey, a worthy man and a good officer, since relegated to private life, having called a conference of the leading citizens of that State, laid before them a report detailing a statement of facts in the case of over a hundred negroes that within two years next prior had been lynched, held in peonage, driven out of the State by organized lawlessness, or subjected to cruelty.

Had I the time I would take up and set forth the facts in these cases one by one in order that every Member of the House and every reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD might be informed as to conditions in that State—Georgia—but my time being limited I shall use certain cases from each of the four classifications merely to illustrate the character of such crimes against men and women in Georgia. Gov. Dorsey says that the 135 examples he has grouped are not all; that he has made no attempt to collect every case; that "if such an effort were made I—he—believe the number could be multiplied." The governor further says that "in some counties the Negro is being driven out as though he were a wild beast." In other counties that he is being held as a slave. In other counties "no Negroes remain," and furthermore, that "in only two of the 135 cases cited is the 'usual crime' against white women involved."

Dorsey's investigation concerning one case revealed that in July, 1919, two white men, drunk, went in the nighttime to the section of the town occupied by colored people; that an elderly colored man got his gun and went into the streets to protect the women of his race; that in the shooting that followed one of the white men was killed; the Negro was taken by a mob and lynched. That in October, 1919, a Negro who was a preacher and teacher had a dispute with a farmer about wages; that the farmer attacked the Negro with an ax; that the Negro shot the farmer with bird shot; that the Negro was taken from the sheriff and lynched; that the man who was shot is alive.

That a Negro, being suspected of murdering a white woman, was arrested and placed in jail, taken therefrom, and "in the midst of a mob of 3,000 was burned to death by a slow fire, the torture being prolonged as much as possible."

The examples I have cited merely illustrate cases of lynching in Georgia, of which she had, down to and including the year 1918, 368 to her credit. For 1919 her record shows that of the victims taken from officers and jails she again headed the list, five of her victims being burned at the stake.

Dorsey—whose term has since expired and who failed of election to the Senate—exposed a condition of peonage in Georgia that was truly revolting and which also constituted an indictment of the last national administration for failure to enforce the laws against peonage. In a public statement recently made the present Attorney General indicated that he had ordered that peonage violators be indicted and prosecuted.

When Roosevelt was the President a lot of peonage violators were sent to the penitentiary, but during Mr. Wilson's administration these traffickers in human labor again grew bold and were allowed to carry on their human slavery unmolested and unafraid.

Gov. Dorsey shows that the worst forms of peonage have existed in Georgia. When Negroes "escaped" they were arrested and brought back, even from other States, and "sold" from one man to another. That Negroes were "cheated and swindled," "threatened," and "struck in the face" and "severely whipped" and "put to work," "guarded," and "locked up" every night. I also find the following concerning two Negroes who had "run away." Gov. Dorsey says:

> They were caught, brought back, and whipped. The other Negro begged to be killed. The white owner shot him.

A weight was put about him and he was sunk in a pond. Under the heading "The Negro driven out by organized lawlessness," the governor of Georgia reveals a system of practices that for meanness and cruelty is almost beyond human imagination and beggars description.

Sometimes "when a Negro becomes too prosperous" he receives threatening letters directing him to leave the community. He finds a skull and cross bones chalked on his porch. The Ku Klux, or those pretending to be the Ku Klux, give him attention. His lodge hall is burned. Gov. Dorsey, in describing one case, says—I quote his precise language:

> January, 1920, the Negroes living in one district of this county were threatened. Their churches, schoolhouses, and homes were burned. Several families were driven out of the community.

Dorsey then takes up the subject of individual acts of cruelty toward the Negro. I give you the following as a mere illustration of other cases quite as bad:

> COUNTY NO. 26.
> 6. The sheriff of this county with two other men were in an automobile on the road to the county seat. They were drinking. The sheriff asked a Negro in the road to get him a drink of water. The Negro answered that he was not at his own home, but that he supposed there would be no objection to getting him a drink of water.
> The sheriff left the car and struck the Negro twice with a pistol. The man brought the water. The sheriff made him get in the car, carried him 300 yards, and made him leave the car and go into the woods, where he beat him over the head with a pistol and stick. The bleeding Negro was forced into the car again and made to lie down.

He was carried 10 miles, the sheriff kicking him in the body and head. One eye was virtually knocked out. There the sheriff made him get out. He was beaten again on his naked body. The sheriff stopped to cut another stick, when one of his companions advised the Negro to run if he wished to live. This he did, hiding in the woods until later a passer-by carried him into town. The sheriff was indicted for assault with intent to murder. The latter was acquitted.

The Negro beaten has the reputation of being a peaceable, law-abiding, hard-working man. He was threatened with death if he testified against the sheriff.

Is it any wonder that the colored man sells his little farm and his stock and moves away, at the same time wondering how the Constitution does protect him in respect to liberty and property? Under these circumstances does it not appear to gentlemen that in the State of Georgia citizens of the United States domiciled in that State are actually being deprived of their life and liberty and property without due process?

I have faith that the Attorney General will see to it that the laws against peonage are duly enforced and that those engaged in this evil practice will be brought to the bar of public justice and required to answer for their crimes.

That Congress should have so long failed to enact a law against lynching is a shame to our civilization, but it were better that it should act late than never.

Let us pass the bill and thereby arm the Department of Justice with a weapon that can be used to vindicate the rights of all citizens, irrespective of their color, race, or condition, within the protecting aegis of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I notice in to-day's paper that one of the two States which last year passed antilynching laws was West Virginia. Is the gentleman afraid to intrust to the courts of his own State the prosecution of people who may be guilty of the infraction of that law?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I will say to the gentleman, not at all. We look upon these remedies as concurrent. In the town where I live, last spring we had a case of an assault made upon one of our girls. The court was in session. Within 24 hours the perpetrator of that crime had been indicted, tried, convicted, and placed under sentence of death. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. But does the gentleman think that this law against lynching would be enforced more effectively in a Federal court in West Virginia than it would in the State courts of West Virginia under an identical law?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Well, I could not say as to that. Of course, I was for the antilynching bill before West Virginia passed that statute. The law ought to be general. Some of the States do not have such a law. The State of South Carolina has one, and whatever the reason has been, since that law has been on the statute books there has been a constant diminution of lynching in that State. I do not therefore see any reason why, if the law proves effective in the State of South Carolina, it should not likewise prove efficacious in the State of West Virginia, and should all the States pass laws similar to the ones existing in South Carolina and West Virginia, then, perhaps, the necessity of Federal action would be obviated, would not be necessary.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that the Federal Constitution granted to every citizen the right to life, liberty, and property.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Now is there anything left under the sun for the States to guarantee if this bill were enacted? Is there anything else that the Federal Government would not apply to?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I can not yield further. It seems to me if there be any function to be performed by the Federal Government, it is to safeguard the lives of its citizens, who stand in a dual capacity, being citizens of the State and also of the Federal Government. It is the duty of the Federal Government to safeguard the life of that citizen at home as well as on the high seas or in a foreign country, and to vindicate his right whenever and wherever he is, and to challenge an assault upon it whether it be in a State in the North or in a State in the South. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Reference has been made to antilynching laws passed in West Virginia and in South Carolina. In the State of Ohio a similar statute has existed since 1896. I had the pleasure of serving eight years as public prosecutor under that law, and I am glad that I can state that in my experience it has had a deterrent effect. But the effect of the law in deterring goes further. If the person is taken from one county to an adjoining county and lynched, that county incurs a penalty. The law has been in operation since 1896, and has twice gone to the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio and twice has been declared to be constitutional.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I thank the gentleman. Sometimes the innocent must suffer with the guilty. A man convicted of crime has to go to the penitentiary and necessarily he brings on his family disgrace and sorrow and suffering.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. My time has been shot up pretty badly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not the gentleman recognize the vast difference between the right of a State and the right of the Federal Government to impose such penalties as were mentioned and as were imposed by the State of Ohio?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Let me answer the question as best I can. The States by inaction may deprive a man of his life or liberty or property. A State may sit supinely by, looking on and never raising its hand in protest.

But my argument is that the State may be in default either through its legislative, executive, or judicial department; either one, with all the attributes of State sovereignty, may be at fault; but when the State government does not act and a man is lynched, then the State government is in default beyond question. Lynchings usually occur where sheriffs and jailers and constables fail in the performance of their public duties.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does not the gentleman recognize that the imposition of a penalty on a county is an extreme exercise of the police power vested in a State, and not vested in the Federal Government?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. That would depend or hinge on the constitutionality of the bill. If the basic facts are here, we have a warrant in the Constitution for congressional exertion. Having moved in that direction, we have a right to go a little further and do whatever may be necessary to see that that law becomes efficacious, just as in the case of the Volstead law—the prohibition law. We said here by our vote that any liquid which contained in excess of one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol would be regarded as alcoholic or intoxicating liquor. As a matter of fact, we know that that is not strictly true, but the Supreme Court upheld the act, saying that, having a constitutional warrant for our action, we may do whatever may be necessary within the bounds of reason to carry the amendment into execution. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, public opinion is behind this legislation. The ablest constitutional lawyers say that it is valid. The greatest newspapers in the land are supporting it.

Here is an editorial from the Herald-Dispatch of Huntington, W. Va., under date of December 24, 1921, by the pen of Mr. Boyd Jarrell, one of the brightest newspaper writers in the country:

[From the Huntington (W. Va.) Herald-Dispatch, Dec. 24.]

LYNCHING AS A STATE RIGHT.

One of the queerest debates yet heard in the House of Representatives pertained to the antilynching bill pending in that body. Southern Congressmen in general accepted the theory and supported it. These things developed while the Dyer bill was the order of business early in the present week.

This is not a partisan or sectional measure in any sense, except as its opponents choose to make it so. Lynchings have occurred in many States North and South. As Representative SIMEON D. FESS, of Ohio, remarked in arguing for the bill, "One of the most indescribable lynchings that ever took place in this country occurred in my own State of Ohio," the victim being a man who had boasted of his activity in the cause of prohibition.

This measure seeks to hold States and counties to some responsibility for the acts of "mobs and riotous assemblages." It would subject to a fine of as much as $5,000 or to imprisonment for as much as five years any sheriff or other officer failing to do his utmost to protect a prisoner from a mob. It would subject a county where a lynching occurred to a fine of $10,000, payable to the Federal Treasury. It has been carefully drawn and highly recommended as a promising means of dealing with a national disgrace by bringing mob murder within the province of the Federal courts.

Though there seems no reason why right-minded persons should object to the plan, southern Democrats in the House have fought it bitterly from the first. Their floor leader, Representative FINIS GARRETT, of Tennessee, says it "invades State rights." If it does, so does the Volstead law and so do other Federal statutes. Protection to human life and ending of a national humiliation are more important than quibbling over the ancient question of State rights. Mr. GARRETT also denounces the antilynching bill as unconstitutional and various other things. He even argues, rather paradoxically, that it would increase the number of lynchings rather than decrease it, since people would look upon lawful punishment of offenders as less certain and severe—that is, would regard the antilynching law as effective in its purpose.

In their hopeless minority Democratic Congressmen resorted to filibuster tactics to prevent Republican Members from bringing the measure to vote before the holiday recess. "For more than three hours, during which no business whatever was transacted, the Democrats prevented the House from going into a Committee of the Whole to take up the bill," says one account published in a Democratic organ. Rather than permit the measure to be brought to vote on its merits, Democratic Members absented themselves, prevented a quorum, and blocked national business. "At 2.50 o'clock," according to the same unprejudiced account, "the House having been in session since noon, a roll call disclosed that there were 174 Republicans present and only 7 Democrats."

The Dyer bill ought to become law and doubtless will eventually. Some such businesslike treatment of the subject has been needed altogether too long. The resistance offered to this very reputable measure is not creditable to its authors and can have no other effect than to disgrace the partisans of mob violence—as sensible Democrats and southerners doubtless realize.

Under the privilege given me of extending my remarks I will print in the RECORD an editorial (issue of Dec. 20, 1921) from the Spartanburg (S. C.) Herald.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Spartanburg (S. C.) Herald, Dec. 20, 1921.]

FEDERAL LAW AGAINST.

There is, of course, no defense for lynching and any measure, county, State, or National, that will reduce the number of lynchings deserves support from all right thinking people. Congress is just now considering Federal legislation, and the further the consideration goes the more difficult the problem becomes. Mob violence is like fire, its prevention is the thing. And the Federal authorities are now endowed more with ability to tell where this sort of trouble is to break out than county or State authorities. It is crime and quick vengeance and usually in remote sections of the country.

The call for Federal legislation in this business is, of course, brought on by failure of State authorities to act. And the hands of the State authorities are often tied by the refusal of county authorities to assume their part of the responsibility in such cases. Local influence shields the lynchers and there the matter ends. This is the disgrace of the thing. And it silences nearly every argument that may be very honestly and very properly advanced against this interference by the Federal authority with the rights of the States.

The passage of a Federal law does not stop the crime it is aimed at. It simply registers public sentiment. Public sentiment is against lynching and will support the Government in anything necessary to make the business more hazardous for those who take part in that sort of crime.

Also one from the Tyler (Tex.) Times, of December 1, 1921, as follows:

PAYING FOR LYNCHING.

The Volstead-Dyer antilynching bill now pending in Congress contains a clause providing that a county in which a lynching occurs shall forfeit the sum of $10,000 to the heirs of the victim.

In South Carolina a few days ago, in a case in which the widow of a Negro who had been lynched was suing the county for damages, the jury returned a verdict awarding her the sum of $2,000. The verdict was returned under the authority of the constitution of South Carolina, which makes the county in which a lynching occurs liable in exemplary damages to the legal representatives of this victim in a sum not less than $2,000.

So it appears that this idea of counties being liable for damages to the relatives of lynching victims is not only not original with the northern authors of the bill before Congress, but that it was borrowed from the constitution of a Southern State which contains a heavy Negro population.

It is true that the heirs of mob victims in South Carolina do not seem to have invoked the law of the State in seeking damages, but a precedent has now been set, and in the future we may expect to see less lynching in that State. Every county has been put on guard—that it must prevent such occurrences or pay for them.

The Federal bill making the forfeiture $10,000 by the counties is more drastic than the South Carolina law, and it is the real "teeth" in the proposed antimob law. It would place the power of the United States Government behind the heirs of mob victims in collecting the indemnity from the county, and the incentive to prevent mob action would be even stronger than where the county is merely made liable in a civil court for damages.

But whether it be a State court or a Federal court that enforces this indemnity provision, the reason for it is the same. When counties have their tax burdens directly increased by reason of lawless outbreaks by mobs, the taxpayers and the better element of citizens generally will show less indifference to lynching and will help to suppress it.—Houston Post.

Hon. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In connection with the discussion of the antilynching bill, it occurred to me that you would be interested in seeing these statistics on lynching which have been compiled in our department of records and research.

Yours, truly,
R. R. MOTON, Principal.

NUMBER OF LYNCHING FOR SIX YEARS.

(Compiled by Monroe N. Work, Department of Records and Research, Tuskegee Institute, Ala.)

The total number of lynchings for the past six years and the number charged to rape are as follows:

1915.

Total number, 54; number charged with rape, 11; 10 Negroes and 1 white. That year there were 3 women lynched.

1916.

Total number, 54; number charged with rape, 14; all Negroes. Included in this record are 3 women.

1917.

Total number, 38; number charged with rape, 12; 11 Negroes and 1 white. Included in this record is 1 woman.

1918.

Total number, 64; number charged with rape, 16; all Negroes. Included in this record are 5 women.

1919.

Total number, 83; number charged with rape, 19; all Negroes. Included in this record is 1 woman.

1920.

Total number, 61; number charged with rape, 18; all Negroes. Included in this record is 1 woman.

FOUR-FIFTHS OF LYNCHINGS FOR CRIMES OTHER THAN RAPE.

(Compiled by Monroe N. Work, Department of Records and Research, Tuskegee Institute, Alabama.)

In the 35 years 1885–1920, there were 810 persons—59 whites and 751 Negroes—put to death by mobs under the charge of rape or attempted rape. This is one-fifth, or 20 per cent, of the total number of persons—4,033—who were lynched during that period. This refutes the charge that the majority of lynchings are for the crime of rape.

JANUARY 2, 1922.

Mr. R. R. MOTON,
Tuskegee Institute, Ala.

MY DEAR SIR: I thank you for your two letters inclosing further statistics relative to the antilynching bill. These will be useful to me in connection with debate on the measure when it comes up in the House.

With best wishes for the new year,
Very truly, yours,
——— ———.

Also a letter dated January 8, 1921, received by me from Mr. Moorfield Storey, one of the very foremost authorities on the Constitution in this country.

The letter reads as follows:

BOSTON, January 6, 1922.

Hon. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I take pleasure in sending you my opinion upon the antilynching bill in response to a request that I do so.

There are in the United States some 12,000,000 of colored people, who by the terms of the fourteenth amendment are citizens of the United States and of the State in which they reside. The United States demands of them military service and taxes them directly, without the interposition of the State government. They are potential soldiers and actual taxpayers, upon whom rest the most serious burdens of citizenship, who contribute to the national strength, and who owe allegiance to the Government of the United States. There is a general principle that a government owes protection to those who owe it allegiance.

For a great many years in large parts of the country the lives and property of these citizens have been denied protection by any government. They have, on suspicion of crime, been seized and murdered by mobs without an opportunity to be heard before any court of justice, without any presentment of a grand jury, in violation of every right secured by the fifth and sixth amendments to the Constitution, and often with the most cruel tortures.

The men who do this do it openly, in broad daylight, in the presence of their fellow citizens, and seem not to suffer in popular estimation. The officers of the States in which these things occur as a rule make no attempt to punish the murderers. The governors do not interfere to protect, officials do not prosecute, juries do not convict, and about the facts there is no dispute. It is clear that the people of the States in which these tragedies occur approve them, or at least do not disapprove them, so far as to make any attempt to prevent the repetition of such crimes or to punish the perpetrators. The official representatives of the States wherever found by their silence seem to approve, and by their nonaction protect the men who are guilty of crimes which disgrace the name of the United States. The equal protection of the law and the right to a trial by jury may be denied, as well by inaction and the refusal or neglect to enforce the law as by affirmative action, and the State certainly acts when its officers, with the silent approval of the whole people, refuse to its citizens the protection which the Constitution and laws give them.

It is impossible that these conditions should continue, and the years which have passed without any attempt to remedy the evil make it clear that it is idle to hope for efficient action on the part of the States where these horrors occur. In the long run such wrongs will be followed by the most disastrous consequences, and in my judgment the inaction of the States makes action by the United State imperative. The Constitution in the fifth amendment expressly provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and this applies to everyone within the jurisdiction of the United States. In my judgment it is the clear duty of Congress to pass whatever laws are necessary to protect the citizens of the United States against lynching and to secure for them the rights to life, liberty, and property which in the Declaration of Independence are held to be inalienable. If a citizen of a foreign state were to attack a citizen of the United States and treat him as colored men are treated by their fellow citizens, we should hold the government of the country to which these ruffians belonged responsible for the injuries. It seems absurd to suppose that the Government of the United States can not protect its citizens against attacks made by men who are subject to its jurisdiction and its control.

I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that the proposed legislation against lynching is imperatively required and is authorized by the Constitution of the United States.

Yours, truly,
MOORFIELD STOREY.

My files are full of letters, editorials, and opinions all supporting the bill, but I shall not further encumber the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am suffering from a cold, and my voice is not in good condition. If you will give me your attention for a little while, I shall try to hold it after that.

The late Republican national convention at Chicago desired above all things to break up what is called the "solid South" and to win and secure, if possible, for the Republicans the vote of the colored people. Accordingly the makers of the platform inserted the following:

> We urge Congress to consider the most effective means to end lynching in this country, which continues to be a terrible blot on our American civilization.

What Congress could do "to end lynching" never troubled the politicians at Chicago. It was enough for them, for the time being, to persuade the colored voters of the South to believe that a Republican Congress and a Republican President, if elected, would "consider the most effective means to end lynching in this country."

The author of this bill, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], in his speech in this House January 4, attempted to make this bill a party issue and a Republican measure. He said:

> In the last general election the people expressed their wishes in this regard also. They indorsed the action of the Republican Party at its last national convention, when in its platform it said:
> "We urge Congress to consider the most effective means to end lynching in this country, which continues to be a terrible blot on our American civilization."

At the outset I want my Republican colleagues in the House to remember that the national Republican platform nowhere advocated a Federal antilynching bill. The platform never contemplated that a Republican Congress would attempt to pass such legislation as is found in this bill. The politicians at Chicago had more political tact than to advocate legislation in violation of the Constitution or an antilynching bill like this that would endanger the success of the Republican Party in the presidential campaign.

After his election, to which several Southern States contributed, President Harding found himself confronted by this declaration in his party platform, and therefore in his first message to Congress, April 12 last, he said:

> Somewhat related to the foregoing human problems is the race question. Congress ought to wipe the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly, representative democracy. We face the fact that many millions of people of African descent are numbered among our population, and that in a number of States they constitute a very large proportion of the total population. It is unnecessary to recount the difficulties incident to this condition, nor to emphasize the fact that it is a condition which can not be removed. There has been suggestion, however, that some of the difficulties might be ameliorated by a humane and enlightened consideration of it, a study of its many aspects, and an effort to formulate, if not a policy, at least a national attitude of mind calculated to bring about the most satisfactory possible adjustment of relations between the races, and of each race to the national life. One proposal is the creation of a commission embracing representatives of both races, to study and report on the entire subject. The proposal has real merit. I am convinced that in mutual tolerance, understanding, charity, recognition of the interdependence of the races, and the maintenance of the rights of citizenship lies the road to righteous adjustment.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] says the Republicans in this Congress should make his bill a party question and vote for it because he says the President in his first message to Congress advocated it, and that we as Republicans should stand by the President.

I want my Republican associates in this House to bear in mind that the President in his message did not advise or recommend that the Congress should pass any Federal antilynching bill. He had given the race question, as he does all matters that affect the peace and welfare of the Nation, his careful consideration, and the only suggestion or recommendation to Congress he made was this:

> * * * The creation of a commission embracing representatives of both races, to study and report on the entire subject. The proposal has real merit.

What proposal? Not an antilynching bill; that never was in his mind. Here is the proposal that in addition to the commission which he says "has real merit," he said further:

> I am convinced that in mutual tolerance, understanding, charity, recognition of the interdependence of the races, and the maintenance of the rights of citizenship, lies the road to righteous adjustment.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], who represents a large Negro voting population in the city of St. Louis, immediately at the opening of this Congress introduced, not a resolution authorizing the creation of a commission representing both races to study and report on the entire subject as recommended by the President but he introduced the bill under consideration, with this misleading title, "A bill to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws and to punish the crime of lynching."

I want my Republican colaborers in this House further to remember that never in the party conferences or party caucuses have we as Republicans voted or pledged ourselves to stand by or advocate this antilynching bill as a party measure or otherwise, and when in the course of this debate we hear the party whip crack and are told by the advocates of this measure that our national platform, President, and party have pledged us as Republicans to favor or vote for this Federal antilynching bill repudiate that as a misleading and unfair statement.

The Southwestern Christian Advocate, the organ of certain societies formed to stir up race hatred and race prejudice, under date of December 29 advocates the passage of the Dyer bill by the Republicans of this House as a bill to pay the debts of the Republican Party. It says:

> Let it be said that if the party's debt to the Negro can be canceled by consummating this vast moral reform, which means so much for the future perpetuity of the Nation, the bargain would be legitimate and the Negro welcomes the deal.

Of course the Negro welcomes the "deal." Under the false statements of certain agitators, who are working to bring about race riots, the Negro will welcome the "deal." This bill will give him the opportunity in large cities to hide up dark alleys and in crowded buildings and shoot up innocent men, women, and children on the streets with United States courts and marshals hundreds of miles away.

I want to say as a Republican that there is no deal or bargain made by the Republican Party to pay off any alleged debts to the Negro by the passage of this antilynching bill. We as a party owe the colored people nothing, and for one I refuse to be politically blackmailed. [Applause.]

Do not, I beg of you, allow partisan appeals and party prejudice to blind you to disturb the peace and harmony of our national household and do a terrible injustice and wrong to our own people in any section of this great and united Nation.

This bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which I am a member. We held extended hearings, principally upon the question of the constitutionality of such a law as was contemplated in this bill.

It is admitted by everyone that the only authority for this legislation is found in the last clause of the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the National Constitution, and that if that amendment does not authorize this legislation then it would be unconstitutional and void. The last clause of the amendment reads as follows:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States * * * nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The Constitution very plainly and distinctly gives exclusive powers to each State to pass and enact its own police and criminal laws, to establish and conduct its own courts, to execute and enforce its own laws, but it does not in any way allow, suffer, or permit Congress, by legislation, to interfere with these powers exclusively given to the States. The tenth article of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

To a committee of lawyers the legislation suggested by this bill gave rise at once to grave doubts as to its constitutionality and to the right of Congress to make a criminal code for the States or to deny to the States the enjoyment and discharge of their constitutional rights and powers.

To assist the committee on the question of the constitutionality of the provisions of this bill we called before us the Attorney General of the United States. He sent his assistant, Mr. Goff, an able lawyer and one well qualified to advise the committee. In the course of his testimony, as set forth in the hearings, it seemed to me that the Attorney General's office considered itself in duty bound to support and recommend this bill as a party measure and advise its passage, because it was claimed by its author that it was so pledged by the Republican platform and recommended to Congress by the President.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. I regret I can not yield. I borrowed my time

In other words, the Assistant Attorney General argued his case for the proponents of the bill with all the skill and ingenuity of a paid attorney representing a certain client's interests. Every decision and authority cited was so arranged, colored, and quoted as to make out a prima facie case for the bill and to advise the committee, in substance, that even if its constitutionality was in doubt, it ought to be put up to the Supreme Court. In other words, that Congress should pass its responsibility on to the United States Supreme Court. In the hearings there is a letter from the Hon. Moorfield Storey, of Massachusetts, who is attorney for an organization of agitators known as the National Association for Advancement of Colored People, which has its headquarters in New York City, an organization whose work is to stir up the race question in the South and to induce the ignorant Negroes to believe that they are the victims of imaginary wrongs at the hands of the whites and that Congress can stop all lynchings. Mr. Storey, in recommending this legislation, said:

It has seemed to me a very doubtful question whether legislation by Congress against lynching in the States is constitutional, but I am very clearly of opinion that it ought to be tried. I think the South expects it, and many of our southern citizens who are opposed to lynching will welcome it. At the most, the country will be no worse off if the experiment fails than it is now.

Mr. Storey seems to voice the sentiment of the proponents of this bill, first, that they are very doubtful of its constitutionality; second, it is therefore the duty of Congress to enact it and pass it on to the courts. I can understand the zeal of those who view this bill from the standpoint of political expediency. They say in so many words "This Republican Congress can satisfy the colored people of the South by the enactment of this legislation. If the Supreme Court declares it unconstitutional, which it doubtless will, if enacted, then the colored voters will have nobody to blame but the Supreme Court, and as the judges of that court are appointed for life and do not, like Representatives, come up every two years to be elected, they can suffer no harm, and the party will discharge its responsibility and in another way have taken care of the recommendation of the President." [Applause.]

During the past 10 years there has been a large exodus of Negroes from the South to the big cities of the border States. To-day many Congressmen outside of the Southern States find in their districts strong organizations of colored voters who call themselves Republicans and who hold the balance of power and can elect or defeat many of the present Members of this House. They have only one political policy or interest, and that is to defeat for reelection any Member of Congress that votes against the Dyer bill. I know the awful pressure that is brought to bear upon certain of my party colleagues to vote for this bill with the hope and expectation that the Supreme Court will finally save the Nation from the folly of the Republican leaders, who by a party rule attempt to force this bill through the House.

I am what is known as a "regular Republican." Whenever I possibly can do so I work, act, and vote with my party. I support, if possible, the reports of the committees who have measures in charge and follow the party and the President at all times whenever I can do so conscientiously and without—in my opinion—violating my oath to support the Constitution. I have no criticism to make of those members of my committee who by a small margin voted out this bill. They have a right to their opinion the same as I. I am not the keeper of their conscience, even of their political conscience. I have carefully, seriously, and thoroughly investigated this legislation, and without any doubts I have arrived at the conclusion that this bill, if enacted, would violate the Constitution of the United States, and if it should possibly be held legal and constitutional by the Supreme Court of the land, then its effect upon the Nation as a whole would be most unfortunate and disastrous to peace and good order in the Nation, and as a law it would be necessarily vicious legislation, unwise, unenforceable, and unworkable. I am, therefore, driven by my investigation to oppose this bill by every proper means. I believe with Abraham Lincoln that—

No man who has sworn to support the Constitution can conscientiously vote for what he understands to be an unconstitutional measure, however expedient he may think it.—Abraham Lincoln (Cooper Union, Feb. 27, 1860.)

[Applause.]

I hold, with our President, that this lynching problem presents conditions that can not be removed. I indorse the solution of this problem when he said in his message:

Some of the difficulties might be ameliorated by a humane and enlightened consideration of it, a study of its many aspects, and an effort to formulate, if not a policy, at least a national attitude of mind calculated to bring about the most satisfactory possible adjustment of relations between the races and of each race to the national life

I also favor, as a sensible and practicable step in the right direction, the further suggestion of the President, that there should be created a commission of both races to study and report on the entire subject.

One of the most unfortunate features of this debate is the idea put forth by the advocates of this bill that its passage will forever stop all lynchings. The newspaper from which I last quoted in the same issue said:

Passage of H. R. 13, commonly known as the Dyer antilynching bill, now pending in Congress, will mark this the epochal Congress in the life of the Nation since the days of the great Lincoln, because it will settle in security the otherwise insecure lives and liberties of 12,000,000 colored American citizens and render stable the now shaking foundations of our American Government.

The advocates of this antilynching bill totally disregard the recommendations of the President and in its place they attempt by Federal statutes to invade the States with a horde of high-salaried United States marshals, attorneys, and carpetbaggers, and set aside the criminal laws of all the States and proceed to punish the innocent for the acts of the guilty.

The only evidence, if it may be called evidence, before the House that any State has legalized lynching or has denied to any person the equal protection of the laws comes to us from two interested and prejudiced sources. First, propaganda furnished through the mails to each Member of Congress from an organization in Alabama called The Tuskegee Institute for the Training of Colored Men and Women. Their matter consists of statistics prepared by some one unknown, purporting to show the total number of lynchings in the United States for the last 36 years. The average is 112 a year, and for the last year, that of 1921 complete, 62, or about one-half the average. They do not furnish one bit of evidence as to what any State has done or neglected to do to stop or punish these lynchings. They do not furnish the history of a single case as to what was done in the courts of the State to prevent the lynching or to punish the lynchers. They do not give a single fact as a basis for Congress to say that any State has denied to any person the equal protection of its laws.

2. The only other evidence before us is a mass of propaganda sent also through the mails to the Members of this House from a New York City organization called and known as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. They furnish Congressmen with a lot of copies of sensational newspaper headings and highly colored "write-ups" about the lynching of one Lowrey for the killing of a farmer and his daughter in Arkansas a year ago. These newspaper clippings fail to state in what way the State denied the equal protection of its laws to the Negro who was lynched, not a word as to what was done to prevent the lynchers, but only the fact of the killing with its sensational "write-up" from the pen of a "cub" reporter and that is all, except the strained and senseless inference that if we had during this time a Federal antilynching law like the one before us no lynching would have taken place. This New York organization also furnished to Members of Congress a clipping from the New York Evening Post, which said of the present bill:

Even if the lynching law should be declared invalid by the Supreme Court, its mere enactment will have gone far to serve its purpose. Notice will have been served on States which have been derelict in their duty that the conscience of the Nation will not tolerate the perpetuation of an abuse and a crime that make us a by-word in the public opinion of mankind. It is argued by the World this morning that no proof exists that the States as such have legalized or tolerated lynching. Yet we have the fact that in 1920 the mobs took 61 lives and in the present year 63 lives. There is no escape from the alternative that the States are either unable or unwilling to suppress mob murder.

The absurd logic of the Post is the position of the friends of this bill, to wit: If there has been committed in any State a murder, the fact is proof positive that the State is either unable or unwilling to suppress murder, and has therefore denied to the person killed the equal protection of the laws. [Applause.]

Some one in the course of this debate said, in substance, that the fact that more Negroes are lynched than whites is proof positive that the Negroes do not receive the equal protection of the laws. [Applause.] By that same logic, if in a certain State last year four persons were lynched, two Negroes and two whites, then in that case there would be equal protection of the laws. Such nonsense is not worthy the serious consideration of this national lawmaking body.

As one Member of this Congress, I refuse to pass my responsibility on to the courts. [Applause.] I decline to take the statistics of murder in the several States as proof that these States are denying to any person the equal protection of its laws. I do not believe that Congress by doubtful Federal statutes can conduct the affairs of the States of the Union better and more efficiently than the States themselves.

For the crime of lynching there is no excuse or apology; the whole soul and being of every true citizen, every lover of law and order, cries out in condemnation of what has been called "the most cowardly of crimes"; and if I could see my way clear to favor any lawful measure that would in any way prevent or lessen this crime no one would be more enthusiastic in its support than I. [Applause.]

What does this bill propose to do to lessen or prevent the crime of lynching? The first section attempts to define the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage," as it is used in this act, and provides that to give the Federal courts jurisdiction five or more persons must participate in a lynching. If but four persons do the lynching, then this bill gives no authority to the Federal courts and officers to interfere. This makes this bill impossible of enforcement at the very start.

Section 2 is an attempt to make the Congress, acting in a legislative capacity, construe judicially the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and to put this legislative body in the absurd position of saying what the fourteenth amendment means, and what, under that amendment, is a denial by a State of the equal protection of the laws, attempting thereby to usurp the functions of the Supreme Court, which functions are not a part of the prerogatives of Congress.

It seems an almost absurd position for the Congress to say that whenever there is a lynching in a State it is proof positive that the State has denied to the person so lynched the equal protection of the laws under the Constitution. The Assistant Attorney General, to recommend this bill, was driven to the necessity of taking the position that Congress by this enactment could foreclose the Supreme Court from declaring the law unconstitutional by the mere force of section 2.

Mr. Goff, in his testimony before the committee, on page 38 of the hearings on House bill 13, says:

Mr. GOFF. I contend this: If the State, in the mind of Congress, denies this right because all legislation assumes the existence of an evil to be corrected, then Congress, having legislatively determined that fact, the courts will not consider whether Congress was or was not justified, but will assume because of Congress having passed appropriate legislation that the States have denied the rights in question.

If the Supreme Court is to say that the passage of this bill is conclusive proof that the Congress has found, as a matter of fact, that the States have denied to any person the equal protection of the laws, then quit your responsibility as men and first obtain the evidence. How shall we obtain the evidence? Answer: By the creation of such a commission as was recommended to us by the President in his message; and then base our legislation, if any, on the report, findings, and recommendation of that commission.

Mr. Goff holds that we have no right to enact this bill unless Congress finds as a matter of fact that the States have denied to persons the equal protection of the laws. In this matter there is no evidence before Congress that any State in the Union has denied to any person the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. Goff is driven by this position to say, on page 39:

If Congress saw fit to pass a law which came within the meaning, as the courts have defined that meaning, of the fourteenth amendment, that then the courts could not conduct an inquiry as to whether Congress was justified in deciding what is generally termed a legislative fact.

The Attorney General thus shifts the responsibility to Congress for the enactment of this most unwise legislation, and we have not one bit of evidence on which to base this bill according to the Attorney General.

There was not a word of evidence before our committee that any State of the Union had denied to any person the equal protection of the laws. There was no evidence that any State in the Union had enacted laws or had now upon its statute books any laws discriminating against any person or had denied by its provisions to any person or class of persons the equal protection of the laws. The only evidence whatever—if it might be called evidence—was some tables submitted by the proponents of the bill showing the number of lynchings in the Nation over a period of 30 years. The report on the bill of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] shows that in the year 1919, 83 persons were lynched in the United States, 4 whites, 2 Mexicans, and 77 Negroes; that in 1920, 65 persons were lynched in the Union, 6 whites and 59 Negroes; that in 1921, 4 whites and 48 Negroes were lynched in the Nation. If these figures are correct, they go to show that the crime of lynching is growing less in the United States every year and have been reduced 25 per cent the past year. What was done by the States in these several cases to deny equal protection of the laws to the persons lynched was not shown. What efforts were made, if any, to stop the lynchings by the State, or its officers, were not shown. What proceedings were taken in the State courts, what trials were had in the State courts of the lynchers, was not shown.

In other words, the only evidence before the committee was the statement from these tables that certain persons from time to time are lynched in the United States, and there was no evidence whatever to show that any State had in any way through its laws or by its acts denied to any person so lynched the equal protection of the laws. It seems to me no lawyer in this House can deny for a moment that the mere fact that a murder had been committed would be any evidence that the State had denied the equal protection of its laws to the person killed, and yet this bill proceeds upon that assumption, and the Attorney General's office holds, if it holds anything, that notice of the fact of the murder is all that is necessary to enact a law to make a State liable in the Federal courts under this bill for the unlawful killing of a citizen by a mob. On page 43 of the hearings Assistant Attorney General Goff states:

If the Congress of the United States, in view of the fact that a State has a law punishing murder, says there should be a Federal law punishing murder in order that there may be conceded to the people of that State an equal, vigorous, and speedy enforcement of the law and the protection of their lives and their property, then Congress would have the right, in the exercise of the correlative duty of protection, to do so.

My colleague from Nebraska on the committee [Mr. REAVIS] asks Mr. Goff (p. 43):

Would you carry that further, to burglary, larceny, and assault and battery?

Mr. GOFF. Of course, the principle would carry us there.

Yes; of course "the principle would carry us there." Reason and logic carry us there. Our own common sense tells us that there is no escape from the absurd position in which the Congress would be placed if we should pass this bill. If we can enact a code of Federal law to punish the crime of lynching, we can pass a code of Federal criminal law for all the States to punish every offense now within the jurisdiction of State courts. We could send a host of new Federal judges into every State to replace the State courts. We could infest every State with a swarm of Federal officers to punish every crime known to the law, and the States of the Union would have left no rights that politicians in Congress would be bound to respect. [Applause.]

In Barbier v. Connolly (113 U. S., p. 13) the Supreme Court, in speaking of the fourteenth amendment, said:

Neither the amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—nor any other amendment was designed to interfere with the powers of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people.

During the debate on the rule the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] attempted, as chairman, to justify the action of the Committee on Rules in making this bill in order. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] interrupted to put to the gentleman from Kansas the following question:

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman has undoubtedly given the constitutional phase of this question a good deal of attention. I should like to ask directly for his opinion in reference to section 2. It provides that when any State or governmental subdivision fails to protect life that State or subdivision shall be guilty of a violation of the provision of the Constitution which says that equal protection of the law shall be afforded. Does the gentleman think that a State, acting in perfect good faith and doing everything in its power to enforce the laws, when it fails to protect life transfers its jurisdiction over those crimes to the Federal Government?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the large question in this case.

Yes, it is indeed "the large question in this case"; but that question, however large, has been definitely settled by the highest court in the land. That court by a mass of decisions has held that the jurisdiction of the State to enact and enforce its own criminal laws can not by Congress be transferred to the Federal Government.

In Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313) the Supreme Court of the United States, in speaking of the limitations of the fourteenth amendment, said:

These provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State action exclusively, and not to any action of private individuals.

Lynching is the action of private individuals.

Section 3 of this bill provides that if any State or municipal officer fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to prevent a mob or riotous assemblage from putting to death a person, or fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to apprehend or prosecute to final judgment under the laws of his State all persons so participating in such mob or riotous assemblage, shall be guilty of a felony, and if convicted may be punished by imprisonment for five years and a fine of $5,000, or both fine and imprisonment.

Under this section Congress denies the right of the State to make and enforce its own criminal laws or to punish the neglects and delinquencies of its own officials.

Under this act a town constable, before his town has time to act, can be haled before a Federal court in some distant State, and if a Federal jury find that the constable did not, in their opinion, make all reasonable efforts to prevent the lynching or to apprehend the lynchers, then they may fine him $5,000 and imprison him for five years.

If such a law as is contemplated in this bill is enacted and declared constitutional, then there will be no police, no officers of the law provided by any State in the Union, because no sane person would accept the position of a peace officer with this terrible risk and penalty and punishment awaiting him in case a lynching should happen in his State. [Applause.]

This section further provides that any person who participates in a mob that takes from the custody or possession of any State or municipal officer any person held by such officer to answer some offense, or participates in putting such person to death, or obstructs or prevents any State or municipal officer in the discharge of his duty in the punishment of persons charged with the crime of lynching, shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction may be imprisoned for life.

On Monday, December 19, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] extended his remarks in the RECORD on this measure. His argument was a fine presentation of the unconstitutionality of this bill. I wish you all could read it before you vote upon this measure. On page 644 of the RECORD, he says:

> It must be admitted that the laws of all States require arresting officers to protect their prisoners. In like manner under the laws of all States every participant in a lynching is a murderer. Can it be fairly said that because an officer occasionally fails in his duty to protect his prisoner from lawless mobs that such exceptional act amounts to the action of the State as a subdivision of organized society in denying due process of law and in denying equal protection of law?
> If Congress can by law provide punishment in a Federal court for a State sheriff for his acts or neglect of action as sheriff, then Congress could provide punishment for the governor of a State for his acts or failure to act as the State's chief executive. And if the State's executive officers may be punished by fine or imprisonment under congressional laws, so may the chief justice and all judges of the State. And by the same token the members of the State legislatures may be punished for enacting laws found to be violative of the fourteenth amendment.

I wish here in this connection to again call your attention to the fact that every State in the Union has laws making it a crime to interfere with or obstruct an officer in the performance of his duty, and can it be constitutional that whenever that crime is committed in any State the United States marshals may arrest the offender and take him before a Federal court in another State and, if in the opinion of a Federal jury, he did so obstruct the officer he may be convicted and imprisoned for life? Such an act would not be a denial by the State of the equal protection of the laws under the Constitution, but it would be a denial of the rights of the States and the rights of all persons under the national Constitution.

Section 4 removes the last vestige of the rights of the citizens of the several States. It provides that any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage by which a person is put to death shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof may be imprisoned for life.

Lynching is nothing but murder. All who engage in it are murderers. Every State in the Union has laws against murder, and until it is shown by proper evidence that a State has enacted laws denying to persons the equal protection of the laws the Federal power can not interfere. This bill is an attempt to enact a Federal statute to punish in Federal courts the crime of murder in the several States. If enacted and held constitutional it could be used to sweep away all the laws of the States. Not a single State criminal law would remain superior to the Federal statutes, for, in the language of the Assistant Attorney General, "the same principle would apply to larceny, burglary, assault and battery." [Applause.]

Section 5 provides that any county in which a person is put to death by a mob shall forfeit $10,000 for the use of the family of the person so put to death. If he had no family then it goes to his parents, and if he had no parents then it is given to the United States.

A county is but a subdivision of a State. Under this bill it is not necessary that the county itself should have failed in any particular to do its utmost to prevent the lynching. It is not necessary that the county should have any knowledge of the lynching or have failed in any particular to prevent it. It is sufficient to punish the county in a Federal court that a lynching has taken place within its borders. The sheriff of the county may have tried his utmost to prevent the lynching. He may have been shot to death by the lynchers, but under this bill his family would receive nothing, while the family of the person so lynched would receive $10,000 from the innocent taxpayers of the county.

If such a Federal law is constitutional, then the inhabitants of a county, however innocent of wrong, have no rights whatever and may be deprived of property, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness by a Federal law every time a murder is committed within its borders. [Applause.]

Section 6 is the worst of all. It provides that if any person so put to death has been transferred by a mob from one county to another between capture and death each county through which he was so transported shall forfeit $10,000. It is not necessary to show that the murder was committed in that county or that the county had anything to do with the lynching or had neglected to do anything to stop it or even had any knowledge that it was being committed. It is sufficient under this bill to penalize the county, that in the darkness of night a mob crossed your county or mine or entered upon its soil, even by a few rods, while engaged in its work of lynching.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. I can not yield to anyone, because I have borrowed my time, and the gentleman says he will not give me any more time if I yield.

I now turn from the very unsatisfactory light given by the Attorney General's office and the proponents of this bill to some of the decisions of the highest court in the land, which decisions have construed the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, an amendment under which the friends of this bill claim that this legislation has a legal right to live or it must die.

The fourteenth amendment was born in the stormy days of reconstruction. Many of the Southern States, after slavery was abolished, passed laws discriminating against the Negro in his civil rights; and to give him equal protection in his civil rights, in his voting, as a citizen, in his business, in the courts, in the selection of jurors, and in all other civil rights, the fourteenth amendment was enacted.

In the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wallace, U. S., p. 81) Justice Miller told us the object and purpose of the fourteenth amendment. He said:

> In the light of the history of this amendment and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause (equal protection of the laws). The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipated Negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by such laws are forbidden.

In the case of Strauder v. West Virginia (100 U. S., 303) a law which denied colored persons the right to sit on juries was declared void. The court said:

> It (the fourteenth amendment) was designed to assure to the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons and to give to that race the protection of the General Government in that enjoyment whenever it should be denied by the States.

The particular action of the State prohibited by the fourteenth amendment is fully set forth in the Civil Rights cases, United States against Stanley, Ryan, and others, found in the United States Reports, volume 109, page 11, in which the court said:

> It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws. * * * The last section of the amendment invests Congress with power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. To enforce what? To enforce the prohibition. To adopt legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts, and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation, but to provide modes of relief against State legislation or State action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws and the action of State officers, executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment. Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the fourteenth amendment, but they are secured by way of prohibition against State laws and State proceedings affecting those rights and privileges, and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect, and such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed State laws or State proceedings and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect.

Mr. Justice Field, in the One hundred and thirteenth United States Reports, page 27, in the case of Barbier against Connolly, made plain the purpose of the fourteenth amendment and its limitations. He said:

> The fourteenth amendment, in declaring that no State "shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," undoubtedly intended not only that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty or arbitrary spoliation of property but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights; that all persons should be equally entitled to pursue their happiness and acquire and enjoy property; that they should have like access to the courts of the country for the protection of their persons and property, the prevention and redress of wrongs and the enforcement of contracts; that no impediment should be interposed to the pursuits of anyone except as applied to the same pursuits by others under like circumstances; that no greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling and condition; and that in the administration of criminal justice no different or higher punishment should be imposed upon one than such as is prescribed to all for like offenses. But neither the amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people.

This was followed by the decision of the Pembina Mining Co. against the State of Pennsylvania, One hundred and twenty-fifth United States Reports, page 181, in which the court said:

The inhibition of the amendment that no State shall deprive any person within its jurisdiction of the equal protection of the laws was designed to prevent any person or class of persons from being singled out as a special subject for discriminatory and hostile legislation.

A later decision is found in James against Bowman, One hundred and ninetieth United States Reports, pages 127 to 137. There the late Justice Brewer construed the fourteenth amendment as follows:

The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism; every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the Government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.

The late James G. Blaine, of my State, was a Member of Congress when the fourteenth amendment was passed. In his great work Twenty Years of Congress, volume 2, page 313, he makes plain what Congress intended to be the purpose and limitations of that amendment. He says:

Under it the citizen of foreign birth can not be persecuted by discriminatory statutes, nor can any citizen of dark complexion be deprived of a single privilege or immunity which belongs to the white man. Nor can the Catholic or the Protestant or the Jew be placed under the ban or subjected to any deprivation of personal or religious right. It curtails the power of the States to shelter the wrongdoer or to authorize crime by a statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. UPSHAW. Give him five minutes of my time.

Mr. HERSEY. I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. All right.

Mr. HERSEY. It was contended in our committee and by friends of this bill in the debate in the House that this Federal antilynching legislation was justified and constitutional because it is claimed that there is a precedent in the late Volstead enforcement code making the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors a Federal offense.

This contention of the proponents of this bill is very unfortunate for the constitutional side of this bill. A moment's thought must satisfy us that the eighteenth amendment, instead of being in favor of this legislation, is directly opposed to it.

Many years ago some of the States of the Union, like Maine and Kansas, enacted prohibitory laws outlawing the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor within the borders of their States. They passed also amendments to their State constitutions making it unlawful to manufacture or sell liquors. On appeal to the United States Supreme Court that court held these statutes and amendments to their State constitutions were lawful under the police power given to the States by the Federal Constitution.

The Supreme Court said in substance the States have a right to enact their own criminal laws. They have the police power, and it is not only their duty but it is their exclusive duty to enforce the police powers under the Constitution.

Afterwards the friends of prohibition appealed to the Congress to enact Federal statutes making it a crime to manufacture and sell intoxicating liquors in every State in the Nation. In other words, they demanded of Congress Federal prohibition. Congress rightfully replied that they had no authority to enact such laws without an amendment to the Constitution. This position was admitted by all lawyers, and afterwards Congress did submit to the people and there was duly passed and made a permanent part of the Federal Constitution the eighteenth amendment, making it a Federal crime to manufacture or sell intoxicating liquors, giving the States concurrent power with the Federal Government in the enforcement of laws to carry out the amendment, and giving Congress authority to enact an enforcement code to carry out the purpose of the eighteenth amendment.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], chairman of the Judiciary Committee, immortalized himself as author of what is known as the Volstead enforcement act, which provides for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment by Federal authority in conjunction with and in concurrence with the States.

On appeal to the Supreme Court by the breweries, distillers, and liquor sellers that Congress had no right to enact this enforcement code, the Supreme Court has recently held that Congress had that right because of the eighteenth amendment, which made the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor a Federal offense, and that Congress received from the eighteenth amendment authority to enact a Federal enforcement code, and so held the act of Congress constitutional.

What do we find in the bill before us? Not a resolution of Congress submitting the twentieth amendment to the people of the Nation, making lynching a Federal offense in every State in the Union, and authorizing Congress to enact a Federal code for the enforcement of the amendment. Nothing of the kind, but in its place we find this strange situation, not another Volstead enforcement code but the Dyer enforcement bill to enforce an amendment not now in existence.

Neither in the fourteenth amendment nor in any other amendment is lynching made a Federal offense, and until it is made a Federal offense by a constitutional amendment to the Federal Constitution and authority given to Congress to enact an enforcement code to carry out the purposes of such an amendment Congress has no power whatever to enact this bill.

If this bill should pass and become a law, and after that a person should be arrested for participating in a lynching and taken before the Federal court and convicted, and he should appeal to the Supreme Court on the ground that the law under which he was convicted was unconstitutional, I can imagine the scene in the Supreme Court of the United States when the constitutionality of that law should come up for argument.

When the code to enforce the eighteenth amendment was before the Supreme Court my chairman, Mr. VOLSTEAD, was for the law and its constitutionality, because, as he claimed, he was backed by the eighteenth amendment.

On the other side then was my friend from Missouri [Mr. DYER], author of this bill, who was opposed to the national prohibitory law on the ground that it was not constitutional and that Congress had no right to enact it. Now, when this bill comes before the Supreme Court, there is a wonderful change. On the day that the Constitution is to be crucified by the antilynching bill Pilate and Herod become friends. The gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Minnesota are now claiming that this law, this antilynching bill, is constitutional without any constitutional amendment whatever.

When the Supreme Court asks Mr. VOLSTEAD for his authority for the enactment of this legislation by Congress without an amendment to the Constitution making lynching a Federal offense, Mr. VOLSTEAD will stammer and say that his friend Mr. DYER will present that side of the case, because he, Mr. VOLSTEAD, is more familiar with the eighteenth amendment than he would be with Mr. DYER's bill, and the court would call upon Mr. DYER to answer the person convicted how the court could hold this antilynching enforcement law constitutional without a constitutional amendment authorizing it, and Mr. DYER would say in substance, as he said the other day to us:

"I have here, your honor, clippings from many newspapers all over the land recommending this legislation. I want to tell your honors about the awful riot out in St. Louis, my old State, some four years ago, known as the race riots, where 100 persons were shot and burned. I do not know who did the shooting, but it was done in a riot and by a mob, and it was caused by race feeling and prejudice, and for that reason we want this legislation to be held constitutional."

I can see the kindly Chief Justice, with that well-known broad smile spreading over his face, saying to Mr. DYER: "The court is not interested in the St. Louis riot or any newspaper clippings about the advisability of preventing lynching. We want you to point out to us the constitutional amendment that justifies making lynching a Federal offense." And Mr. DYER would say, "We rely upon the fourteenth amendment, your honor." And the court would say to Mr. DYER, "The fourteenth amendment is to prevent discriminatory legislation on behalf of the States; it aims at State enactments and not the acts of individuals, and our court has held that by repeated decisions by Justice Miller, Justice Field, and very lately by the late Justice Brewer that, under the fourteenth amendment, Congress has no right to enact a Federal code of criminal law for the States, and that the fourteenth amendment is limited to discriminatory legislation by State laws that do not give to all persons the equal protection of the laws." And then the court will say, "That the appeal is sustained and the law declared unconstitutional, indictment dismissed, and prisoner discharged."

If the court should render any further opinion, it would hold, as it has held so many times, that Congress can not make individual acts a Federal offense without a constitutional amendment. The court might, however, refresh the recollection of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] by citing the following case:

The Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Harris (106 U. S. Repts., p. 638) construed the purpose and limitations of the two sections of the fourteenth amendment. The court said:

It is a guaranty against the acts of the State government itself. It is a guaranty against the exertion of arbitrary and tyrannical power on the part of the government and legislature of the State, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses; and the power of Congress, whether express or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppression of crime within the States. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require to authorize Congress to perform the duty that the guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform, and which it requires the State to perform.

I want to say a word as to the effect of this legislation, should it be passed by Congress and be held constitutional by the courts. The law will be most unwise and absolutely unworkable. It could never be enforced by all the Federal courts of the Union and all the United States marshals in the Nation. The States must be left to work out their own destiny, to enact and enforce their own laws in accordance with the Constitution. The Federal power ought not to enter the domain of the State and take possession of the prerogatives, duties, and responsibilities of the States and attempt to perform their work. The fourteenth amendment contemplates that where States enact laws that discriminate between persons, and deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, that such enactments of any State are null and void. The fourteenth amendment goes no further.

It is generally claimed by the advocates of this bill that if enacted into law it is for the purpose of preventing lynching in certain Southern States, and particularly the lynching of the Negro.

If there are more Negroes lynched than whites, it is because of certain monstrous crimes committed by the Negro that arouse the blood of the white race. The terrible crime of rape was a legacy left to the South after the destruction of slavery. The South must deal with this awful problem. They are dealing with it. Every Southern State has laws punishing the crime of lynching. It is said that the State of Georgia is the greatest offender, and yet I find in a late edition of the Concord (N. H.) Monitor, the following:

[From the Concord (N. H.) Monitor.]

On a Friday morning recently two Negroes committed a heinous crime in Wayne County, Ga. By the following Wednesday morning the criminals had been caught, indicted by jury in open court at the county seat, found guilty, and sentenced to death. That sentence is soon to be executed.

The whole proceedings, says an Atlanta newspaper, with pardonable pride, "passed off with dignity, order, and precision." The community in which the crime was perpetrated is satisfied, and all the more so because fundamental justice has been done without any sacrifice of self-respect.

The only excuse for lynching has been its effectiveness. The legal procedure in this case was just as effective as a lynching bee. This is the way, and the only way, to stop lynching in criminal cases that involve race prejudice or invite the moral hatred of a community.

The New York World, in a recent issue under the title "High cost of lynching," says:

The award of $2,000 damages made by a South Carolina court to the widow of a victim of mob violence establishes an interesting precedent. In April, 1920, Joe Stewart, a Negro, was taken from the jail at Laurens, S. C., and hanged. Suit for this amount under the constitutional requirements was brought by the widow in the common pleas court, and the presiding justice directed the jury to return a verdict against the county for the full sum. * * * If it is going to cost even $2,000 to lynch a Negro in South Carolina, it is conceivable that the price may prove a deterrent to lynchings.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] inserts in the RECORD a clipping from a newspaper that wants the Dyer bill because it says it will stop all lynchings. It says of the efforts of southern governors to prevent lynchings, as follows:

Morrow, of Kentucky, puts through an automatic removal law against officers derelict in the face of mobs and employs State soldiery to prevent lynching.

McRae, of Arkansas, demands most stringent laws and their enforcement against lynchers.

Cooper, of South Carolina, made a Nation-wide reputation by his use of National Guard against would-be lynchers.

Under the fearless administration of Bickett, that great defense of the Goldsboro courthouse against the mob became practically possible.

Dorsey, of Georgia, organized a State-wide movement against the continuance of the foulest and longest of all lynching records.

And now Gov. Neff, of Texas, goes up and down the State appealing for law enforcement and for order.

However sincere and courageous, the southern governors' efforts to stamp out lynching, they come to naught.

The President said the condition could not be removed.

The President further said:

I am convinced that in mutual tolerance, understanding, charity, recognition of the interdependence of the races, and the maintenance of the rights of citizenship lies the road to righteous adjustment.

Under the Dyer bill there is to its advocates no other road but Federal laws, United States marshals, Federal troops and the bayonet, civil war, and race riots.

The Southern States are enforcing laws to-day similar to the one provided in this bill. It is their duty to so enact and enforce such laws. It is not the duty of Congress to interfere in the working out of this great problem by the States of the Union.

Over 30 years ago the immortal Henry W. Grady left his southern home and made a fraternal visit to the people of the North. He was the best friend the colored people ever had. He told us that the great race problem could not be settled by Federal statutes by sending to the Southern States United States marshals and a new force of "carpetbaggers" on the problem that this bill seeks to settle.

Grady said:

The future holds a problem in solving which the South must stand alone, in dealing with which she must come closer together than ambition or despair have driven her, and on the outcome of which her very existence depends. This problem is to carry within her body politic two separate races, and nearly equal in numbers. She must carry these races in peace, for discord means ruin. She must carry them separately, for assimilation means debasement. She must carry them in equal justice, for to this she is pledged in honor and in gratitude. She must carry them unto the end, for in human probability she will never be quit of either.

This burden no other people bears to-day—on none hath it ever rested. Without precedent or companionship, the South must bear this problem, the awful responsibility of which should win the sympathy of all humankind and the protecting watchfulness of God alone, even unto the end.

What wonderful progress the South has made in giving to the colored race the equal protection of the laws during the last 30 years! It is not contended by the proponents of this bill that to-day any State of the Union has in its constitution a single provision in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution. It is not claimed for a moment that any of the States have now a single statute that discriminates against any person or class of persons. No one claims as an excuse for this bill that any State in all this broad land has laws that deprive any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the laws.

To-day each State has its own constitution, patterned after and in accordance, conformity, and harmony with the Constitution of the United States. Every unconstitutional provision of the past that has discriminated in any manner against the colored race has been swept aside and declared null and void by the Supreme Court of the United States. Every State has its own legislature that enacts laws for the government, guidance, and protection of all its citizens. Every State has its courts to construe its laws and dispense justice to its people. Every State has its governors, sheriffs, and police officers to enforce its laws. These are sacred rights reserved by the Constitution of the United States to the several States, and these rights you and I under oath are sworn to preserve and protect.

Since the days of Blaine and Grady the sons of the Blue and the Gray have fought side by side on land and on sea, first to liberate the slaves of Spain. Then next the soldiers of the North and the South, forgetting partisanship and sectionalism, have borne the Old Flag of the fathers to triumphant victory on the blood-red fields of France, and while I am speaking to you together the sons of the Blue and the Gray sleep side by side under the poppies of Flanders Field. Only yesterday the path of the President was strewn with flowers by the people of the South. Never was this Nation more happily united. Here in the Capital of the Nation we have been spending the past two months with the great leaders of the civilized world. We have been trying to demonstrate how beautiful it is for nations to dwell together in unity.

In the afterglow of these happy Christmas hours through which we have just passed, when our hearts cry out "Peace on earth, good will toward men," it is no time to enact this monstrous law that can have no other effect or result than to fan into flames the expiring embers of race and class hatred and bring back again to the beautiful Southland the awful horrors of those days of darkness that followed the Civil War.

God help us as Republicans to forget the doubtful political value of this bill and work together, North and South, East and West, for the peace, prosperity, glory, and grandeur of a united Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the first time that two men left to another man the decision of their disputes society became possible. When the first community arranged a tribunal to pass upon the offenses and rights of the citizen, government was established. That agreement is the corner stone of all society and of all government. Whenever men cancel that foundation agreement, government falls, society is dissolved, and civilization is a wreck. Whenever men disregard the courts and undertake to take into their own hands decisions upon the offenses or rights of other men, you have seen the beginning of the end of human society and they are lapsing into barbarism.

Respect for the law and its decisions is absolutely essential to the maintenance of a democratic form of government. Yet lawlessness, disregard for the law, refusal to leave to the law, decisions on other men's guilt or innocence, never were as rampant in this country as now. In the future generations they will discuss this lynching era with as much curious interest as we do now the witchcraft era. Unless our people leave their disputes to the courts it is only a question of time as to the collapse of the Republic.

The States have given up any effort to enforce the constitutional guaranty that the lives of all men shall have equal protection. The time has come when Congress must remember its oath and proceed with its duty of enforcing that guaranty of the Constitution. For that purpose, this antilynching bill is presented. Whenever under this bill the State, or sheriff, for example, has failed, neglected, or refused the protection of the laws to any man against a mob, that duty will then devolve upon the Federal Government, or the United States marshal, if this bill passes.

The Federal Government, perhaps, can not enforce this guaranty until the State has thus denied that equal protection. The cases adduced by our opponents simply suggest that this constitutional guaranty can not be enforced by Congress until the State by its officers refuses a man protection. They have no relation to this proposed legislation because it specifically providss that its terms do not become effective until the State refuses to do its duty, and the minute that point is reached the State officer who refuses a man protection and the private individuals who take advantage of his refusal and aid him in his violation of the Constitution will be tried and punished in the Federal courts and the counties whose officers are thus guilty will be liable for such damages as are proven.

Now, every man seems to think that whenever he and his neighbor can get a mask and a long white nightgown, they can call you out and whip you or hang you or burn you, if in their judicial minds you deserve that. Come, gentlemen, let us breed back to sanity again.

No Republic is safe, gentlemen, except upon the respect for law which has been the backbone of Anglo-Saxon civilization. Whenever our people lose that, our society begins to dwindle and fade. This is a big Government, a democratic Government with no big armies, with no autocrats, and we must depend upon the respect of the people for the law. If the sheriff can stand by and smile while a mob takes out and burns a Negro, this country is on the road to the dissolution which so many have predicted this afternoon if they can not have their own way.

The Constitution of the United States provides in the first section of the fourtenth amendment that whenever a State denies to any man the equal protection of its laws it has violated that Constitution. The fifth section of that amendment provides that whenever a State denies equal protection this Congress shall have the power to take the necessary steps toward enforcing that guaranty of the Constitution.

We have heard a lot of pretty good oratory and pretty bad law about this constitutional question.

Since this Government began there have been about thirty-five times in which the Federal Supreme Court has held unconstitutional what this Congress sought to do in passing a particular bill, yet any time anybody brings up any proposition here there are 15 or 20 constitutional lawyers who rise to their feet to tell you that it is unconstitutional; but only thirty-five times out of thousands of bills that we have passed have they been so declared.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the "constitutional" debate. Several gentlemen just tell us plainly and frankly that this bill is unconstitutional. I want to dispose of that assertion first. I am going to tell you just as plainly and frankly that it is constitutional. We are even so far. Now, let us leave it to the Supreme Court. Here are a few of their cases, and I believe the best way to get at it will be to read them and dispense with this eloquence.

The question arises, of course, whether there is any distinction between these cases that have been dragged in here—I do not know why they have been brought in—and the case now at bar. There is a very simple and plain distinction. Practically every one of these decisions is based upon the fact that the indictment or law did not say that the State had denied any rights to anybody. The case decided by Judge Brewer, of my State, was a case in which somebody was arrested for intimidating Negroes at the polls; and whoever drew the indictment forgot to say that they did it because they were Negroes, which was essential, and they forgot to say that it was done by the aid of the State by denying anything. But this bill in its very inception says that it only takes effect when the State has denied equal protection. If I am chased by a mob, and I appeal to the sheriff for protection, and he smiles and does nothing, the minute that he refuses to assist me I am entitled to the protection of the Federal Constitution and to your protection, and you have taken an oath that I shall have it.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. No; I have not time. The gentleman must excuse me.

There is the case of the Commonwealth of Kentucky against Dennison, governor, reported in Sixty-fifth United States, page 66. That case is quoted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. On page 107 of the decision in that case Mr. Justice Taney says:

> And we think it clear that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no power to impose on a State officer, as such, any duty whatever and compel him to perform it.

Now, gentlemen, if that is the law we have no case. If that decision is to stand we have no business in this court. But let us see about that. I will call your attention to a case that these gentlemen have already quoted, entitled Ex parte Virginia, One hundredth United States, and let us turn to page 347, where the Supreme Court of the United States says:

> A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty, without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so, or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State HAS clothed one of its agents with power to annul or to evade it.
> But the constitutional amendment was ordained for a purpose. It was to secure equal rights to all persons and to insure to all persons the enjoyment of such rights, power was given to Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation must act upon persons, not upon the abstract thing denominated a State, but upon the persons who are the agents of the State in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured. Such is the act of March 1, 1875, and we think it was fully authorized by the Constitution.
>
> The argument in support of the petition for a habeas corpus ignores entirely the powers conferred upon Congress by the fourteenth amendment. Were it not for the fifth section of that amendment, there might be room for argument that the first section is only declaratory of the moral duty of the State, as was said in Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Dennison (24 How., 66). The act under consideration in that case provided no means to compel the execution of the duty required by it, and the Constitution gave none.
> But the Constitution now expressly gives authority for congressional interference and compulsion in the cases embraced within the fourteenth amendment. It is but a limited authority, true, extending only to a single class of cases; but within its limits it is complete. The remarks made in Kentucky v. Dennison and in Collector v. Day, though entirely just as applied to the cases in which they were made, are inapplicable to the case we have now in hand. We do not perceive how holding an office under a State and claiming to act for the State can relieve the holder from obligation to obey the Constitution of the United States or take away the power of Congress to punish his disobedience.

Judge Taney's case is gone and "done for," because it has been reversed or modified by the Supreme Court of the United States on the authority of the first and fifth sections of the fourteenth amendment, on which this bill is based, and that amendment is the supreme law of the land.

Now, more of these cases have been decided in the One hundredth United States Reports than in any other. In Tennessee against Davis, page 258, the court held:

> The General Government must cease to exist whenever it can not enforce the exercise of its constitutional powers within the States by the instrumentality of its officers and agents.

And the court held that such criminal prosecutions may be removed to the Federal courts.

In Strauder against West Virginia, One hundredth United States, pages 303 and 310:

The fourteenth amendment not only gave citizenship and the privileges of citizenship to persons of color but denied to any State the power to withhold from them the equal protection of the laws, and invested Congress with power by appropriate legislation to enforce its provisions.

And the court said:

A right or an immunity, whether created by the Constitution or only guaranteed by it, even without any express delegation of power, may be protected by Congress. (Prigg v. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 16 Pt., 539.) So in United States v. Reese (92 U. S., 214) it was said by the chief justice of this court: "Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States can be protected by Congress. The form and manner of the protection may be such as Congress in the legitimate exercise of its legislative discretion shall provide. These may be varied to meet the necessities of the particular right to be protected." But there is express authority to protect the rights and immunities referred to in the fourteenth amendment and to enforce observance of them by appropriate congressional legislation.

VIRGINIA v. RIVES.

The case of Virginia against Rives is found on page 313 of volume 100, United States Supreme Court Reports, and is based on section 641 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides, among other things, that when any criminal prosecution is commenced in any State court against any person who is denied or can not enforce in the judicial tribunals of the State or in the part of the State where such prosecution is pending any right secured to him by any law providing for the equal civil rights of citizens, such prosecution may on the defendant's petition at any time before the trial or final hearing be removed for trial into the next circuit court to be held in the district where it is pending, and on the filing of that petition all further proceedings in the State court shall cease. Two Negroes were being tried for alleged murder, and after the conviction of one they asked for removal to the Federal court, stating that there were no men of their race on the jury that indicted them nor on the jury that was summoned to try them. The Supreme Court states that if the officer who was entrusted with the duty of selecting the juries confined his selections entirely to white people, the injustice could be remedied in the judicial tribunal, and if it should not be, an appeal could be taken to the supreme court of the State, and until that was done he could not truly say that he "is denied or can not enforce in the judicial tribunal of the State" his rights as to a jury, and therefore it was not a proper case for removal. The Supreme Court said:

In such a case it ought to be presumed that the court will redress the wrong.

The Supreme Court continues:

Denials of equal rights in the action of the judicial tribunals of the State are left to the revisory powers of this court.

The court simply said that the petition for removal did not state a proper cause for removal to the Federal court. It said that the proper remedy was to complete the hearing in the Virginia courts, and then ask for the revisory powers of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The opponents of the proposed legislation have some way gotten the idea from this case apparently, that because these causes could not be removed after trial to a Federal court, a sheriff could refuse to enforce the law and Congress could find no corrective legislation that it could make. They entirely overlook the direct statement in this case of the Supreme Court, that these men had an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States whenever it appeared that the judicial tribunals of Virginia had definitely shown that they could not do justice to the men on trial. Indeed, this cause is crowded with statements of the principles involved, which affirm over and again the authority of the Federal Government to establish corrective legislation whenever a State denies to any man equal protection before its laws. I hope that every lawyer interested will read this cause, because it is a library of legal jurisprudence that absolutely determines every proposition involved in this debate and affirms the absolute authority of Congress to pass this bill. It is very curious that it should be cited by those who are opposed to the antilynching bill. Much of it is too valuable to omit. The Supreme Court says:

We do not say that Congress could not have authorized the removal of such a case into the Federal courts at any stage of its proceedings whenever a ruling should be made in it denying the equal protection of the laws to the defendant. Upon that subject it is unnecessary to affirm anything. It is sufficient to say now that section 641 does not * * *. It left them to the revisory powers of the higher courts of the State and ultimately to the review of this court.

There the court explicitly states that the Federal Government in its courts can see that the Federal courts can review a denial of justice to a State citizen in State courts; and yet people bring that case here as if it sustained their objections to the rights of the Federal Government to see that the State does give a man justice. Here the orators were asleep at the switch again or they never would have challenged our attention to this case of Virginia against Rives. The Supreme Court continues, page 321:

If, as was alleged in the argument, though it does not appear in the petition or record, the officer to whom was intrusted the selection of the persons from whom the juries for the indictment and trial of the petitioners was drawn, disregarding the statutes of the State, confined his selection to white persons and refused to select any persons of the colored race, solely because of their color, his action was a gross violation of the spirit of the State's laws as well as of the act of Congress of March 1, 1875, which prohibits and punishes such discrimination. He made himself liable to punishment at the instance of the State and under the laws of the United States. In one sense, indeed, his act was the act of the State and was prohibited by the constitutional amendment.

It is doubtless true that a State may act through different agencies, either by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities, and the prohibitions of the amendment extend to all action of the State denying equal protection of the laws, whether it be action by one of these agencies or by another. Congress, by virtue of the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment, may enforce the prohibitions whenever they are disregarded by either the legislative, the executive, or the judicial department of the State. The mode of enforcement is left to its discretion. It may secure the right—that is, enforce its recognition—by removing the case from a State court, in which it is denied, into a Federal court, where it will be acknowledged. Of this there can be no reasonable doubt. Removal of cases from State courts into courts of the United States has been an acknowledged mode of protecting rights ever since the foundation of the Government. Its constitutionality has never been seriously doubted.

In the above paragraph the Supreme Court again explicitly calls attention to the fact that under the fifteenth amendment a State may deny equal protection by either its legislative, judicial, or executive authorities, and Congress "may enforce the prohibitions whenever they are disregarded by either" and "the mode of enforcement is left to its discretion." The court simply says directly that when the time comes that the constitutional guaranties should be upheld by Congress, "the mode of enforcement is left to its discretion." Here is ample room and verge enough in the powers of Congress to enact a law that shall accomplish every necessary essential to guarantee the rights of the citizen against their denial by any State. Why, the argument of the learned barristers on this floor against the constitutionality of this proposed legislation is simply a reiteration and reaffirmance of the declarations of the Supreme Court in favor of such legislation. They cite case after case which amply demonstrates the fallacy of all their argument.

"I can call spirits from the vasty deep," said Glendower. "Aye, so can I, and so can any man, but will they come?" said Hotspur. These debaters against the antilynching bill have summoned the spirits, and thank God they come, they come, upholding the authority of the Congress of the Republic to guarantee equal rights before the law to its humblest citizen in its remotest township. These gentlemen have essayed to draw from their sources the principles of the supreme law of the land as interpreted by the Supreme Court of this great Republic, and there they are, gentlemen of the House, shedding the sunlight of human rights upon every human being within the limits and boundaries of this Nation of free people.

EX PARTE VIRGINIA.

This case, page 339, immediately followed the Rives case. In this case the United States arrested Judge Coles, of Virginia County, alleging that he kept men off the jury because they were black, in violation of the law in Virginia, and they asked for an order that he be discharged, and the State presenting its similar petition for it, and the Supreme Court held that the indictment was all right, "that he is correctly held to answer it." If he was guilty he ought to be punished for keeping black men off the jury because they were black, which they held would be denying a man the equal protection of the laws. The court says:

We held in the Strauder case that such an equal right to an impartial jury trial and such an immunity from unfriendly discrimination are placed by the amendment under protection of the General Government and guaranteed by it. We held further, that this protection and this guaranty, as the fifth section of the amendment expressly ordains, may be enforced by Congress by means of appropriate legislation.

In other words, the court held in this Virginia case that Congress can enact the law now proposed, and the court continues—

All of the amendments derive much of their force from this latter provision. * * * It is the power of Congress which has been enlarged. Congress is authorized to enforce the prohibitions by appropriate legislation. Whatever legislation is appropriate to secure to all persons the enjoyment of perfect equality of civil rights and the equal protection of the laws against State denial or invasion, if not prohibited, is brought within the domain of congressional power. Nor does it make any difference that such legislation is restrictive, or what the State might have done before the constitutional amendment was adopted. It is said the selection of jurors for her courts and the administration of her laws belongs to each State, that they are her rights. This is true in the general. But in exercising her rights, a State can not disregard the limitation which the Federal Constitution has applied to her power.

The court continues:

A State acts by its legislative, executive, or judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition, and as he acts in the name and for the State and is clothed with the State's power his act is that of the State. This must be so, or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State HAS clothed one of its agents with power to annul or evade it.

But the constitutional amendment was ordained for a purpose. It was to secure equal rights to all persons; and to insure to all persons the enjoyment of such rights power was given to Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation must act upon persons; not upon the abstract thing denominated a State, but upon the persons who are the agents of the State in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured.

You should read this case. It is nearly a library of the law on this subject, and I am divided between gratitude and wonder that the gentlemen who claim this bill is unconstitutional have introduced this decision to the argument.

They omitted, I believe, Ex Parte Clark, in which an Ohio election officer was convicted in the Federal courts for fooling with the ballot box at a congressional election. The court says:

The principal question is whether Congress had constitutional power to enact a law for punishing a State officer of election for the violation of his duty under a State statute in reference to an election of a Representative to Congress. Our opinion is that Congress had constitutional power to enact the law. The petitioner therefore must be remanded to the custody of the marshal for the southern district of Ohio, and it is so ordered.

In a very profound dissenting opinion Justice Field very aptly calls attention to the logical deductions from these decisions which knock Kentucky against Dennison in the head. He says, "I am not aware that the doctrine of this case which" (sic) "is so essential to the harmonious working of the State and Federal Government, has ever been qualified or departed from by this court until the recent decisions in the Virginia cases." That distinguished jurist, like the opponents of this proposed legislation, could not yet really believe that the fourteenth amendment meant anything, and I commend his logical deductions to these other students of ancient history (p. 414):

These decisions do indeed, in my judgment, constitute a new departure. They give to the Federal Government the power to strip the States of the right to vindicate their authority in their own courts against a violator of their laws when the transgressor happens to be an officer of the United States or alleges that he is denied or can not enforce some right under their laws. And they assert for the Federal Government a power to subject a judicial officer of a State to punishment for the manner in which he discharges his duties under her laws. The power to punish at all existing, the nature and extent of the punishment must depend upon the will of Congress and may be carried to a removal from office. In my judgment—and I say it without intending any disrespect to my associates—no such advance has ever before been made toward the conversion of our Federal system into a consolidated and centralized government.

The learned judge's logical mind saw at a glance the end of the reign of Judge Taney's case and the beginning of a new era. Forget it, gentlemen. Come out of the medieval fogs and stand with us in the sunlight of human freedom, won on battle fields and in courts, buttressed by the eternal principles of liberty and equality, under which the fourteenth amendment gives to all men equal protection under the laws of every State and enforces it by the officers of the United States in the courts of the United States.

Now, I am going to refer you to perhaps the best case there is in support of this legislation. Gentlemen have quoted cases all around it, but did not cite this one. I want to help them out with the case they overlooked entirely.

EX PARTE SIEBOLD.

(100 U. S., 387, 388, 389, 392, 393, 394, 395, and 396.)

In this case the Supreme Court says:

It is objected that Congress has no power to enforce State laws or punish State officers, and especially no power to punish them for violating the laws of their own State. As a general proposition this is undoubtedly true, but when in the performance of their functions State officers are called upon to fulfill duties which they owe to the United States as well as to the States has the United States no means of compelling such fulfillment? It certainly is not bound to stand by as a passive spectator of congressional elections when duties are violated and outrageous frauds are committed. The duties of the officers at Federal elections are owed as well to the United States as to the State. A violation of duty is an offense against the United States, for which the offender is justly amenable to the Government. No official position can shelter him from this responsibility.

The objection that the laws the violation of which is made punishable by act of Congress are State laws, and have not been adopted by Congress, is no sufficient answer to the power of Congress to impose punishment. The State laws which Congress sees no occasion to alter, but which it allows to stand, are in effect adopted by Congress. It simply demands their fulfillment. Content to leave the laws as they are, it is not content with the means provided for their enforcement. It provides additional means for that purpose, and we think it is entirely within its constitutional powers to do so.

Another objection made is that if Congress can impose penalties for the violations of State laws, the officers will be made liable to double punishment. The court then proceeds to suggest that probably he is so liable.

As a general rule it is no doubt expedient and wise that the operations of the State and National Governments should, as far as practicable, be conducted separately, but there is no reason for laying this down as a rule of universal application. It should never be made to override the plain and manifest dictates of the Constitution itself. We can not yield to such transcendental view of State sovereignty. The Constitution and laws of the United States are the supreme law of the land, and to these every citizen of every State owes obedience, whether in his individual or official capacity.

The court then speaks of the concurrent jurisdiction in such instances, the State, of course, being subordinate:

The views we have expressed seem to us to be founded on such plain and practical principles as hardly to need any labored argument for their support.

It seems to be often overlooked that a National Constitution has been adopted in this country, establishing a real government, operating upon persons, territory, and things, and which, moreover, is or should be as dear to every American citizen as his State government is; but if we allow ourselves to regard it as a hostile organization, opposed to the proper sovereignty and dignity of the State governments, we shall continue to be vexed with difficulties as to its jurisdiction and authority.

Somewhat akin to the argument which has been considered is the objection that the deputy marshals authorized by the act of Congress to attend these elections are authorized to keep the peace, and that this is a duty which belongs to the State authorities alone. It is argued that the preservation of peace and good order in society is not within the powers confided to the Government of the United States but belongs exclusively to the States. Here again we are met with the theory that the Government of the United States does not rest upon the soil and territory of the country. We think that this theory is founded on an entire misconception of the nature and powers of that Government. We hold it to be an incontrovertible principle that the Government of the United States may by means of physical force exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil, the powers and functions that belong to it. This necessarily involves the power to command obedience to its laws and hence the power to keep the peace to that extent. "This Constitution and all laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land." Without the concurrent sovereignty referred to the National Government would be nothing but an advisory government. Its executive power would be absolutely nullified.

Why do we have marshals at all, if they can not physically lay their hands on persons and things? What functions can they perform if they can not use force? Must they call on the nearest constable for protection and rely on him to keep the peace while they are soliciting and entreating parties and bystanders to allow the law to take its course? This is the necessary consequence of the positions that are assumed. If we indulge in such impractical views and keep on refining and re-refining, we shall drive the National Government out of the United States and relegate it to the District of Columbia or perhaps to some foreign soil. We shall bring it back to a condition of greater helplessness than that of the old Confederation. It must execute its powers or it is no government, and to do this it must necessarily have power to command obedience, preserve order, and keep the peace.

Gentlemen of the House, in other words the Supreme Court says that whenever the sheriff refuses to give protection to one attacked by a mob, the United States marshal "must necessarily have power to command obedience, preserve order, and keep the peace," and to snatch the victim from the funeral pyre or the noose and arrest for punishment this criminal sheriff and those other criminals who aid and abet him by violating the Constitution and hanging or burning a man without trial.

Gentlemen, let us come to the point. Every decision you have quoted with regard to the powers of Congress under the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments has been a case in which there was no claim at all that the State had denied anybody any right, except cases like Ex parte Virginia, where the State officer was held for trial by the United States court, and its jurisdiction approved. The cases that will be brought under this law will be brought because the State, through its officers, has denied men equal protection. There is not the slightest doubt that Congress has power to make such a law enforcing equal protection, in each State under its laws, of the guaranties of the fourteenth amendment. We have solemnly sworn to support those guaranties as much as any other part of the Constitution. Shall we carry out that oath?

The only question here is whether we will respond to requests from all over this country, among which we heard to-day those of the governors of Arkansas and Texas, that there shall be no more murderous riots like those at Chicago, East St. Louis, Tulsa, and no more such burnings as the recent one in Arkansas, where the governor had guaranteed the man a protection which the State was unable to give, just as Oklahoma, Illinois, and other States have been unable to give men the protection of their own State laws. It is a well-settled fact that the officers will not do their duty and that the States can not stop these mobs and it is now up to the Government of the United States to say whether its constitutional guarantee to men, of protection under State laws, "is a mere scrap of paper," or whether it is as our fathers have said to us, the supreme law of the land, under which all men can be assured that their sons will not be burned by drunken mobs, but will have fair trials in courts of justice, not trials before Judge Lynch, who never demands any evidence. That is the question here, and not a question of constitutionality, which has been absolutely settled by the very cases its opponents have cited, as well as by the Siebold case and the Clyatt case (197 U. S., 217).

THE CIVIL RIGHTS CASES.

I turn now to One hundred and ninth United States, pages 3 and 13, and direct your attention to the cases known as the Civil Rights cases, which these gentlemen have so eloquently cited here. I am going to cite them right back at them. The court decides this very issue, and I invite your grave consideration of this:

The fourteenth amendment is prohibitory upon the States only, and the legislation authorized to be adopted by Congress for enforcing it is not direct legislation on the matters respecting which the States are prohibited from making or enforcing certain laws, or doing certain acts, but is corrective legislation, such as may be necessary or proper for counteracting and redressing the effect of such laws or acts.

This bill is not direct legislation to stop one man from mobbing another. It is corrective legislation, when the sheriff refuses to assist a particular man, and the Supreme Court has held that that is very proper.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I can not yield; I have so brief a time. I read further from these cases, the civil rights cases:

And so in the present case, until some State law has been passed or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken, adverse to the right of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity, for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority. Of course, legislation can and should be provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises; but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against; and that is, State laws, or State action of some kind, adverse to the rights of the citizen secured by the amendment. * * *

In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but corrective legislation; that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which by the amendment they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the States may commit or take, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from committing or taking.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] promised to yield me 10 minutes further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for 10 minutes more.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, this case is perhaps as strong as any, and I shall conclude this part of it with another few sentences from the Supreme Court:

Under the fourteenth amendment it [the Congress] has power to counteract and render nugatory all State laws and proceedings which have the effect to abridge any of the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or to deprive them of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or to deny to any of them the equal protection of the laws. Under the thirteenth amendment the legislation, so far as necessary or proper to eradicate all forms and incidents of slavery and involuntary servitude, may be direct and primary, operating upon the acts of individuals whether sanctioned by State legislation or not; under the fourteenth, as we have already shown, it must necessarily be, and can only be, corrective in its character, addressed to counteract and afford relief against State regulations or proceedings.

That is when a sheriff refuses a man's rights. How can Congress be corrective, if not by such a bill?

THE UNITED STATES v. HARRIS.

Now, we hear a fanfare of trumpets, and the gentlemen lead into the ring The United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629–639). They entered this steed in the wrong class, which should have been announced as that decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which sustains the constitutionality of the anti-lynching bill now before the House. In that case the Supreme Court says, speaking of the fourteenth amendment:

When the State has been guilty of no violation of its provisions; when it has not made or enforced any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; when no one of its departments has deprived any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denied to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; when, on the contrary, the laws of the State, as enacted by its legislative and construed by its judicial and administered by its executive departments, recognize and protect the rights of all persons, the amendment imposes no duty and confers no power upon Congress.

Well, if the State has left undone everything it should have done and has done everything it should not have done, what have you to say then? Of course, the converse of the above at once becomes true. The Supreme Court has thus, in effect, stated what the law is, which will read as follows:

When the State has been guilty of violations of the fourteenth amendment; when it has made or enforced laws abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; when any of its departments have deprived a person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or has denied to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; when the laws of the State as enacted by its legislative and construed by its judicial and administered by its executive departments, do not recognize and protect the rights of all persons, the fourteenth amendment imposes the duty and confers the power upon Congress of enforcing the guaranty of the fourteenth amendment that no State shall deny to any person the equal protection of the laws.

This bill was drawn to enforce that guaranty in pursuance of the decision of the Supreme Court in this United States against Harris, and unless it is constitutional the judgments of the Supreme Court are as idle as a summer dream and the guaranties of the Constitution of the United States are as ineffective as the decrees of Shakespeare's kings as they strut the stage.

This much heralded Harris case simply states that Congress can not act to protect human rights under this provision of the Constitution until the State has declined to do its duty, and that whenever the State has refused to do its duty of giving a man equal protection, Congress can act and must act to maintain this guaranty. The trouble with the statute was, as the Supreme Court says on page 639:

It applies no matter how well the State may have performed its duty.

The reason this bill is constitutional is that if the State does its duty through its sheriff or other agents this legislation will not apply at all.

Sometimes it seems from the cases our opponents cite that either they are lost in the mist and maze of their eloquent and exuberant oratory or presume upon the laziness of the friends of this bill as to analyzing the citations.

In the Reese case (92 U. S., 217) the Supreme Court says:

Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States can be protected by Congress. The form and the manner of the protection may be such as Congress, in the legitimate exercise of its legislative discretion shall provide. These may be varied to meet the necessities of the particular right to be protected.

In the Cruikshank case (92 U. S.), which they cite with a great deal of glee, Chief Justice Waite says:

The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican Government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States; and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.

Yes, our powers are limited to enforcing this guaranty that all men shall have equal protection of the State's laws; and, gentlemen, our duty is to see that that guaranty which we are authorized to enforce is enforced.

JAMES v. BOWMAN.

This James case, found in One hundred and ninetieth United States, page 127, simply holds, like these other cases, that the authority granted Congress to make corrective legislation does not take effect until the State through some of its agencies has denied to a man his rights on account of race or color or previous condition of servitude, but makes it still more clear that whenever that denial comes from a State, Congress can make corrective legislation. Incidentally, the court held that the intent of the Constitution was that the Federal Government could only legislate as to voting, under that fifteenth amendment, when the denial was due to race, color, or former servitude, and that since the indictment failed to allege that the intimidation of colored voters in Kentucky was because of their color it failed to state proper grounds for a prosecution. This is simply another instance in which the Government needed a good lawyer. The decision cites many of the former cases, and in the citation from the Civil Rights Cases, One hundred and ninth United States, page 3, it reiterates the announcement as to what Congress can do when it says:

In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but corrective legislation; that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from making or enforcing; or such acts and proceedings as the States may commit or take and which by the amendment they are prohibited from committing or taking.

Yet the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] actually cited this very case as his authority for the declaration that this bill is unconstitutional.

In the debate on this subject a distinguished Member made the mistake of saying that in this James against Bowman case, "It was again declared that Congress possesses no power under either the thirteenth, the fourteenth, or the fifteenth amendments to enact such legislation as is here proposed."

This case of James against Bowman is made entirely under the fifteenth amendment and has no relation to the thirteenth or fourteenth. In the next place, of course the Supreme Court has never at any time held that Congress can not enact such legislation as is here proposed, but in practically every case cited here by our opponents it very distinctly and explicitly said that this is what Congress can do.

I revert to some of these cases here that these gentlemen have quoted, in Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., p. 318), the Supreme Court says:

> It is doubtless true that a State may act through different agencies, either by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities; and the prohibitions of the amendment extend to all action of the State denying equal protection of the laws.

Does it or does it not? Does it mean what it says? If it does, vote for this bill. It says further:

> Whether it be action by one of these agencies or by another.

You may enforce the provision. The mode of enforcement is left to the discretion of Congress. It may secure the right, it continues—

> By removing the case from a State court, in which it is denied, into a Federal court, where it will be acknowledged.

These cases, my friends, with two exceptions have been taken entirely from cases which these gentlemen have cited to me and to you heretofore.

In the course of a week or 10 days I have not been able, of course, to go all over the cases that might have been found. I am mostly justifying this contention of mine upon their cases. There is not a single one of them that supports their argument except the Taney case, which was reversed by the fourteenth amendment as applying to the principle involved there and the case I cited.

Gentlemen, we have a sworn duty to perform here. There is the Constitution, and it says that every man shall have equal protection before the law. You know that at East St. Louis and in Chicago and in many other places that was not done. The Constitution says that you have the power to take whatever steps are necessary.

HODGES, RIGGINS, POWELL, AND THE SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES.

The first three went out on the Hodges case, and the Supreme Court said of the indictment that no action of the State was complained of. Under the antilynching bill there will be plenty of complaint about the action of the State, and that is the reason it is constitutional and these other indictments were not.

In the Slaughterhouse cases the Supreme Court held that the State of Louisiana could create a monopoly of butcher houses in New Orleans and compel all the butchers to kill their cattle there, "for the health and comfort" of the people, provided the grant was "properly guarded." I guess the theory of the opposition must have been that because a butcher couldn't kill his steer in Audubon Park the sheriff could stand around and do nothing while the mob hanged a man in Plaquemine Parish. There is no connection between any of these cases and the discussion now before us.

Probably the Supreme Court will construe the various items of the bill together; but I think I shall offer an amendment that makes each by its very terms dependent upon the first provision that it is provided for a case where the State has failed, refused, or neglected to do its duty.

Under the Constitution the minute the sheriff refuses to give a man protection against a mob, then the Federal courts can have jurisdiction and the Federal marshal can proceed to do his duty of preserving the peace, of which the Siebold case speaks. He can arrest the sheriff who violated the terms of the Constitution and the proposed legislation. He can arrest the members of the mob who aid and abet the sheriff in violating this law and the Constitution, and who took advantage of the sheriff's refusal to do his duty, by committing or attempting to commit murder and violating the laws of their own State, and thus getting themselves within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, which are their courts, maintained under the Constitution of their country, whose laws it is their duty to respect and obey.

Most of the States of the Union have laws that cities and counties may be sued for damages done by mobs they permit, and that such cases may be maintained is elementary law which I have not heard discussed even in this debate as yet. If two counties are jointly or severally guilty of disobeying the law by their officers they would be jointly or severally liable. The law that cities and counties are liable in such cases is probably the oldest in the world, and is found in the Code of Hamurabi, which is more than 4,000 years old, and in the laws of most countries.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I am sorry I have not the time. The Supreme Court has said over and again in these cases I have cited and most of which have been cited by them, too, that when denial of protection is made Congress may legislate in whatever way seems best. I am sorry to say it has been suggested here that "a dead nigger would then become more valuable than a live one." Perhaps equal protection would make the live as valuable an asset as the dead. This is not a race question; it is a question of justice to all men, white and black. I noticed a suggestion here this afternoon that we are all of the same race in this Congress, as if that should be taken into consideration, and it reminded me of something that happened down in the Moro country during the Philippine wars. A young colored soldier from Kentucky and a young white lieutenant from the South were caught in a mountain defile by a band of Moros, who called to the black man to come out, that they were black, as he, and were only after the white man, to which he gave no attention. The gallant young white lieutenant urged him to go on out and save his life, saying it would not help the lieutenant any to have the black boy die; that they were as good as dead anyway, and that he should take advantage of the opportunity. Getting no response, he spoke sarcastically of the Negro and the little he owed to the whites, endeavoring, of course, to thus move him out. The colored boy said nothing, but—

> He put his hand to his cartridge belt,
> And back to his belt again,
> And loaded and fired like a well-drilled man,
> Till he counted his dead to ten.

And then he spoke:

> I aint fightin' fer love of you,
> Ner love of the breed you brag;
> I'm fightin' fer mammy in ole Kentuck,
> An' love of my country's flag.
>
> You 'tend to dem niggers along your front,
> An' I'll 'tend to mine,
> An' we'll go up to de gates of God,
> An' settle dat color line.

The general principles of equity always apply to every situation and in the long run are the best for all concerned.

Almost every man that has spoken has said he is opposed to lynching, and on that we agree. This bill, gentlemen, is bound to improve the situation. We all share the joint and several duty of sustaining the Constitution in this matter by appropriate legislation. There is another thing we all agree on. The gentlemen state very strongly that they are in favor of virtue, and I have been talking it over with those here on our side, and they are, too. [Laughter.] We agree upon everything except the constitutionality of this case. Now that the Supreme Court has settled that, let us stop lynching. Can you name one single case, except Taney's, that says that after a State, by its officers, has denied a man protection, the Federal Government can not step in? Go and find a case and bring it in here? You have not brought it here yet. Every single, solitary case has demonstrated if a State by its agents denies a man protection Congress can give him protection, and that is what this antilynching bill will do. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am in thorough sympathy with the spirit of the legislation proposed by the measure under consideration. Relief of the nature provided by this bill is absolutely necessary if the nefarious practice of lynching is to be stamped out in this country. It may be that some of the provisions of this measure are subject to criticism and should be amended, but let me remind you, gentlemen of the Congress, that the lynching disease is so deep-rooted and malignant that it will not yield to ordinary treatment; it requires the scalpel of the surgeon; colorless and teethless legislation will not suffice.

I take it that there is not a man in this Chamber that has the inclination much less the hardihood to attempt to defend, extenuate, or justify the practice of lynching. It is universally condemned, whether committed in the North or in the South. Whether practiced in New England or west of the Mississippi, we all admit that it is a wicked, damnable, diabolical crime, disgraceful of any community in which it may be perpetrated. The mob is a relic of the Dark Ages and is a product of barbarism. It has no eyes nor ears nor conscience. It is blind to justice and deaf to reason and is void of pity or compassion. Vengeance is its sole shibboleth, and in its bloody wake is found the charred and mangled bodies of its unfortunate victims, guilty and innocent alike. Fired by the mob spirit men become veritable maniacs, their "reason flees to brutish beasts," their sense of justice departs, and often crimes are committed too horrible for description or contemplation.

An incident occurred in my own district recently which shows the grim unreasonableness, the absolute recklessness, the utter disregard for justice of the mob, and demonstrates the imperative need for some sort of legislation of this character. A white woman had been assaulted. A poor, illiterate, unfortunate Negro tramp who happened to be in the locality where the dastardly crime was committed was arrested on suspicion and cast in prison. A mob immediately assembled. A cry went up for vengeance. A victim was demanded. Fired by the characteristic spirit of the mob, the jail was stormed, and in the excitement and stress of the hour a score or more of persons, many of whom were innocent by-standers—men, women, and children—were shot, trampled upon, or otherwise injured. The officers of the law successfully resisted and repelled the attack and saved the life of the poor, unfortunate Negro. The excitement of the affair soon subsided, and in less than 10 days the innocence of the Negro was established beyond the peradventure of a doubt, and he was discharged from prison and went his way without further molestation.

We all admit that every means should be provided to protect and safeguard the womanhood of the land. We all agree that the crime of rape is the most hideous and heinous to be found in the criminal catalogue. No death could be invented too cruel for the rape fiend. By his foul deed he forfeits every right to any sort of respectable or honorable consideration. Yet in the interest of law and order, yea in the interest of our boasted civilization, his punishment must be inflicted according to the forms of law, after he has been duly, legally, and constitutionally convicted. The demands of justice may be delayed for a few days, and peradventure some guilty fiend may escape punishment; but, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it were far better that a guilty man escape punishment occasionally than that an innocent man undergo the terrible tortures and ignominy of death at the hands of a cruel and relentless mob. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, does any Member believe that the fear of the mob has ever deterred anyone from the commission of this unspeakable crime? Certainly not. The infernal brute who attacks women is so steeped in degradation and is so void of conscience and soul that neither the noose nor the torch have any terrors for him. I am not influenced in my attitude on this bill out of any consideration whatever for the rapist. I am opposed to the mob because it moves without reason or responsibility, and thus menaces the innocent as well as the guilty. I am opposed to lynching as a matter of principle. I am opposed to it, because it is degrading and demoralizing in its very nature; because it is in defiance of law and breeds contempt and disrespect for our governmental institutions, and is therefore a species of anarchy.

The committee report accompanying and supporting this bill recites that from 1889 to 1921, 3,377 persons met their death at the hands of a mob in this country. Of the total number thus barbarously murdered, 2,658 were Negroes, 617 were whites, and 2 were Mexicans; and of this number 51 were women and 10 were ex-service men. Thus it appears that the mob neither respects the color nor the sex of its victim. If it were absolutely known that every person lynched was guilty of the crime imputed to him the enormity of the situation would be somewhat reduced, but the verdict of a mob is inexorable and is not subject to appeal or review, and therefore the guilty and the innocent suffer alike.

It is a common impression, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that all Negroes lynched have been charged with a crime against women, but the report of the committee exposes this fallacy. Less than one-third of the persons lynched, both white and black, have been charged with this unspeakable crime.

While I realize that numerous lynchings have occurred in this country which were beyond the power of the civil authorities to prevent, nevertheless, in my candid opinion, a large per cent of these outrages would not have happened had the officers charged with the upholding and enforcement of the law performed their full duty.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I can not. I have not sufficient time.

The fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution guarantees to every citizen the "equal protection of the law," and it is the solemn duty of every officer charged with the responsibility of upholding the law to employ every effort and means to make this provision of the Federal Constitution effective. This bill not only makes those who participate in a mob guilty of a felony but it also makes guilty of a felony any officer—State, county, or municipal, charged with the power or authority to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by a mob—who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to prevent such person from being so put to death. Too often, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the officers charged with upholding the law are in sympathy with law violations and merely make a pretense and a mockery of law enforcement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The whole country is sick nigh unto exhaustion with such travesty. The law must be enforced whether good or bad if our institutions shall prevail and our civilization continue. A good law should be enforced for manifest reasons, and only the genuine enforcement of a bad law will develop and expose its viciousness and lead to its repeal. With laws based on simple justice, sound human experience, and the spirit of the teachings of the meek and lowly Nazarene, and with officials with the courage, fidelity, and integrity to enforce them the future safety of our Nation is secure. The individual or community that can not trust the regular, ordinary governmental agencies and institutions to make good the guaranties of the Republic is sadly lacking in the essential elements of good citizenship. The majesty of the law must be vindicated and upheld, and order must be maintained irrespective of cost or hazard.

Mr. Chairman, the lofty sentiments of the immortal Lincoln are peculiarly apropos to-day:

> Let every American, every lover of liberty, every well wisher to his posterity, swear by the blood of the Revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country, and never to tolerate their violation by others. As the patriots of '76 did to the support of the Declaration of Independence, so to the support of the Constitution and laws let every American pledge his life, his property, and his sacred honor. Let every man remember that to violate the law is to trample on the blood of his father, and to tear the charter of his own and his children's liberty. Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling books, and almanacs, let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in the legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice. In short, let it become the political religion of the Nation.

[Applause.]

Gentlemen, I thank you.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, not having the opportunity to complete my remarks, I handed my manuscript to the reporter. I ask unanimous consent of the House that it may be printed in the RECORD in full.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three gentlemen are present—a quorum. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 72.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee refuses to rise.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, I am not going to undertake a constitutional discussion of the pending question. In the first place, I am not by any means the best qualified man to do it, and in the second place I could not do it in 10 minutes. But I am going to try to tell you a little story, a family story, that I think may be pertinent to the bill under consideration.

Most of us do not remember many incidents that occurred before we were 5 years old. Some familiar situations and some particular events, however, do stand out very clearly in our memories.

Generally my mother dressed my little sister and myself in the mornings, and while the process was going on we would hear father stropping his razor and we would call to him. He would come in to see us, and sometimes he would tease us and our mother by kissing us when the lather was on his face. But one Sunday morning our aunt, who lived with us, dressed us quite silently and hushed our noise, because, she said, papa was asleep and must not be disturbed. But I slipped into his room and did not find him there. Somehow there was a sort of awe throughout the house. I took my sister's hand, we tiptoed downstairs, and there we saw him. He was lying, in his shirt and trousers, on the old horsehair sofa. His eyes were closed. Mother was sitting beside him, bathing his face, and crying a little. There was a cut on his cheek and a small bruise on his forehead. In mother's lap was a washbasin half full of reddish water. She started to shoo us out of the room, but father put out his hand before we went and patted each of us and smiled at us.

Perhaps I would not now remember the incident of my father being sick that morning if it were not for another thing that happened several hours later. That thing was a joke to some people who saw it, and it seems ludicrous now, in a kind of a horrible way, but my sister and I were very much frightened at first and my father was angrier than I ever saw him at any other moment of my life.

The atmosphere of the house seemed to be charged with a sort of mysterious dread that morning. Nobody would talk to us children and we were vaguely uncomfortable, but pretty soon we saw something very interesting outside. Two farmer's boys, a little older than we were, appeared in the edge of the orchard dragging old Tige, our dog, with a rope around his neck. The rope was so tight that Tige could hardly yelp. One of the boys climbed into an apple tree and put the rope over a limb. Then he climbed down and both started to pull on it. Tige was heavy and they could not quite lift him. He was squirming and whining piteously. We ran out, shrieking to the boys to stop hurting Tige. With us pulling at the dog and the other youngsters pulling on the rope the poor beast was nearly gone when my father rushed upon us like a cyclone. He shook and cuffed the boys unmercifully. He seemed almost frantic. He grabbed each of us by the neck and hustled us into the house, and all the way he was exclaiming, "Children! My God! Children!"

I did not understand till long afterwards what it was all about, but later I knew that early in the morning the telephone had got father out of bed with the news that a mob was taking a man from the jail. My father was the prosecuting attorney. He ran most of the way into town and met them at the town end of the railroad bridge. He stood on the end of the bridge and held up his hands. He was young and vigorous. He was a popular public official. He was a most earnest and eloquent speaker with a strong, clear voice. They listened to him for several minutes. But no words could stay them from their purpose. If any words could have done it I am sure that his words would. He was pleading not so much for the life of one probably guilty wretch as for the life of the State. But words failed. The mob finally surged upon and over that brave, unarmed, devoted man. They left him, bruised and bleeding, on the ground, and they hanged their victim from the bridge.

No; that was not in the South and the victim was not a Negro. It happened at Kokomo, Howard County, Ind.

Later in the day my father was able, as I have said, to rescue a poor cur which children, inspired by the bloody example of their elders, would have killed in play.

Father never discussed that particular Indiana lynching with me. What I learned of the details I learned, as a boy, from others. But he talked with me many times about lynching. If there was any one thing which would particularly rouse his wrath it was the lawless resort to violence as a substitute for the law. Hatred of lynch law was his religion and he impressed that religion on me as the very essence of patriotism.

He wrote to me once on the subject when I was in college. We were living in Denver then. An Italian saloon keeper had killed an old soldier in a dispute over payment for a single glass of beer. A mob battered a wide breach in the side of the county jail and hanged Dan Arata near the courthouse yard. The repaired wall, with its slightly different brick, bears to this day a blot which is more than a blot on the wall. It is a blot on the soul of Colorado.

My father wrote to me:

> This sort of thing is the one great failure of the American people. It is a failure that may foreshadow the death of the Nation, because it means that our heart is not sound. The injustices of our laws can be ironed out—and most of them are gradually ironed out after they become apparent—but the contempt for the law itself is basic. It is a confession of our inability to govern by law. It destroys the only foundation upon which the Republic can rest.

In this flame of religious patriotism which lighted my father's clear thought on this subject I would have as little suspected the slightest smudge of partisanship or sectionalism as I would have doubted the honor of my mother. Father spoke very little of the South. He regarded lynching as a national vice, and he was especially depressed by cases of it in communities where he was himself a citizen and an officer of the law. He was not "self-deluded by the bluster of heroic words" like the Member from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], who fired in the RECORD the opening barrage against this bill, and to him "self-control" was a thing to be actually exercised by communities, not merely prated about in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an excuse for not exercising it.

I had hoped that my father might see me at such an hour as this; but, now that the hour has come, I am at a loss for words. I do not know how it is in my power to reply to the argument which has been put into the RECORD by a gentleman from Texas. My mind is unable to deal with its contemptible pettiness.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. No; I can not yield. In passing I want to say that I am glad the gentleman from Texas, by his interjection, has called my attention to his presence here, because I desire to pay him here my heartfelt and sincere compliment on the able, scholarly, and patriotic manner in which he has handled his side of this question, and because I want at the same time to comment on the very different handling of the subject in the opening barrage fired against this bill by another Member from his own State. I think it ought to be called to the attention of the House. This was the opening argument in the RECORD against this bill by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. The most effective reply, I think, is to exhibit it so that it may show for itself how far it is the "attitude of intemperate passion" which it professes to denounce. Listen:

> Mr. Chairman, with the Republican Party platform declaring:
> "We urge Congress to consider the most effective means to end lynching in this country, which continues to be a terrible blot on our American civilization"— > and, with the President's message, April 12, 1921, insisting that—
> "Congress ought to wipe the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly representative democracy"— > we have no misgivings as to the principles fostered in this Republican antilynching movement. It is politics and nothing but partisan politics from start to finish of the most reckless and virulent kind.
> Its political aim is partisan power.
> Its political motive is partisan advantage.
> Its political hope is partisan privilege.
> Its political fear is partisan loss.
> Its political prayer is partisan votes.
> Its political spirit is partisan greed.
> Its political principle is sectional hate.
> Its political passion is partisan life everlasting, ad infinitum, and with all the political plunder and perquisites. * * *
> Coming down, Mr. Chairman, to the spiritual merit of this Dyer bill and its kindred and associated measures, which constitute the summum malum of the entire dastardly budget of unpatriotic wickedness, leveled so unscrupulously at the heart of the Nation, the astounding fact is that such a practically impossible proposition can even have a day in court.

I do not know what the gentleman means by "ad infinitum," an expression neither Latin nor English, nor belonging to any other language, so far as I am aware. I do not know how one "levels" a budget. Like a pistol, I suppose. But I concern myself with the spirit and not with the form of these remarks.

Partisan? For Congress to consider the most effective means to end lynching?

Partisan? For the President of this Republic to urge that we wipe the stain from the banners of free and representative democracy? Who but a man whose vision has never lifted itself above the blindfold of partisan darkness could make such an assertion? Who but a man whose soul has never been lighted by a single ray of national spirit could pen those words?

Thank God, I was reared in a different light!

The only words which can describe the gentleman's speech are the words of the speech itself, "the summum malum of the entire dastardly budget of unpatriotic wickedness leveled so unscrupulously at the heart of the Nation." [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have listened to every word uttered during this debate, in an earnest effort to see both sides of this question, if indeed two sides there be, and I am of the opinion, strengthened by the debate, that this Congress will be faithless to itself and to the Constitution if it fails to take effective measures now to wipe from our banners the stain of lynching. The challenge is here and we must answer it.

Mr. Chairman, it is a terrible thing to take ruthlessly and unlawfully the life which no human power can restore. But it is a more terrible thing to strike a murderous blow at the life of the American Nation through lynch law.

I saw the other day a ghastly photograph of a Negro victim of a mad mob, hanging from a tree, his body riddled with bullets.

Staring out of that picture of bestial ferocity was a fact that struck like a blow, "Not this helpless black man was lynched here, but the laws of the United States."

I saw another picture of even greater horror. A young colored man lying in a flaming fire which ate the flesh from his bones, while a blood-thirsty mob jeered at his agony.

In letters of flame across the black picture was a warning for all who have eyes to see, "Not this Negro was burned here but the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. Chairman, the fundamental basis of the American Government is equal rights. It was to establish that idea and ideal that this Nation was founded. To carry it into effect is America's separate and sacred mission in the world.

The Declaration of Independence is the immortal announcement of that doctrine:

We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men.

The Constitution was drafted and adopted for the express purpose of securing an organization which should secure the rights of life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness to every American citizen. Its stated purpose is to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty.

The class of citizens was enlarged and their rights guaranteed by three separate amendments to the Constitution. The thirteenth amendment made free men out of slaves, and I believe made them citizens. But to make assurance doubly sure the fourteenth amendment declared them citizens of the United States, entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens.

The moment the thirteenth amendment was ratified slavery was outlawed. The Negroes took exactly the status they would have had if they had never been enslaved. They became a part of the people of the State and the Nation.

This amendment repealed every enactment that upheld slavery and erased every judicial decision against freedom. It blotted out of the Constitution itself every clause that recognized the right of property in human flesh and blood.

That amendment should have been sufficient. By making men free it made them citizens. But it was found by bitter trial that the legal destruction of slavery and involuntary servitude, still left the Negro a helpless victim. The fourteenth amendment was submitted and ratified in an effort to make sure that the protection of the flag belongs to every citizen, black or white.

But it was still more than that. Justice Field of the United States Supreme Court well stated the reasons for the adoption of this amendment. He said:

The fourteenth amendment grew out of a feeling that a nation which had been maintained at such costly sacrifices was, after all, worthless if a citizen could not be protected in all his fundamental rights, North and South, East and West, throughout the limits of the Republic. The amendment was not, as held in the opinion of the majority, primarily intended to confer citizenship on the Negro race. It had a much broader purpose. It was intended to justify legislation extending the protection of the National Government over the common rights of all citizens of the United States, and thus obviate objection to the legislation adopted for the protection of the emancipated race. It was intended to make it possible for all persons of every race and color to live in peace and security wherever the jurisdiction of the Nation reached. It therefore recognized, if it did not create, a national citizenship. This national citizenship is primary and not secondary.

Mr. Chairman, the fourteenth amendment imposes a sacred obligation upon the Federal Government to protect its citizens everywhere. The power to do so is contained in it. Under it the Federal Government can go into every State, with effective remedy—must do so if the weakest or humblest citizen is not protected against tyranny and oppression.

It is a contract between the Government and the citizen. That contract calls for loyal allegiance on the part of the citizen and sure protection on the part of the Nation. The fourteenth amendment made us all citizens of the Nation. The United States can not shirk its sacred duty, its first and greatest responsibility, the securing of exact and equal justice to every citizen beneath the flag, whether he dwell in a Negro hut or in a millionaire's palace.

The States have proved themselves unable or unwilling to prevent lynching. The rule of the mob which defied the Constitution must be overthrown by national action.

This problem knows no geography. Lynching is not sectional. North and South, East and West all have alike witnessed the palsy of local government in the face of outlawry. State after State has added to our shame. Every orgy of lawlessness has disgraced the Nation.

In 31 years there have been 2,600 Negroes murdered by mobs in this land of the free and home of the brave. Against the wildfire of the mob they have had no defense. During all this long period, covering an entire generation, every five days has witnessed that most terrible sight—an American citizen dangling on a tree or burning at a stake, while red-handed and black-hearted lawbreakers roared out their scorn of American laws and America's Constitution. Every lynching was a brutal assault upon the majesty of the law, but in all that period no party of lynchers was ever brought to justice.

In 1919, the year after our great adventure to make the world safe for democracy, 78 colored men were deprived of the American right of a fair trial and were murdered in cold blood. Fourteen of these were burned to death, 31 were shot, 24 were hanged, 2 were beaten to death, 1 cut to pieces, and 1 drowned.

How ruthless were these assaults upon that Constitution which Madison said would have a beneficent effect upon the human race. What an attack upon the Government organized to secure equal and exact justice to all. It matters not what heinous crimes were charged against these victims. No individual offense in all the black code of criminality justifies the destruction of the very foundation of ordered government.

I point no finger of scorn at the South when I say that my own State of Pennsylvania has had the experience which has followed mob massacres in Georgia, South Carolina, and other Southern States.

On Sunday, August 13, 1911, Zack Walker was taken out of the hospital in Coatesville, dragged half a mile along the ground, thrown upon a pile of wood, drenched with oil, and burned alive.

Walker was accused of the murder of a private policeman at the steel mills. Hundreds of persons took part in this anarchistic disregard of the laws and the Constitution.

There was a chorus of execration from every newspaper in the State. The governor issued a proclamation calling for the punishment of the guilty ones. The State constabulary was called out. Judge Butler on the bench made a vigorous charge to the grand jury, but not a single guilty man was punished.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have not much time, but I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Could a Federal judge have done more than the State judge did?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I believe so. I believe the county was in such an inflamed condition at that time that an impartial trial was not granted and that a wider jurisdiction would have assured justice in a State with a record of 200 years against slavery and racial oppression.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thought the gentleman said there was no indictment.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; I did not mean that. The grand jury indicted several individuals, and the cases were brought to trial at the county seat. The jury brought in a verdict of not guilty, in spite of the instructions of the judge that every person abetting the act with his presence and assent was legally guilty of murder.

The prosecution collapsed. Not a single member of the mob was punished, although the leaders and instigators of the crime were known to thousands. Any secret-service man could have secured the facts in a day.

Mr. Chairman, that is the exact situation in almost every lynching and mob murder. The local authorities can not or will not enforce the laws against fiendish murders. The time has passed to apologize for lynching, or even to explain it. It must be stamped out.

The Nation must deal with this national menace of mob rule. As President Harding has said:

Congress ought to wipe the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly representative democracy.

When a Negro is lynched it is an open declaration of supreme contempt for the black race. The whole machinery of law is in the hands of the whites. There is no danger of any guilty Negro cheating the ends of justice. To lynch the accused man is not to punish crime but to express hatred and contempt for a race.

One of the marvelous things in our history is the patience with which these millions of a race brought here against their will have endured outrages.

They have peacefully petitioned for redress of their grievances and Congress has kept them like squirrels in a cage, treading the wheel of vain endeavor.

Once, in 1903, despairing of remedy, they issued an address to emperors and kings of the Old World praying for intervention.

We have—

They declared—

time and again pleaded and appealed to Congress to enforce the law and stop wholesale murder, but every plea and appeal has been in vain.

This pitiful plea was sent to the Kaiser of Germany, the Czar of Russia, the Sultan of Turkey, the Mikado of Japan, and the other rulers. To such length had the refusal of the American Government to protect its own citizens driven millions of Americans.

But the next year and every succeeding year the Negroes have come to Congress asking for their protection in inalienable rights.

Not many months ago I took a midnight train from Pittsburgh to Washington. I was sitting alone in the smoking room and as we came to a stop at a station a packet of papers was tossed through the window and alighted at my feet. I picked it up and found it was a proclamation from the United Communist Party, addressed to the Negroes of the United States. It called attention to the Tulsa massacre and the other race riots and to various lynchings.

In large black letters I read this anarchistic appeal to the Negroes:

Our Negro workers were supposed to have been emancipated during the American Civil War. The Constitution is supposed to guarantee their freedom. Since then they have been burned alive, lynched, murdered, and brutally assaulted upon the slightest provocation. The hideous accusation of rapine has been fastened upon their entire race. This is the kind of freedom that the capitalist Constitution guarantees to the working class. That is the only kind of freedom that the workers can expect from the capitalist Government of the United States. The communist party calls upon our colored comrades to organize and with arms in their hands to resist the murderous armed assaults upon their homes, their women, and their children.

There was a great deal more in a similarly red strain. I dropped one of the leaflets on the floor, and when the colored porter came in I was busily engaged reading my newspaper. He saw the circular, picked it up, and read it through carefully. Then, with a grunt of disgust, he tore it into very small pieces and threw them out of the window, rubbing his hands together as though to rid them of something unclean. [Applause.] The poisoned arrows of the red propaganda had failed to find a mark in him. Member of a race which has suffered from red uprising, he scorned a lawless reprisal.

Mr. Chairman, his individual action is typical of the action of the colored race as a whole. In spite of soul-sickening injustices, they have remained steadfastly true to American institutions. No race has ever shown more patient submission to injustice. Never yet has America seen a Negro organization bent on the overthrow of Government by force. Never yet has the Negro flaunted the red flag of anarchy in defiance of the Stars and Stripes.

Always he has been humbly faithful to this country. In 1750 a young Negro by the name of Orispus ran away from his master in Framingham, Mass. Advertisements were inserted in the newspapers, but he could not be found. Twenty years later he was a member of a little band in Boston that resisted the tyranny of King George III. When the King's soldiers attempted to use the bayonet against them, he led the first charge against the British despotism. He fell the first martyr for American liberty, with five bullets in his body.

In the War of 1812 Gen. Andrew Jackson, in a public proclamation, paid a glowing tribute to the colored soldiers under his command. During the Civil War they fought with the Union with bravery sufficient to win the highest praise from gallant commanders. Nick Bidder, a Negro, was the first man wounded in the Union cause. During the last war they kept to their record faithfully and performed their duty, whether in the fighting line or in other service.

No finer tribute has been paid the Negro soldier than by Col. James A. Moss, who said in 1918:

Understanding the Negro as I do, and knowing his responsibilities as a soldier, I consider myself fortunate in having been assigned to the command of a colored regiment. Of my 23 years' experience as an officer, I have spent 18 with colored troops, having commanded Negro troops in the Cuban campaign and in the Philippines campaign, so that what I say about the Negro soldier—my faith, my confidence in him—is based on long experience with him in garrison and the field; in peace and in war. I do not hesitate to make the assertion that if properly trained and instructed, the Negro will make as good a soldier as the world has ever seen. The proper training and instruction of the Negro soldier is a simple problem—it merely consists in treating him like a man, in a fair and square way, and in developing the valuable military assets he naturally possesses in the form of a happy disposition, pride in the uniform, tractibility, and faithfulness. Anyone who says that the Negro will not fight does not, of course, know what he is talking about.

The first fight I was ever in, the battle of El Caney, Cuba, July 1, 1898 I had Negroes killed and wounded all around me, 20 per cent of my company having been killed and wounded in about 10 minutes' time, and the behavior of the men was splendid. At no time during that and in subsequent fights did my men hesitate at the command to advance or falter at the order of charge. I expect my colored regiment to be fully as well drilled, as well instructed, as well behaved, and as good fighters as any other regiment in the National Army. Lest some might think that what I have to say about the Negro soldier is only fulsome words of a Yankee negrophile, let me say that I am a native Louisianian, who did not leave the confines of the State until I went to West Point at the age of 18.

Mr. Chairman, if America calmly continues on a course of indifference to the lynching horrors which still blacken our record, it will go guilty of a faithlessness beyond that of any nation in the history of the world. Surely no man with a spark of decent feeling but will admit that the Negro is entitled to a square deal under the flag he has so gallantly defended.

The requests of the colored people are so moderate in view of the facts that they shame us. They do not ask for revenge for the numberless crimes committed against them; they ask only justice for the future. They are willing to forget the past, forget the miseries and the murders, the tears and the agonies, the lynchings and burnings of 50 years.

We dare not refuse their cry for justice. If this is a Nation whose Government is bound to protect its citizens, if the Constitution is no weak, faltering thing which is shorn of power by the color line, then this Congress must decide whether Judge Lynch or the Constitution shall be supreme. The real American will never fear this law, but the anti-American will and should fear it.

This measure will help do exactly what the fathers intended, it will reestablish the broken faith of the sixties and help make the Constitution a law to which all men who here abide shall render respect and obedience, without exception, and a shield for the rights of every human beneath the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13, the antilynching bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CLEARWATER, ST. JOE, AND SELWAY NATIONAL FORESTS.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 77) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests, disagree to the Senate amendments thereto, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees on the part of the House:

Mr. SINNOTT, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, and Mr. RAKER.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a statement made in the New York Times by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] giving a review of what has been accomplished by the Republican administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in connection with the anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans, fought on January 8, 1815, by incorporating therein a paper read before the Louisiana Historical Society by W. O. Hart, a distinguished citizen and jurist.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in connection with the anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans, fought on January 8, 1815, by incorporating therein a paper read before the Louisiana Historical Society by W. O. Hart, a distinguished citizen and jurist, whose contributions to New Orleans newspapers have been the source of a liberal education in themselves to thousands of our people—boys and girls, men and women, young and old. I append herewith said address. Mr. Hart is a splendid civilian, he is an ornament to the Louisiana bar, and, as a magnificently equipped lawyer, is a valuable member of the American Bar Association and many law fraternities. He is a great Louisiana historian, writing page after page of its more recent history into newspapers, law journals, and the records of our courts. But above all these he is a great American, kind, considerate, and affectionate to all. He has indeed lived to bless mankind.

The address is as follows:

CLARK MILLS.

[Paper read before the Louisiana Historical Society on June 28, 1921, by Mr. W. O. Hart.]

Clark Mills, the sculptor of the three Jackson statues and of other great works of art, was born in Onondaga County, N. Y., on December 1, 1815, and died in the city of Washington, D. C., on January 12, 1883.

He was left an orphan at the age of 5 years, and then lived with a maternal uncle, but becoming dissatisfied with his home ran away in 1828. After a hard experience working on a farm, cutting cedar posts in a swamp, and learning the millwright's trade, he reached New Orleans, La., where he stayed a year and then went to Charleston, S. C. Here he learned the stucco business, which he followed until 1835, when he discovered a new method of taking a cast from the living face, which enabled him to make busts so cheaply that he soon had as much work as he could do. He then resolved to try cutting in marble, and began a bust of John C. Calhoun, for which he was awarded a gold medal by the city council of Charleston, and it was placed by them in the city hall. Subsequently he executed busts of John Preston, Wade Hampton, and other eminent South Carolinians. He was invited in 1848 to furnish a design for an equestrian statue of Andrew Jackson, to be erected in Washington. He completed his model in eight months and it was accepted. His treatment was entirely original. The statue was unveiled on the anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans, in 1853. It stands on Lafayette Square, and was cast from cannon taken from the British during the War of 1812. Later he obtained a second commission for a colossal equestrian statue of George Washington, and purchased ground in the vicinity of Washington, where he built a complete foundry. His statue of Washington represents a scene in the Battle of Princeton. It was dedicated in Washington on February 22, 1860. Meanwhile Mr. Mills also executed a replica of his Jackson statue for the city of New Orleans, La. In 1860 he began his statue of "Freedom," after Thomas Crawford's designs, which was completed in 1863, and now stands above the Dome of the Capitol. The latter part of his life was spent in making busts, and he invented a method of putting plaster on the face of his subjects, thereby adding greatly to the truthfulness of his casts.

The first equestrian statue of Andrew Jackson was erected in the city of Washington in what is known as Lafayette Square and was unveiled on January 8, 1853, the thirty-eighth anniversary of the Battle of of New Orleans, where the orator of the day was Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, then a Member of the Senate of the United States and one of the unsuccessful candidates for the Presidency in 1860.

At the close of the address of Mr. Douglas, amidst shouts of the thousands who had surrounded him, Clark Mills was introduced. He had no words to express his feelings, and in lieu of words he pointed to the veiled statue; the veil was instantly withdrawn, and Jackson on his steed, as if in full action, full of life and energy, was revealed. That was his speech, and none could have been more appropriate. Without instruction, without instruments or appliances, with but little encouragement, and against the remonstrances and hindrances of men of art and men of science, he labored for years and by a simple gesture he pointed to the result of his labors. The scene was most picturesque, and at the close of the ceremonies many of the spectators lingered in admiration of the matchless work which the hands of a man of the people had fashioned.

The first replica of the statue is in Jackson Square in New Orleans and was unveiled on February 9, 1856, when Mr. Mills explained to the people the idea which guided him in fashioning the statue in this language:

"The statue before you represents one who, with a handful of men, proved himself the savior of your beautiful city. Gen. Jackson is there represented as he appeared on the morning of the 8th of January, 41 years ago. He has advanced to the center of the line in the act of review; the lines have come to present arms as a salute to their commander, who is acknowledging it by raising his chapeau, according to the military etiquette of that day. His restive horse, anticipating the next move, attempts to dash down the line; the bridle hand of the dauntless hero, being turned under, shows that he is restraining the horse, whose open mouth and curved neck indicate that the animal is feeling the bit. I have thought this explanation necessary, as there are many critics who profess not to understand the conception of the artist."

The fantastic story regarding this statue that the horse stands balanced without even being bolted is incorrect, because a recent examination thereof by Mr. Robert Glenk, a member of the society, has shown that the horse is securely fastened.

The last public appearance of the great sculptor, Mr. Mills, was when the third of the Jackson statues was unveiled in the city of Nashville on May 29, 1880, where Louisiana was most worthily represented by Gen. W. J. Behan, a member of the Louisiana Historical Society, and several others, including four veterans of the Battle of New Orleans. This was the last public address of Mr. Mills, and here is what he said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, having been requested to make some remarks on this occasion before the distinguished people of Nashville, I will state that the statue before you is a triplicate of the one now standing in front of the President's House in Washington, which was not only the first equestrian statue ever self-poised on the hind feet in the world, but was also the first ever molded and cast in the United States.

"The incident selected for representation in this statue occurred at the Battle of New Orleans, on the 8th of January, 1815. The commander in chief has advanced to the center of the lines in the act of review. The lines have come to present arms as a salute to their commander, who acknowledges it by raising his chapeau 4 inches from his head, according to the military etiquette of that period. But his restive horse, anticipating the next evolution, rears and attempts to dash down the line, while his open mouth and curved neck show that he is being controlled by the hand of his noble rider.

"I have deemed this explanation important to answer a criticism upon the fact that the horse is rearing and Jackson has his hat off. Critics should reflect that a spirited war horse, although brought to a halt, will not long remain so.

"The city of Nashville has just cause for pride from the fact that of the three statues cast from the same model the one before you is the most perfect of them all."

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MOORE of Illinois, at the request of Mr. BROOKS of Illinois, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUMPHREYS, for continued leave of absence for one week, on account of the illness of his wife.

To Mr. LANHAM, for to-day, on account of illness.

To Mr. HAMMER, from January 11 to January 17, 1922, on account of business.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 2914. An act to add certain lands to Minidoka National Forest;

H. R. 5700. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old Subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.;

H. R. 6380. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended;

H. R. 7204. An act to provide a Government-owned water system for the Fort Monroe Military Reservation;

H. R. 8344. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes;

H. R. 8401. An act to transfer the custody and control of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department; and

H. R. 9021. An act to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is put I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withhold the motion?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, at an earlier hour to-day I made a motion to adjourn, and the Speaker held the motion to be dilatory. The gentleman from Minnesota makes this motion to adjourn and nothing is said about it. Is that the equal protection of the constitutional laws that we are working for in the consideration of the antilynching bill? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman intends that as a point of order, the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 11, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

461. A report from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, transmitting report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, concerning real estate held by the War Department (H. Doc. No. 148); ordered to be printed.

462. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, under the subhead "Emergency shipping fund," in the amount of $100,000,000, as a substitute for the estimate submitted in the budget for the fiscal year 1923 (H. Doc. No. 149); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

463. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Coos Bay Harbor and Isthmus Slough, Oreg. (H. Doc. No. 150); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MAPES, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2776) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Columbia River at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon, to a point on the opposite shore of the State of Washington, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 547), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. VESTAL, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 227) extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of five years from March 21, 1922, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 548), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2532) for extending the time within which allotments may be made in the Crow Reservation, Mont., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 549), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7426) creating a revolving fund of $30,000 for the Rosebud Sioux Indians, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 550), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9383) to authorize the erection of a monument as a memorial to Indians of the Rosebud Reservation who lost their lives in the World War, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 553), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PARKER of New York, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2199) to provide for the marking of anchorage grounds in waters of the United States, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 554), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LEHLBACH, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to which was referred the bill (S. 2802) to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 555), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 11, 1922.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 10, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Glass	McKellar	Poindexter
Broussard	Gooding	McLean	Pomerene
Bursum	Hale	McNary	Ransdell
Capper	Harris	Moses	Robinson
Caraway	Harrison	Myers	Sheppard
Colt	Heflin	Nelson	Spencer
Culberson	Hitchcock	New	Stanfield
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Sterling
Curtis	Kenyon	Norris	Townsend
Dial	Keyes	Oddie	Trammell
Edge	King	Owen	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	Ladd	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pepper	Warren
France	McCormick	Phipps	Willis

Mr. HEFLIN. My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is absent attending the Conference on Limitation of Armament. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is detained on account of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the absence on official business of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. HARRIS. My colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

PROPOSED SALE OF MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, when legislation was pending before the Senate in regard to the development of the large water power at Muscle Shoals it was charged by me and by others that the Fertilizer Trust and the Power Trust were trying to defeat the legislation. It was denied at the time by those who opposed this legislation. I wish to refer to a circular just issued by the National Fertilizer Association in relation to this matter. They have sent these circulars to Members of Congress, newspaper correspondents, and others.

The Secretary of War is handling the matter for the Government, and every Senator knows that he is one of the ablest business men who has occupied that position in a long time. He has the confidence of the Members of the Senate. He formerly served here as a Member of this body, and we know that he is taking care of the Government's interests. But the National Fertilizer Association do not think so, and they think we need help from them, as if the able Secretary of War was not competent to advise us what is best for our Government. They send information to us about Muscle Shoals which they think will prejudice Congress against the development of this great power, and close by saying:

The National Fertilizer Association, at 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa, will be glad to furnish you further information on this subject.

I simply wish to call it to the attention of the Senate to show that the Fertilizer Trust has been from the very beginning of the Muscle Shoals development trying to defeat it in order that they may maintain the high prices of fertilizer, which the farmers of the South and West must pay.

Every other Government among the great powers except the United States has a nitrate plant for the manufacture of munitions in times of war, but we are dependent upon getting nitrates from Chile, and the War Department urged the development of Muscle Shoals power plant to make us independent of Chile or any other country in times of war. The Muscle Shoals plant would be used in times of peace to manufacture cheap fertilizers to be sold to the farmers at cost and also to furnish power in competition with the power trusts of that section. The Fertilizer Trust is trying to prevent our Government preparing for war, because in peace times the farmers could buy cheap fertilizers. Farmers have suffered more than those engaged in any other industry, and we should help them every way possible.

CONDITION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Committee on Appropriations to the condition of the school buildings in this city, more particularly to the question of heat and light in some of the buildings. Within the last 30 days on two different occasions one school, to wit, the Morgan School, had to send the children home because the furnace would not give sufficient heat. I am not certain about the others, but in that building they had no light except gas, which is very inadequate. On a day like to-day, when it is dark and cloudy, it is very difficult for the children to study.

The thought occurred to me that perhaps around some of these abandoned Army camps they might have a furnace which would be suitable to heat some of the school buildings in this city. I have had the matter up with some of the officials, but I am referred by one to another, as is usual in Government matters, and have not yet been able to locate the responsible party. It seems to me very important that we furnish the children of the District with sufficient heat and light, at least. I am greatly in favor of economy, but it is false economy not to provide these facilities in connection with their education.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, during the course of the debate yesterday there was some confusion on the floor and the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Rose, was making some observations to the occupant of the chair, which I now understand related to the procedure of the Senate. Owing to the confusion, I misunderstood the situation and perhaps said something that was construed as criticizing Mr. Rose. I think I did the Assistant Secretary an injustice. Mr. Rose, the Assistant Secretary of this body, is one of the most efficient men in public life. I do not know what the Senate would do without him. We could get along without some Senators, but we could not get along without Mr. Rose. Not only as Assistant Secretary are his services invaluable but as a parliamentarian he measures up to the highest standard. His fairness and impartiality, his loyalty to the Senate, and his fine and able services make him an indispensable factor in the work of this body.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CALDER presented 10 petitions of sundry citizens of Tompkinsville, Brooklyn, West New Brighton, Port Richmond, Staten Island, and New York City, all in the State of New York; New Haven, Conn.; and Hoboken and Elizabeth, N. J., praying for the recognition of the Irish republic by the Government of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Mr. SMOOT introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 154) creating the President's forest within the present Kaibab National Forest, Ariz., as a game sanctuary and forest preserve for the benefit and enjoyment of the people, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

PAIUTE INDIAN LANDS IN NEVADA.

Mr. ODDIE submitted an amendment providing that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to bring 4,887 acres of Paiute Indian lands in the State of Nevada within the provisions and benefits of a drainage district, organized pursuant to the laws of said State, for the purpose of draining lands within the Newlands irrigation project, and appropriating $2,500 for the purpose of paying the first installment assessable against said lands: Provided, however, That the total amount of the charges assessed against said lands shall not exceed $49,603.05, and shall be payable in 20 annual installments, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Interior Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 172, submitted by Mr. SPENCER November 15, 1921, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], in the nature of a substitute, denying the right of Truman H. Newberry to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], in his anxiety to charge that Senators on this side of the Chamber were actuated in their attitude in the so-called Newberry case by their animosity toward the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], said that every speech I had made on this subject had indicated that I myself was animated by that spirit. I said then that I had not discussed the Newberry case, but expected to do so. This morning I wish to occupy for a brief time the Senate with an examination of one issue of the case.

It has been said over and over again by the apologists for the junior Senator from Michigan that while the expenditures were large not a dollar of the money had been shown to have been used for corrupt purposes, for bribery. I purpose to discuss that phase of the case this morning. If I can not show by the sworn testimony of witnesses, whom nobody so far has under his oath undertaken to contradict, that bribery was one of the objects and one of the methods of securing the nomination of the sitting Member from Michigan, I shall not further oppose his seating. Unlike the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who was impatient and discourteous with me when I wished to ask him a question, I shall be glad at any time to be interrupted for the purpose of a correction. I shall point Senators to the names of witnesses, the pages of the record where their testimony is shown, who substantiate my statement. I am going to show that the common practice was bribery; that it was not in isolated cases, but it was the rule. People were told that if they would work for Newberry they would be paid $5 or $7 or $10 a day, as the case might be, and some of them even hundreds of dollars; that if they would get results they would be paid twice as much. Some of them were put to work with the understanding that they should not be paid at all unless they could show results. I shall show that promises were made, that offices were promised, that rewards of one kind or another were held out to those whose influence it was desired to secure, and that threats of punishment were hurled against others if they did not succumb to the wishes of the so-called "business men's committee," the voluntary committee which was conducting the campaign in Michigan for the nomination of Truman H. Newberry.

First let me read what the Supreme Court of Indiana and other courts have approved as the meaning of the word "bribe":

A bribe may be defined as a gift, advantage, or emolument offered, given, or promised to an elector to influence his conduct or vote.

In other words, it is not necessary in order to constitute a bribe to give an elector money or something else of value to have him vote as desired, but if he is induced to change his attitude toward a candidate's candidacy; to become active when otherwise he would have been passive, or to become passive when he otherwise would have been active, whoever induces him to do that for a consideration gives a bribe, and the man who accepts it receives a bribe. The Supreme Court of Indiana has said so.

Now, when Mr. Newberry's managers asked a man to become active for Newberry and he said, "Well, I should like to do it but I can not do it for nothing"; and they said, "Very well, we will pay you to become active," they bribed that man as much as if he had said, "I will not vote for Newberry," and then he had been told if he would vote for Newberry he would be given $5, and he had accepted the $5 and voted for Newberry. One would be as much of a bribe as the other, or the supreme court so quoted does not know what bribery is. And one is as great an enemy of good government as the other. The record is full, from beginning to end, of instances of men who were so employed to act for Newberry for a consideration. Every one of them was bribed and every man who gave the consideration was guilty of giving a bribe.

The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] said, if I understood him correctly, that it was rather a common practice in politics in Missouri so to hire people to do acts in political campaigns. Well, if it is, and if the courts know what is bribery, then the common practice in Missouri is to bribe.

However, before I reach that point, let us examine for a moment one other feature of the case. The junior Senator from Michigan, whose "friends"—and I use that word in quotations—kept him from appearing before the Committee on Privileges and Elections in order that he might not be questioned about what he did know about this case, came before the Senate with a "prepared statement." It was said in the newspapers days before he came that he would have "a prepared statement." I presume the word "prepared" means that somebody prepared it for him. Everybody who heard him read it knows that he was not familiar with it; that he read it with hesitation; that he misconstrued what he really had on the paper and had to go back and correct it. Therefore, I am sure that it was as unfamiliar to him as it was to anybody who listened to him read it. Therefore, he had "a prepared statement." Who prepared it, I do not know; whether it was one of his "friends" here in the Senate who the Senator from Missouri assured me in his colloquy with me were supporting Senator Newberry, or whether it was one of his "friends" on the outside who did it, I do not know; whether it was one of his "friends" who put up hundreds of thousands of dollars——

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. FRANCE. I hold that the words used by the Senator from Arkansas are in violation of one of the rules of the Senate. I refer to section 2 of Rule XIX, which reads:

2. No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senator from Arkansas has intimated that a Senator here has had a speech prepared for him which he has read on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield to me, I suggest that, upon the very face of the point of order and the statement of it by the Senator from Maryland, the point of order does not come within the rule quoted by him.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. Let us not argue that question.

Mr. SPENCER. I merely wish to add to the point of order which the Senator from Maryland has raised, that the Senator from Arkansas——

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask that this be not taken out of my time, Mr. President.

Mr. SPENCER. The debate in reference to the point of order will not come out of the Senator's time, as I understand. The Senator from Arkansas also stated that "bribery is the common practice in the State of Missouri," which statement is in violation of another rule of the Senate. I had no intention of paying any attention to the matter, because it is so absolutely false——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will——

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Missouri——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Arkansas suspend for a moment until the Chair rules upon the point of order? The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken, and it is overruled.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, everybody understood that. The Senator from Missouri says the statement that bribery is common in Missouri is false. That may be true, but if it is, his statement in regard to hiring people to go out and work for candidates is also false, because the courts have said that is bribery.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. Do I understand the Senator from Arkansas to contend that if in my campaign some man comes to me and says, "I should like to be active for you"—to use the language of the Senator from Arkansas—"but I can not afford to be active for you unless I am paid for my time"; and I say to him, "I recognize that, and I will pay you for your time. Distribute these cards, canvass these voters, and I will pay you for your time"—do I understand the Senator from Arkansas to say that under those circumstances a bribe was either offered or received?

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri, in order that his statement may be fuller, if the man would have worked for him unless he was paid?

Mr. SPENCER. Otherwise he would not be active in my campaign, as he wanted to be.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me read what the courts say about it:

A bribe may be defined as any gift, advantage, or emolument offered, given, or promised to an elector to influence his conduct or vote.

The man to whom the Senator from Missouri refers was going to be passive; he was not going to open his mouth; but the Senator from Missouri pays him to open his mouth; to become active. The courts say that is a bribe. The Senator's argument is with the courts.

Mr. President, I wanted to call attention when the Senator from Maryland interjected his point of order——

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Arkansas did not answer my question.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, I did; I said "yes"; the courts said so.

Mr. SPENCER. May I ask one other question of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. SPENCER. Does the Senator from Arkansas mean to say that if in my campaign I should desire that the Senator from Arkansas should come to Missouri and make a speech either for or against me and he were to write and say "I can not come unless my expenses and a compensation are paid me, although I would like to come, I sympathize with you," and then I should say to him, "Come, and your expenses and a compensation will be given to you"? Under such circumstances does the Senator from Arkansas say that he would be bribed and that I would bribe him?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; the Senator from Missouri could not bribe me to make a speech for him. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator is quite right, Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. I am going to answer the Senator further——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Missouri will suspend. The Chair desires to announce that it is one of the rules of the Senate that there must be no indication of approval or disapproval on the part of the galleries, and if there are any such demonstrations on the part of the galleries hereafter it will be the duty of the Chair to clear the galleries.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is quite right; it would be impossible for him to make a speech for me for more reasons than one; but I do not understand, because the Senator says I could not bribe him to make a speech for me, that the inference is to be drawn that I could bribe him for anything else.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is as nearly a correct inference as the Senator ever draws, but there is no use to discuss that hypothetical question. I have answered the Senator's question. The Senator, however, knows the difference between an elector and an outsider, and I am not an elector in the State of Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. For which I express my pleasure and gratitude.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir; I am rather inclined to think that the Senator should feel that way about it. I had the misfortune to have been born in Missouri, but as soon as I found it out I left there. I was six months old when I got away, and if I had been a precocious child I would have gone earlier, but I did not realize where I was. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator will be glad to know that Missouri has advanced by leaps and bounds since his departure. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. I am very glad to know that, for there was plenty of room for improvement the last time I was over there, about three months ago.

But, Mr. President, all of this is aside from what I really cared to say. The junior Senator from Michigan, who read his prepared statement, said among other things:

The cost of the campaign was about $195,000, according to the report, and when I learned of this amount I was at once filled with amazement and regret.

The statement to which I presume he refers, for it was the only statement in evidence, does not disclose that $195,000 had been expended, but it undertook to show that $178,000 had been expended, which shows how inaccurate in the use of language the Senator was. However, the matter to which I wanted to call the attention of the Senate and the country is that the junior Senator from Michigan whose seat is now in question, whose "friends"—and I think the word "friends" should be in quotation marks—and relatives, if not himself, put up the money to buy a seat here, says that the expenditure of $195,000 filled him "with amazement and regret." Well, if it should have filled the Senator who was the beneficiary of the expenditure with amazement, I am sure that it filled the country with amazement and regret. If it should have filled with amazement the sitting Member, who was familiar with the details of this campaign, who had furnished through his family, if not directly, the money to finance the campaign, and who, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] said, was familiar with its details—if he should say that he was amazed that it took $195,000 to get a seat for him in the Senate, he need not complain, nor need his defenders here on the floor of the Senate complain, if the country is amazed. If people are amazed who do not share the views of those who think that $195,000 is well expended if a Senator is brought here from Michigan, the country will be amazed.

However, let me proceed further.

The Senator's "friends"—and I use that word again in quotations—here in the Senate have said that while it is a large sum to have expended, it was done without Senator Newberry's knowledge or consent. Now, the law of agency is if one acts for another, the party who is the beneficiary, if he desires to free himself from the acts of the person who holds himself out as his agent, must repudiate that agent's acts when they are called to his attention. If he sits quietly by and enjoys and approves and accepts the benefits of the acts of his agent, he can not afterwards repudiate his acts, although they may have been done "without his knowledge or consent."

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Newberry] said:

There was not the slightest evidence which involved moral turpitude in the remotest degree, nor was there any evidence, so far as I have been able to learn, of a single dollar that was spent dishonestly for corruption or bribery. The amount expended was large, more than I had any idea was being expended, and more than ought to be necessary to expend in any ordinary campaign. But this was not an ordinary campaign.

Then the remark follows that he is everlastingly grateful to this committee that carried on the campaign. So the Senator stripped his friends of any defense of himself by saying that if he did not know in advance that they were expending this money he is glad they did it, because that is all it means; that "whether I knew you were going to buy this election or not, I do not now stop to quibble, but I am glad that you did buy it"; and I say now he bought it, for this reason:

Every Senator who has spoken on that side of the question who has been defending Senator Newberry has justified this expenditure because it was necessary in order to elect Senator Newberry. In other words, they say that by reason of the fact that one of his opponents was well known and popular and he—Newberry—was not well known, and therefore not popular, if they had not expended this amount of money Senator Newberry would not have received the nomination, and therefore would not have been elected; so there is a confession that it was not the popularity of Senator Newberry, it was not the influence of his friends, but it was the expenditure of $195,000 that got him his seat here. But they have always said that it was spent without his knowledge, and therefore that it was lawful for them to do it. He says now, stripping them of that defense, "I did not know in advance exactly how you were spending it, but I ratify it, I adopt as my own every act that you did, and I congratulate you, and I shall be everlastingly grateful to you for having done these things that resulted in my nomination," which was the buying of the election.

I desire now, if I may, to direct attention to specific cases where men bought votes.

On page 505 of the record appears the testimony of Henry R. Dotsch, repeated in the record as it was by reason of the fact that it was given before the trial court at Grand Rapids. I want to read it, and I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] if he commends and approves the methods which were employed:

Henry D. Dotsch said that he resided at Escanaba and was the city attorney for that city; said he had always been a supporter of Mr. Osborne, but was not for him last fall; that is, the fall of 1918; that early in the primary campaign in 1918 James F. McGregor, of Detroit, came to see me; he said, we had our first talk at the Delta Hotel at his room; this was in the month of June. He asked me about Mr. Young to manage the campaign in Delta County. He also told me that he, Mr. McGregor, was the field man for Newberry—

Incidentally, I should like to call attention to the fact that McGregor was hired by Paul King and paid $300 per month for his services, and Senator Newberry wrote a letter to Paul King and said:

I am glad that you were able to take care of Jim McGregor. It will please Warren's friends.

So that McGregor was the agent of Newberry, and Newberry knew it, and was pleased with it, and wrote a letter of commendation.

He asked me about Mr. Young to manage the campaign in Delta County. He also told me that he—Mr. McGregor—was the field man for Newberry, and he stated about one week later Mr. McGregor called at my office and informed me that Judd Yelland would look after Newberry's interests in Delta County. He said, I saw McGregor several times later on in the county with Yelland. He said that Mr. McGregor was in his office two or three times after the visit at the hotel. He also said that at the first talk in my office he asked me how I felt about Newberry, and I told him that I would support him. That prior to the meeting with McGregor I was in Detroit on business for the city; that during the time he was there he met Mr. Groesbeck; had lunch with him; went to his office the next day. He said, we went into a room there, met Mr. Will Oats and Sam Odell and another man, and that they were discussing the Ford and Newberry candidacy. He said Mr. Groesbeck was favoring Mr. Ford. Mr. Odell said he didn't know whether Ford was a Democrat or a Republican. He said—

Now, that is Dotsch—

I told Groesbeck if Ford went in as a Republican I would try to do what I could for him in the primary. This was after that that I saw Mr. McGregor.

He had made a public statement that if Ford became a candidate he would support Ford; but he said that it was after that that he saw Mr. McGregor, and after that he became a Newberry supporter.

He nor Yelland ever talked to me about money that Yelland was receiving. He said that in July, 1918, Yelland and McGregor and I made a tour of the county.

Here is what I should like to call to the attention of the Senator from Missouri:

We went to Gladstone; there saw Philip Lewis, and Yelland gave him $10 and also Newberry literature. We either then went to Mr. Young or Mr. Haberman's office——

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator state from what page he is reading?

that Yelland either gave Young $20, and either gave Haberman $20 or promised him. He said he also gave a Mr. Weber $15 or $20 and some literature. He said each got literature. He said the talk was in the office in the city hall; that is, with Mr. Young and Mr. Haberman. I understood that they wanted each to vote and use influence for Newberry.

I want you to notice that. They wanted them to vote as well as to use influence.

He said, we next went to Kipling, and that there they gave Mr. Berry, the supervisor, $10 and literature, and Mr. Corbett, the deputy sheriff, $10. They then went to Rapid River and gave Mose Buchman $10 and literature, and a man at Collins Lumber Co. yard or office. Yelland gave Mr. Dotsch $10 to hand to those men and some literature. Said they were also in Mr. Messenger's office, and the talk there was between Mr. Messenger, Mr. Yelland, and Mr. McGregor. Mr. McGregor told Messenger that he should get in with the winner; he would get more out of it. He said they next went to Baldwin Township, at a place called Perkins, and saw Henry Lankor; that Yelland asked Lankor to work for Mr. Newberry, and that Yelland told him—that is, Mr. Dotsch—that he had made arrangements with Lankor to do the work. He said, I don't know what Yelland paid him; I don't know whether he has paid him anything or not. He said he gave a Swedish man, John Logan, $10 and some literature.

Next went to Maple Ridge Township and stopped at Rock and went into Larson Bros.'s store and talked to Mr. Bridges, the bookkeeper. He said Yelland told him Bridges was going to work for Newberry. He said they next went to Lathrop, and Yelland gave me $10 to give to Ernest Fosterling. He said the next day Yelland and I went to Nahma and talked with Joe Bushak, and Yelland told me he gave him $10 to distribute literature. He said, we then went back to Ford River Township and gave Andrew Englund $10, and then to Bark River Township, where he gave Mr. Dubuie, postmaster, $10. He said they looked for a man by the name of Romain, but did not find him. He said the following day Mr. Yelland gave me $10 and some literature to mail to Ed. Bero, jr., at Garden City, Mich., also $10 for me to give to Harry De Vett, and the following day $10 more to give to Carl Andree, I believe it is—possibly Carl Anderson—at Escanaba, and $20 to give to Charles Johnson, $10 for Johnson and $10 for Johnson to get another man to work in the fifth ward, and $10 to give to John Shehan. I believe he gave me $5 to give to Mike Harrington. He said Mr. Yelland gave him $50 for his work. He said there were five wards in Escanaba, four in Gladstone, and there were also 13 townships, and I believe all were organized for Newberry.

He said on the trip Yelland had the money in bills in a roll in his pocket. He said, I received my subpœna—that is, the subpœna to appear before the grand jury—on Saturday, last week, about 5 o'clock. Mr. H. J. Rushton got in touch with me soon afterwards and asked me to come to his office. He said he went up there and found Yelland, and they said to him—asked him if he was subpœnaed, and he told them that he was, and they wanted to know when he was going to Grand Rapids, and he told them on Sunday. They said they were discussing the primary election law, and that there was going to be some witnesses in his office—that is, Mr. Rushton's office—that evening, and asked me to be there. He said that he refused. He said I do not know that the meeting was held. He said I do know Yelland and Rushton left for Detroit that evening.

Now, listen:

He said the ulterior motive for paying out the $10 and $20 was to get votes and influence for Newberry. He said Yelland would never tell him how much he got. He said Mr. McGregor asked me to go out in the county with him and said that I would be taken care of financially, but he said I refused to go. He said that Yelland informed me that he is a stockholder in the Morning Press paper, reorganized, I believe, after the primary.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator who recites that matter evidently must have in mind the sections of the Michigan statute to which I call his attention, sections 45 and 48. I think he should put them in the RECORD.

Mr. CARAWAY. Without taking the time to read them, because they have been published in the RECORD, I ask permission to insert as part of my remarks sections 45 and 48 of the Michigan Statutes.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 45. Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives, lends, or agrees to give or lend, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration or office, place, or employment, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person in order to induce or have such person induce any voter to vote for or refrain from voting for, or support or oppose any candidate, or on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any primary election in this State; every person who by any means receives, agrees, or contracts for any money, gift, fee, loan, or valuable consideration, office, place, appointment, or employment for himself or any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting in a particular manner at any such primary election; or for inducing, or undertaking to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner, or to do or perform any of the acts or things forbidden by this act, or on account of doing or agreeing to do, or having done any campaign work, electioneering, soliciting votes for such candidates on primary day or prior thereto, or who after any primary election in this State, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives or receives any money or valuable consideration or place, position, or employment on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting, or having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any such primary election; or having induced or undertaken to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner or for any particular candidate at any such primary election, or on account of any person having done or been a party to doing anything forbidden by this act, it being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto; also every person who in behalf of any firm, partnership, association, or corporation, gives, lends, or receives, or agrees to give, lend, or receive, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, place, position, or employment, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration, in order to aid or promote the nomination of any particular candidate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment for a period of not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 48. It shall be unlawful for any person, after he has declared himself a candidate for any office included in the provisions of this act or filed his primary petition therefor as herein provided, and before the close of the polls on primary day, for the purpose of promoting his candidacy therefor, or for use in his campaign for such office, directly or indirectly, to print or cause to be printed, pay or cause to be paid for printing, circulate or distribute, or cause to be circulated or distributed, any campaign cards, hand bill, banner, poster, or other advertising matter larger than 2½ inches in width by 4 inches in length, except postal cards and letters, or which contains any lithograph, half-tone engraving, photograph, or other likeness of himself, which likeness is larger than 1½ inches in width by 2 inches in height, excepting advertisements in newspapers as hereinafter provided, or to publish or cause to be published, pay for publishing, or cause to be paid for publishing, any printed matter whatsoever, or any lithograph, half-tone engraving or other likeness of himself, or any other political advertisement of any kind or nature whatsoever which is intended, published, or manufactured for the purpose of promoting or advancing his candidacy for such office, or influencing voters relative to his said candidacy in or upon any magazine, program, bill of fare, ticket for any ball or other entertainment, or upon or in any other substance or publication whatsoever, except in a daily, weekly, or monthly newspaper which has been regularly and bona fide published and circulated for at least three months before such advertisement is to be inserted therein. It shall be unlawful for any other person to do or perform for or on behalf of any such candidate or to help or injure the candidacy of any candidate, any of the acts or things which it is by this act made unlawful for such candidate to do.

Mr. CARAWAY. I see that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] did not give what I have read any attention, and therefore I shall not ask him whether he approves it or not. That is the testimony of that witness.

This is not an isolated instance. I want to read what Senator Connelly said, merely for whatever it is worth. Connelly got $1,200, and this is what he said he did with it. I am reading from page 512 of the record:

Senator POMERENE. Let me ask a couple of questions to clear up what I have in mind, and if there is any explanation anyone else wants to make, go ahead and do it, and Mr. Connelly likewise, if he wishes. How much money did you receive all told from the committee?

Senator CONNELLY. $1,200.

Senator POMERENE. And you accounted for how much?

Senator CONNELLY. $200, by expense statement, and verbally for the balance.

Senator POMERENE. A written memorandum, you mean.

Senator CONNELLY. Typewritten memorandum.

Senator POMERENE. $200?

Senator CONNELLY. Approximately; I believe a little less.

Senator POMERENE. That left one thousand. Did you account for that?

Senator CONNELLY. To Mr. Floyd from time to time as it was expended.

Senator POMERENE. For what purpose was that expended?

Senator CONNELLY. A portion of it for my own compensation.

Senator POMERENE. How much?

Senator CONNELLY. Approximately $600.

Senator POMERENE. So that there were $600 additional that you accounted for from time to time, orally?

Senator CONNELLY. Yes, sir.

Senator POMERENE. As expense to cover your traveling and hotel expenses?

Senator CONNELLY. And for men employed for the distribution of literature and for speakers and for bands, which are not in this testimony, but which I reported to the grand jury. I conducted a regular "whoop-'em-up" campaign in a county where the candidate was not known at all, and we put him over in good shape.

For $1,200 in a county where he was not known at all.

Some things are small, but there was a little church which wanted to make some improvements, and Senator Newberry took counsel of King, as campaign manager, to know how much he should give. He asked King how much he ought to give under the circumstances. (Record, p. 525.)

A man by the name of James B. Bradley, who, by the way, was good enough to be a Republican election officer in Michigan, testified with regard to the effort, with King's approval, to buy the editorial support of the Charlotte Republican. The editor's name was Mr. De Foe. He talked it over with Mr. King, and Mr. King told him to use his own judgment. De Foe first wanted $250 and then he wanted $500, and Bradley, who was the agent, thought that was too high, and he came back to get King's approval of it, and King said, "Use your own judgment." King denied that, but I am curious to know what interest Bradley would have in testifying to that matter if it were not true. He was the friend and supporter of Senator Newberry, he had worked for him, he had accepted his money, he was one of his campaign managers, and I repeat that he did not turn around and lie against him. All of us who have practiced law know from experience that witnesses, honest as they may be, do what they can to protect their friends; that honest men do not lie at all, and dishonest men who do not mind lying, do not lie against their friends; they lie about their enemies. Whenever a man swears a lie, he does not care what the truth is, and therefore he always swears it to help himself or his friend, and not to hurt himself or his friend, and I know that Bradley told the truth when he swore Paul King authorized him to buy the editor of the Charlotte Republican, although Paul King denied that he did it.

I want to read to the Senate the testimony of a man by the name of Tetro, found on page 883 of the record. This is what he swore:

Robert G. Tetro said he lived in Stephenson, Menominee County, was township clerk, and also in the life-insurance business. He said that during the early part of the 1918 Newberry campaign Roger Andrews asked him to come to his office in Menominee, and he went, and Andrews asked him to use his influence and distribute circulars for Newberry. Wanted to know how much time I could devote to it, and he asked me what I wanted. I said $2.50 or $3 per day. He asked me to employ men to work for Newberry and said that he expected to pay them. He left it to me to pay them. I employed a lot of them, but only paid seven of them. Paid them $5 each. Some of the men were Al Haines, Mr. Shanahan, at Harris; Mr. Kane, at Harris; Charles Berdstrum, at Stevens. Said he sent them literature to distribute, and he paid out $35, and that Andrews paid him; said Andrews paid him about $260 in all. He said that his first talk with Andrews was at the first part of the campaign, and that he kept at work right through the election; that he paid the men only for the time on election day for work on street. He said that $260 was not paid all at one time. He said the last time I went there I asked him for $35, and he made out a check for $135. I did not notice it at first, but I kept it all. He said he was in Stephenson and saw a notice of a Ford meeting, and that he notified Andrews; that Andrews instructed him to use my picture-show house the same night and put on a free show, and he paid him about $60 for this. He also said he received a card on one occasion to meet Mr. King at the Dresden Hotel at Escanaba; that he went and met King and they went around with King in the interests of Newberry; that he also went to Gladstone with Mr. King. Mr. Tetro came into the room a little later and was asked concerning the names of a number of other men that he had stated that he had employed, and they went over that list of names with him. Said he did not employ Mr. Bergstrom or John Adams, Tony Morris, C. N. Watkins; that he did employ Al Haines; did not employ Anton Case and Joe Pond, a man by the name of Fred Dan, I believe it is, or Anton Olson. Said that he promised a man by the name of A. Anderson—no, I will change that. Anton Olson he promised to pay, but did not, and that he did not employ a man by the name of A. Anderson. He said that Mr. DuQuaine, the sheriff, had furnished him with a list of names whom he did employ. He said the $35 might have been extra to the $260 I paid out that he sent the $5 to each of the men by registered mail; also that he gave $5 to Pat Leaveck. Said he had talked it over with Pat since we got here—that is, got here for the grand jury—and he gave Pat the $5 for work on election day; that Pat came down and got the literature and he was not there, but Pat came back later and he paid him. Jack Leaveck also worked in the campaign, but Roger Andrews said he would settle with him direct. Mr. Tetro said that he told the men he would judge them according to the way their precinct went, and if it went good he would pay them, but did not pay them until after election, so as to see first how it went. In answer to a question he said, "Yes; it was probably in book in instructions to vote for Newberry." Said he met Judd Yelland and King at Escanaba at the Delta Hotel, but did not see any money transaction. All my dealings were with Roger Andrews.

But in this particular case the men were told they would get money if they got results, and if they got no results, they got no pay.

I do not intend to go through the whole record, because it is too long, but a man by the name of Charles L. Carpenter said he hired men, he paid them $5 a day, and he said, "If you get results, I will give you twice as much." I shall read just the concluding part of Carpenter's testimony. He is an intelligent man. He is a teller in the Ellis Bank in Grand Rapids, and I presume a man of character, who would not lie. I read from the account of Carpenter's testimony:

He also said after the primary George Welsh gave me $50. He said Welsh gave me the money I gave out. I had told him about how much I would need to get the men. [He also said that George Welsh told me to tell the men that if Newberry was nominated they would get more money, or, as he put it, would get double. They all came back, and I referred them to Welsh. My purpose was to get them out to work and vote for Newberry; I told them to work and vote for Newberry.]

That is what he hired them for. He hired them as much for their votes as he did for their work. He swears it, and he is the teller of a bank, is unimpeached, is a Republican, is a friend of Newberry, and he testified, under oath, "I hired the men. I paid them for their votes and influence, and I told them they would get twice as much if they got results."

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KING. I have read the record very carefully, some portions of it three times. I felt that the question involved was so important that a thorough acquaintance with the record was demanded. Does not the Senator reach the conclusion from the examination which he has made of the record that hundreds, if not thousands, of men were employed to work for Mr. Newberry, and either directly or indirectly to vote for him at the primary election?

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course.

Mr. KING. And that only a part of the amount paid them has been reported, so that the statement of Mr. Fletcher, one of the district workers for Mr. Newberry, that more than $800,000 was spent in the primary election finds ample support in the record, and that the record shows that Mr. Fletcher knew what he was talking about?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think there is any question about it, and I do not think there is any doubt on earth that Senator Newberry knows where practically every dollar of that came from, and knew it before he made his oath. I am not going to indulge in mere criticism of Senator Newberry, because, personally, I rather like his appearance, and I say here and now that I do not think Senator Newberry at heart is a bad man. I do not think Senator Newberry realized the enormity of the offense he was committing. I do not think Senator Newberry did all these things of his own volition. I think certain interests, that decided it would be worth whatever it cost them to have him in the Senate, put up the money. I think, however, it was largely family pride, and they put up the money and he put up the money.

Mr. KING. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KING. May it not be thought by some that the Senator is condoning too much what many believe to be an offense upon the part of Mr. Newberry? If it be true that Mr. Newberry was merely a tool of his friends or certain interests, as has been suggested, or that family pride prompted him to make this race, does not the Senator think that if the sitting Member had that high and fine sense of honor which has been attributed to him and which ought to characterize a man in the position which he now occupies, he would have come upon the floor of the Senate after learning of the facts shown in the record, of the lavish, if not corrupt, use of money to secure his nomination in the primary election, after learning that hundreds of thousands of dollars were so expended, and openly repudiated the conduct of his agents or those who pretended to act in his behalf, instead of saying that it was a peculiar campaign and his regret is that so much was "necessarily expended"?

If Mr. Newberry had come upon the floor of the Senate and condemned in unmeasured terms the debauching of the State of Michigan, though he had gone from here by reason of the vote of the Senate, he would have gone wearing the crown of an honest man, and with the respect and admiration of many who now condemn him. By this statement I do not intend to characterize his conduct in pursuing a different course. Later I may have something to say upon this aspect of the case.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, what I undertook to say was that men have different viewpoints. Their education, their environment, their experiences, make them see things differently. I do not think any word of extenuation could be said for the interest and the influences and corruption that put Senator Newberry in the Senate, but I do say that he possibly had, and I am rather inclined to think he has, that viewpoint that whatever you can buy you are entitled to get. That is a view that some men who have been "successful" take, that if a thing is for sale, buy it and it is yours, and it is nobody else's business.

I think that this seat was for sale. I so take it from the statement of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] himself, who said that this was not a poor man's year in Michigan, that a poor man had nothing coming to him that year in the way of offices—whatever he got was by selling, not buying; I am interlarding that—that there was nothing for sale in 1918 that a poor man could buy, that the seat in the Senate that was offered for sale in Michigan that year was for sale to millionaires only, and of the three who sought it he preferred that Senator Newberry get it. I am interpolating and I am putting a reasonable construction on what he said when he said there was no poor man who had a chance in Michigan that year; in other words, that it was well understood that a seat in the Senate was to be sold, and Senator Newberry, having the viewpoint that if there was a seat for sale, family pride and interest all prompted him to get it, bought it. He knew all about it and yet he is not quite so corrupt personally as a man with a keener sense of honor who would have stooped to do that thing.

I say that Senator Newberry knew all about it. Let us take Smith's telegram to him. I am diverging slightly from the line of argument I have intended to make, but I want to get to that right now. I shall not take the time to refer to Senator Newberry's explanation in his answer to the cross-examination of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that he and Smith did not understand what they were talking about in the same way; that what he was talking about was the newspaper attacks, and he facetiously said that neither he nor Smith knew the date of the primaries.

Senators on the other side of the Chamber in explaining the telegram all seem to take for granted that the telegram had to do with the date of the primary, that was the only information that Smith was trying to convey, and that that was the information necessarily for which Senator Newberry was asking. The truth about the matter is that Senator Newberry's answer was not in accordance with the facts nor is the explanation in accordance with the fact that this telegram had anything to do with the date of the primary. It was, as Smith said, altogether dealing with the question of expenses.

Now, Senator Newberry said his explanation was that he wanted to know when these newspaper attacks were going to stop, and that that is what he was talking about. What is queer about it is that the conversation to which he was referring occurred on the 28th of July, 1918, and the newspaper attacks did not commence until August, so that it could not have been true that they were talking about the attacks on Senator Newberry or his committee for expenditures. That was not the subject of the conversation, because that had not yet happened. His explanation is not true, but Smith's explanation is.

Now, let us see what the telegram said. It did not refer to the date of the primary. Senator Newberry need not have covered himself with shame when he laughingly said—I am not using his exact language: "We were two such boobs, Smith and I, that we did not even know within a month when the primary was going to be held." Just to intimate that Senator Newberry, who was keeping in daily touch with it, who had seen the big interests such as the United States Steel Corporation, who had talked with all his friends, and had constantly written and suggested and advised, did not know within a month when his primary was going to be held, is ridiculous. Why, God bless your soul, I have a boy 6 years old, and if he could be fooled with a story like that I would send him to a school for the feeble-minded, because he could not learn anywhere else.

A full-grown white man, manager of an estate of his own, of his brothers, of his wife, and of all his kinfolks, who made all of them rich, a man who had been Secretary of the Navy under the great Theodore Roosevelt, who had tried to buy a seat in Congress against the present Secretary of the Navy away back in 1904, who spent millions of dollars for one purpose or another, who then was a lieutenant commander in the Navy and in charge of the personnel office in the greatest naval district in the United States, did not know what month the primary was to be held in which he was an active participant for the great office of United States Senator? Oh, I tell you, you make him pay too big a price for the honor when you make him come here and declare himself a fool in order to be excused of a crime. I say seriously that I would rather be mistaken for a knave than a fool any day, because a knave may reform, and a fool never can.

To make a man of Senator Newberry's attainments, of his position, say that he was such an idiot that he did not know within a month when his primary was to be held in order to get around the fact that he knew whose money was being used to finance the campaign is making him pay too big a price for the honor. It is stripping him of all that for which he paid his money.

Here is a telegram of Smith's dated July 28, 1918. Fred Smith was the confidential agent, the man who managed all the Newberry estate, who had their power of attorney to draw checks and pay out their money by the hundreds of thousands of dollars and never be asked what he did with it, the more than confidential agent, the man who spoke for them and acted for them and did whatever in his judgment he thought would further their interests, sent this telegram to Truman H. Newberry:

I misinformed you this morning the date of close of regular expenses.

Not the criticism of the newspaper, as Senator Newberry would have you understand, but the date when the regular expenses would close.

Should have said August 27. The circular work, advertising, clerical help, postage, and all regular overhead expenses will naturally continue until primary. Have written.

He knew that Newberry knew August 27 was primary day, because he said these expenses will naturally go on until primary day; yet Newberry says that they were talking about the newspaper criticism and the date of the primary. Then why did he not say, "I expect, though I do not know, that those criticisms will go on until primary day"? No; he said the expenses, the overhead charges, the circularizing, the clerical help, and all those expenses will naturally go on until primary day. Oh, well, anybody, whether he aspires to a seat in the Senate of the United States or whether he wants to be a justice of the peace in the blackest township in the most densely ignorant community in America, who would pretend they were talking about newspaper criticism, the date of the primary, and that Newberry did not know what day his primary was to take place, belittles his own intelligence.

I know that whoever votes to seat Senator Newberry will know down in his heart, if he has read the record, if he heard that statement of Senator Newberry, that he has voted to seat a man in the Senate who did not have the courage to admit the substance of the conversation for fear it would show, as it does show, that it was he who was furnishing the money.

Oh, you can condone his offense here, you can give him a seat here, as I know the other side of the Chamber is going to do, but let me say, instead of feeling exceedingly bitter against Senator Newberry, if he is the man that he himself makes himself out to be, if he has no more intelligence than to proclaim, as he did, that he was such an idiot, I would rather have him than any other Republican I know of because he could do less harm than anybody I can conceive. If he does not know enough to know within a month the date of the primary at which he is a candidate, he is just about as harmless as anybody that I can conceive would be. I concede that some Senator from Michigan will be elected; that he will be a Republican. Of the two, so far as geniality is concerned, I infinitely prefer the junior to the senior Senator from Michigan; therefore I have no personal feeling against the junior Senator at all. If they want to seat him I shall regret it for the honor of the Senate, I shall regret its effect upon the country at large, but politically I feel absolutely certain that it will be a very sad mistake for the other side, though very helpful to this side.

Let us read what Smith said they were talking about. It has been read before, but I wish to repeat it:

Did you send that telegram?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I did.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Then, it was not about when the primary was; it was when the expenses would cease that you were talking with him and writing him about. Is that right?

Mr. SMITH. That is probably it. I do not know what the conversation was, but I had told him July 27. I misinformed him as to the month.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You had been talking to him. He wanted to know when these expenses were going to stop, did he not?

Mr. SMITH. I do not believe so. I think his conversation was about the drain on the balances in the office, and he was complaining about the money that was being spent.

He was complaining about the money that was being spent.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Complaining about the large amount of expenses being drawn?

Mr. SMITH. Or the money that was being spent and drawn from the account all the time and put into his brother's account to keep from being overdrawn.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And his funds, as well as his brother's, were used?

Mr. SMITH. And everybody else's.

That was on the 28th day of July. The evidence shows that there had not been spent up to that time in excess of $40,000 or $50,000, according to the filed report. The other money was expended later. John S. Newberry had up to that time contributed every dollar that had been contributed, according to the sworn testimony of King and others, and John S. Newberry's account showed the contribution of only $40,000. John S. Newberry continued to contribute through Smith, but not through himself, until he had contributed $120,000, according to the testimony. One day, however, Smith found that somebody had walked into his office—he does not know who—with a paper bag and handed it to him, and he counted the money contained therein and found that it amounted to $21,000. It was some kind of a rebate he got back; but he was not curious about it, and does not know much about it anyway; it was not at all interesting to him; but, anyway, according to their figures, that left John S. Newberry contributing $99,900, or $59,900 after Truman H. Newberry knew that Smith was taking his, Truman H. Newberry's, money and giving it to this campaign through the process of passing it, first, into John S. Newberry's account, and then, through John S. Newberry's account, to the committee, to be expended for Truman H. Newberry, in order that he might secure a seat in the United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

Mr. ROBINSON. On the 22d day of December last, upon my request, the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes, was made a special order for this day. At the time that special order was made it was generally thought by Senators, in fact, it was unanimously thought, I believe, that previous to this date the Newberry case would be disposed of. The arrangement under the unanimous-consent order, to which I have referred, touching Senate bill 848 contemplated that at the conclusion of the morning business to-day the Senate should proceed with the consideration of the interchangeable mileage ticket bill.

I do not feel justified in raising the question as to whether the subsequent order affecting the mileage book bill would temporarily displace the Newberry case, for I believe that Senators quite generally feel the latter case should be proceeded with to a conclusion. In view of the conflict, however, which has arisen, I feel justified at this time in requesting another unanimous-consent order, and I shall now submit the request. I shall not ask that the order which I am about to submit shall embrace an arrangement for a time to vote on the bill to which I refer, for it is my purpose to leave the subject open to whatever disposition the Senate may desire to make of it. All that I shall attempt to do is to commit the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill and to such disposition of it as the Senate shall desire to make.

I, therefore, ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that on the 18th day of January, following the conclusion of the morning business, the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 848, being the bill which relates to the issuance of interchangeable mileage books by railroads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the senior Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether upon the day mentioned by the Senator from Arkansas there is any other measure featured for consideration?

Mr. ROBINSON. There is not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the unanimous consent requested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the agreement is entered into. The unanimous-consent agreement entered into on the 22d of December, 1921, is, therefore, modified accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 77) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SINNOTT, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, and Mr. RAKER as managers of the conference on the part of the House.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 172, submitted by Mr. SPENCER November 15, 1921, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the main resolution which is now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] it is proposed to strike out lines 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 in the following words:

(3) That his qualification for a seat in the Senate of the United States, to which he has been elected, has been conclusively established, and the charges made against him in this proceeding, both as to his election and qualification, are not sustained.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I understand, under the unanimous-consent agreement, any Senator who may have exhausted his hour of debate upon the substitute resolution offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] may now, if he so desires, occupy one hour in debating the amendment which I have just proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the pending question is on the substitute resolution offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to be heard upon the ruling of the Chair. Under Rule XVIII in regard to amendments we find the following provision:

If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert.

Here is the main point involved in that rule——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not suggested that the Senator from Florida is not entitled to speak upon the proposal which he has just made.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If I have that privilege, I misunderstood the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, of course, the amendment proposed by me does not conform to my idea as to what should be the result of this contest. I believe that there is only one course for the Senate to follow if duty is to govern, and that is to deny Truman H. Newberry the privilege of sitting as a Member of the Senate. My amendment in substance provides that if a majority sees proper to seat him, then that majority shall not embrace in the resolution seating him a statement that his election and nomination have been honestly and legally obtained. Therefore, if the resolution to seat him is to be adopted, I think there should be stricken from it that clause which may be termed one of exoneration, because certainly, with the great array of facts before the Senate proving conclusively that Mr. Newberry is not without guilt in the conduct and the direction of the boodle campaign which resulted in his nomination and afterwards his election in the State of Michigan, why should the Senate, even if the majority, regardless of the facts and conditions, seat Mr. Newberry, stultify itself and write into the resolution seating him a clause of exoneration and of commendation? He should neither be seated nor exonerated.

Mr. President, if the amendment proposed by me shall be adopted, then only paragraph 1 of the committee resolution will remain intact. That paragraph merely states that Mr. Newberry shall be seated as a Member of the Senate. I do not believe if, regardless of everything, the majority are going to seat him, that the majority should give affirmative approval and sanction in express language to a campaign which was so corruptly conducted as to be known throughout the country as a "barrel campaign" and the greatest election scandal within the history of American politics.

Mr. President, since my early entrance into political life I have always had an aversion to the corrupt use of money in connection with campaigns. I have felt that the lavish use of money was destructive to and calculated to undermine the very foundations of our Government; that it would in course of time, if permitted and encouraged, result in the overthrow of those bulwarks upon which rests the destiny of the Nation. So far as maintaining a representative government is concerned, the American people have their security and their safety only in the ballot box. If we are going to permit money to be used to purchase influence, to purchase votes, and in that way to defeat the unfettered, the free, honest, and patriotic will of the people of any State, then we destroy the very rock upon which rests the destiny of the Republic. I can not conceive how any Senator or any man who loves his country, who appreciates its institutions, who has a proper regard for the maintenance of a government in which the people shall have a voice, can either by advocacy or by his vote condone and approve of an election which was bought in the manner in which Mr. Newberry bought his nomination and afterwards his election to the United States Senate.

There is no use of anyone deceiving himself by thinking that he is going to fool the American people when he contends that this election was not corrupt and claims that Mr. Newberry was not a party to the election debauchery which was perpetrated upon the people of Michigan and upon the Nation in the conduct of this campaign.

I was talking the other day with a man who had not read the testimony in this case. He has not occupied up to the present time, and I dare say he never will occupy, a seat in the United States Senate. He said to me, "Why, it is absurd and ridiculous to say that Mr. Newberry did not know anything about what was going on. The natural inference," stated this man, "was that Mr. Newberry knew what was going on in connection with this campaign;" and until that natural inference is overthrown by facts it should be the governing and controlling factor in passing upon Mr. Newberry's innocence or guilt in connection with this campaign. That is, if there was an absence of evidence touching upon the situation. In this case there is an abundance of evidence, and the testimony from beginning to end discloses that Mr. Newberry was not ignorant as to what was going on; that Mr. Newberry was not inactive; that he was not refraining from participating in the campaign. The testimony discloses that no such condition as that existed; but, upon the other hand, the evidence is conclusive and convincing that Mr. Newberry was displaying that usual and natural interest in his campaign that is the custom with all candidates. He was manifesting the eager interest that usually exists on the part of anyone who aspires to high office.

As we review the testimony, we begin with Mr. Newberry having set out to obtain Mr. Hayden as his campaign manager and sending his friend Cody to Washington to see him. That fact is uncontroverted. As a result of that visit, Hayden goes and has an interview with Mr. Newberry in New York. Mr. Newberry does not obtain him as his campaign manager. Next we find his friend Cody out in Detroit acting for Mr. Newberry in negotiating for a campaign manager. Mr. Cody arranges a conference with Mr. Paul King. In consequence of that conference Mr. Paul King goes to New York within a very few days and sees Mr. Newberry. At that conference Mr. Cody, Mr. Newberry—the sitting Member—and Mr. King were present, and no one else.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a suggestion at that point? Mr. Newberry appeared before the Senate and had an opportunity, if he chose, to deny important matters.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not want this charged up to my time.

Mr. KING. Mr. Cody told Mr. Hayden that he came as the personal representative of Mr. Newberry. Mr. Newberry did not deny that at any time, at any place, or at all. So the record now shows that Mr. Cody was the personal representative of Mr. Newberry, and Mr. Cody set in operation the machinery which eventuated in the organization of this so-called Newberry campaign committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I had expected to reach that point. I thank the Senator, however.

Mr. Cody said that he was Mr. Newberry's representative, and that never has been denied by anyone. It was not contradicted by the sitting Member when he appeared before the Senate in his own behalf on Monday. Of course, we know that Cody was representing him, because Mr. Newberry had written a letter to Mr. Miller here, telling him that Mr. Cody was coming here on a confidential mission, which he desired to discuss with him.

Shortly after Mr. King visited Mr. Newberry in New York he opened up campaign headquarters in Detroit. The opening of those campaign headquarters was the result immediately following the conference with Mr. Newberry.

Practically simultaneously with the opening of those campaign headquarters, Mr. King began to communicate almost daily with Mr. Newberry. This fact is clearly established by the evidence. At the time that Mr. King was engaged by Mr. Newberry in New York as his campaign manager, and also at the time that Mr. King opened campaign headquarters in Detroit, this fake business men's committee had not come into existence. That so-called committee was just about as much of a fake as the fake wooden battleship upon which the sitting Member posed in a public park in New York. What an inspiring and thrilling scene it must have been to the audiences in all the movies throughout Michigan as they beheld upon the canvas Commander Newberry, presumably upon a real battleship, with his glasses upraised, patriotically and vigilantly on the outlook for the enemy, with as much seriousness as though the wireless had just communicated the information that an attack was imminent. But what disgust and chagrin must have prevailed in Michigan when it was learned that this thrilling picture was not a real fighting ship of the United States Navy, but only a fake wooden ship anchored amidst the flower beds and green lawn of a park in New York. This piece of deceptive advertising cost thousands of dollars.

Mr. Templeton, the head of the so-called committee, states that he did not know how he came to be chairman of the committee; that the first he knew of it was when his name was found in the letter books as chairman. Now, whom do you think Paul King was representing? Paul King was representing the sitting Member. The sitting Member had attempted to engage Hayden. He could not engage him. He then engaged Paul King as his campaign manager. They had a conference. Paul King was no novice in the management of campaigns in Michigan. He was not entirely an ignoramus upon the question of the law; so I can see them now, sitting in secret conference in New York, planning just how they can carry on a barrel campaign, and yet do so in evasion of the law. So Paul King suggested, or Senator Newberry already had that idea himself: "We shall have to get up some kind of a business men's committee"; so they opened campaign headquarters, and Paul just put down Templeton's name for the chairman of the committee. Templeton did not know it. Then, later on, they got Mr. Blair and the others.

The campaign had already been started, and these men who were later placed upon that so-called committee were nothing more nor less than figureheads. One of them himself said that he was nothing more nor less than a figurehead. He was a figurehead set up for the purpose of trying to evade and dodge the law, so that they could spend money and have it said that it was contributed and expended through a committee.

My friends, are we going to allow a proposition of that kind to be put over? A jury in Michigan—composed, as I understand, of 11 members who were Republicans and only 1 who was a Democrat—would not permit them to get off with any such scheme or put over any such fake idea as that upon them. Are the Members of the United States Senate going to display less intelligence? Are they going to display less patriotism, less of a conception of public duty, than was displayed by a jury composed of citizens of this man's own State?

That jury heard this testimony. Talk about partisanism! If that jury had been controlled by partisanism and not by their sworn duty, their leaning would have been more toward Mr. Newberry, because 11 out of the 12 were Republicans. Yet a Michigan jury convicted Mr. Newberry of having been guilty of violating the laws of the United States, of having been in a conspiracy—this is not the technical language of the verdict, but that is what it means—to purchase a seat in the United States Senate. But for the fact that the United States Supreme Court, by a divided opinion, 5 to 4, rendered a decision, not upon the facts in the case but merely upon a constitutional question, declaring the law unconstitutional, the situation would be quite different.

To-day, but for that decision, Mr. Newberry, doubtless, as the result of the verdict of a jury of his own peers, instead of standing here pleading his cause and asking that he may be seated in this body, would have been behind the walls of a Federal prison, would have probably been making his appeal and his petition to the President to be pardoned of the offense of which he had been convicted and sentenced to two years' imprisonment by a Federal judge of his own State. Yet some Senators say that there is no evidence or testimony in this case to indicate that anything wrong was done! Nothing wrong was done! I tell you, Senators, the sense of duty, the conception of public policy, the sense of patriotism which actuated that jury that convicted Mr. Newberry, that judge who sentenced him, is only representative of the sentiments and the impulses that throb within the hearts of 99 per cent of our American citizens. If you think that a precedent established by this body is going to result in establishing or in perpetuating the policy that a boodle campaign can be carried on, with the result of electing a man to a seat in the Senate or any other high office in this country, you are going to find that you are mistaken. The Senate may go on record in favor of a seat being purchased in this body, but the voters will not at the ballot box confirm and approve the action of the Senate.

Senators, you may seat Mr. Newberry, but with respect and without meaning it as a threat I warn you that a large majority of you who approve of the corruption and debauchery so conspicuous in his campaign will yourselves be unseated when you again seek an expression of the confidence of the voters of your States.

Your action will not be approved, but you will find that there will be an uprising of the free electorate of this country, which believes in honest elections, and they will place the stamp of disapproval upon any efforts on the part of any candidate to purchase his way into office. Some of you may approve of a seat in this body being knocked off to the highest bidder, but the American people will not ratify your approval of the barter and sale of public office. The seat Mr. Newberry seeks was corruptly bought, at a price of more than $200,000. Are you going to approve this purchase?

Mr. Newberry was active in the campaign and intimately in touch with all its details. There is no gainsaying that fact unless we are to brush aside and ignore the evidence and the testimony in the case. Had Mr. Newberry not participated in this campaign, had Mr. Newberry had nothing whatever to do with the expenditures, had it been carried on by others in his absence, and had he been truly innocent and without guilt, do not Senators know that Mr. Newberry would have appeared to testify before the court when the case was being tried? Do they not know that Mr. Newberry would have appeared before the Senate investigating committee to testify? But he did not do it. Where was he? Where was this man who was being charged with heinous crimes? Where was this man when the Senate investigating committee was investigating his right to sit in the Senate? He sat by and maintained masterful silence. We have often heard that silence is golden. His lawyer in this case thought silence was golden. Mr. Newberry stated, when he spoke before the Senate the other day, that he was what a lawyer would call a good client.

I have practiced law a few years myself, Mr. President, and my observation has been that when a lawyer advised a client to refrain from going upon the stand, it has not been because he thought that to place him upon the stand would better his own cause. We all know why that lawyer advised Mr. Newberry to stay off that stand. His lawyer knew that Mr. Newberry knew all about his campaign. His attorney knew that if Mr. Newberry went upon the stand and testified, that while he would make an abstract statement that he was innocent, that he was over in New York fanning away peacefully and calmly, paying no concern to what was going on out in Michigan, before he got through testifying he would have questions propounded to him which would result, in all probability—even though Mr. Newberry was guarded in testifying—in his disclosing facts that would draw from his own lips his connection with the campaign. So the attorney suggested that Mr. Newberry not go on the stand. I do not think that was very commendable.

Furthermore, had he gone on the stand and made statements before the court or before the investigating committee, other witnesses could have been called, either to corroborate or to rebut his testimony. His lawyers fully realized this. Indeed, Mr. President, silence was golden. I am not surprised that an astute lawyer advised him to maintain masterful silence. He maintained masterful silence until some of his friends in this body sent out the call of danger, sent out a storm warning, to the effect that, "We are a little afraid that if you do not come before the Senate some of the Senators on the Republican side, who evidently have an aversion to corruption in politics and do not believe in men buying seats in the United States Senate or any other body, are likely to vote against you, because it does look a little strange that you have been silent so long, just a little peculiar for a man who claims innocence."

So at their insistence he appeared before the Senate. Appeared with a prepared statement and said he would not answer questions regarding the testimony of others and regarding the law. This would largely preclude all questions pertinent to the case. What an absurdity for anyone to say the prepared statement he read to the Senate helped his case. He simply made an abstract denial of his guilt. He made no explanation of the evidence of others contained in the record indicating his guilt. He produced no proof to support his claim of innocence. In my opinion, he injured instead of helped his case by his appearance before the Senate.

Ex-Gov. Osborn, a man prominent in his State, prominent in Republican counsels, in a letter addressed to Mr. Newberry after his nomination, but before the election in November, in substance, said:

You knew all about this. There is no use of your trying to fool the public, and if you will make a full, frank, open confession, I think the people will probably forgive you, but if you do not do so, then you brand yourself as an ass and a liar.

These are not the words of a Democratic Senator. This is the language of ex-Gov. Osborn, a prominent Republican of Michigan.

My friends, nobody except a few Senators think Senator Newberry had nothing to do with that campaign, neither Republicans nor Democrats, in Michigan or elsewhere. You can go out and walk the streets of any city; you may go throughout the highways and hedges of the Nation, and wherever you find people informed on this subject, whether Republican or Democrat, they say that no man who obtained a nomination and election under circumstances which characterized this campaign should be permitted to occupy a seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. Newberry had a most intimate knowledge of the campaign. The testimony establishes that fact beyond question. In the very beginning of the campaign Paul King began making daily reports to him. In the very beginning of the campaign he sent frequent telegrams and letters to Paul King, his campaign manager. Paul King had not been in office more than a week or two before he wrote and gave Mr. Newberry a field report of his activities during the week. That was early in the campaign. In reply Mr. Newberry wrote back and told him he would like to have him write him oftener and to come down occasionally. That was before the campaign was more than a week or 10 days old. Then as it progressed he made reports to Mr. Newberry daily, telephoning and telegraphing and by letters. Once a week King sent him a copy of the minutes of the meetings of what they called the field agents. I call them "hirelings." I call these so-called field agents, or a large majority of them, men who have sold their birthright for a mess of pottage. Many of them were brought into the Newberry ranks as a result of the purchasing power of a dollar, and that was all. Paul King sent in these reports weekly of the minutes of the weekly meetings of the field agents. Mr. Newberry wrote Paul and told him that was a fine idea, and to send them in to him, that he wanted to get them.

Then Paul King, Mr. Newberry's campaign manager, had monthly meetings of what they called the chairmen of the county committees. He furnished him with minutes of the meetings of the county committees. Who were the chairmen of the county committees? In almost every instance they were men who had been employed, who had been paid salaries. Do Senators think for one moment that Senator Newberry did not know it was costing money to organize, to operate, to function this organization of field agents, this organization of county chairmen, spending time in weekly meetings and making daily reports? He knew all about it, and knew it cost money. There is no question about that. Many of those chairmen of the committees did not enter into work in behalf of Mr. Newberry until they had been given a monetary consideration for their services.

Senators talk about Mr. Paul King. I never saw or heard of Mr. Paul King until I saw his name in the testimony. Some Senators and Mr. Newberry would hold him up as a very honorable, high-toned, Christian gentleman. He may be that; but if I am to draw my conclusions from the testimony presented in this controversy I would not want to stultify myself by accrediting Mr. Paul King with being a high-toned, honorable, Christian gentleman who would not do anything wrong. Mr. Paul King directed or had knowledge of practically all the details of the campaign, as the testimony shows, and he knew that money was being spent in all kinds of questionable ways. He himself was buying men for their influence. Within 10 days after he entered the service as campaign manager he advised Mr. Newberry he was going to Cleveland to see a man who had successfully managed the Herrick campaign under rather similar conditions to the Newberry campaign and that he would no doubt get some good pointers. The Herrick campaign in Ohio was a boodle, a barrel campaign. It is said it was one of the most corrupt campaigns ever conducted in the United States. Did Mr. Paul King get "some good pointers"? His management of the Newberry campaign would indicate that he did.

Mr. Paul King on the witness stand displayed a most conspicuous disposition to dodge and evade facts.

When asked about the paying of the chairmen of these county committees, he at first said that they received no pay. Upon having the question tightened down upon him a little more he admitted that they did receive some compensation. Why did he deny it? Paul King knew it was wrong. Paul King knew that the buying of an election by purchasing men's influence in the State of Michigan, or any Commonwealth in this Nation, was an atrocious and an inexcusable offense against our Republic, against the right of the people of this country to their free ballot.

How about the secretaries of the committees? Paul King, this very honorable gentleman, first said they did not get any pay, but when the lawyer said, "Mr. King, I hate to have to read three or four hundred names and ask you about each one of them as to whether he received any pay or not," then Paul sort of weakened. He said, "Yes; some of the secretaries did get some compensation." First he wanted to make it appear that they did not get anything. Why did Paul King want to make it appear that they did not get anything? He knew it was wrong in morals, he knew it was a violation of the law, and he did not want to condemn his fellow conspirators and build up evidence against himself and Mr. Newberry. The testimony in the case shows that a large majority of the county chairmen were paid and that they had furnished them money to pay others. They each were paid from a few hundred up to $1,200 and more. The evidence shows a check for $20,000 was made to a man named Oakman.

How about this testimony? Two or three Senators have attempted to make a great play, speaking in behalf of Senator Newberry, to the effect that the Newberry agents carried the books before the grand jury. What books did they carry before the grand jury? They carried some books in regard to bank accounts and some books of items that they were willing to charge upon the record in their offices. You can rest assured they did not take all of the records before the grand jury.

But what became of the great preponderance and bulk of the records of the Newberry agents bearing upon this campaign? The letters, the record in details, the field reports, the minutes of the meetings that were held once a week, the copies of the thousands of letters written by Paul King to Truman H. Newberry; the letters received from Mr. Newberry in which he asked Paul King to treat the matter in confidence—what became of all those? They were destroyed at the direction of Paul King almost before the counting of the ballots had ceased. Paul's testimony is to the effect that in less than a week after the primary was over he had directed that they take the correspondence out of the office, take it down into the basement of the Ford Building, and burn it. I do not blame Paul for doing that. If I had been mixed up with a thing of this kind—and I trust to Heaven that I will never so far depart from my conception of right and wrong that I will ever soil my hands with any such conduct as that which was attempted and carried on by Paul King and those associated with him in this campaign—I probably would have done the same thing.

Paul King under the circumstances knew that that was the advisable thing to do. If they had gotten hold of that evidence, they would have had letters there from these grafters, they would have had letters from Mr. Newberry showing his intimate knowledge of the campaign, and no doubt in instances touching upon the question of finances, touching upon the men who were employed, how we are going to get this fellow and how we are going to get certain newspapers. They would have had copies of Paul's letters back to him. But all this had disappeared—destroyed under order of Paul King. Senators, do not you know he would have preserved this correspondence instead of destroying it had he felt it would have helped to vindicate Mr. Newberry and himself? The charge of corruption had already been made.

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], for whom I have a very high regard in a general way—although I do not agree with his position in this controversy and probably he does not appreciate mine, but that is merely a matter of policy and a matter of conception of public duty—would rather believe somebody else stole them. Upon what can he base such belief? Nobody stole them. Paul King had a large part of the records burned, according to his own testimony. If he had a part of it burned, according to his own admission, the more natural conclusion is that he directed the destruction of all missing records. That answers that question. Paul King had the records burned. He said there was a great bulk of it there and somebody else was going to move in, and so on. This was his flimsy excuse. He knew it had been publicly charged they had conducted a barrel campaign; that corruption had been practiced. Why, why did he not retain all correspondence to disprove the charge, if the records did not contain incriminating information? Paul did not want anybody else to see those records.

Mr. President, I take the position that the family and the friends of the candidate should not be permitted to furnish the money to corrupt an election in the interest of Mr. Newberry, and that if they did do that then Mr. Newberry, even under those circumstances, is not entitled to his seat in the Senate. I will just give you a little idea of a layman's viewpoint. A stranger with whom I was talking a few days ago said to me, "If anybody is going to buy the office, it would be preferable for the candidate to buy it himself than it would be to have it bought by his friends, because then at least he could be his own master if it was bought and paid for by himself; but if it was bought and paid for by some one else, then, of course, he is not his own master."

This is not a case of a man having a campaign forced upon him. It is not a case of a man having been involuntarily placed in the race as a candidate for the United States Senate. It is not a case in which the friends and the family alone defrayed the expenses of the corrupting campaign, as some Senators contend, but in this case Mr. Truman H. Newberry, the candidate himself, stands out preeminent and prominent as the moving spirit and power of the campaign from its very inception. The testimony will support that conclusion absolutely.

Senator Newberry arranged for the campaign manager; he arranged the so-called campaign committee, and so far as the testimony discloses he did this because of a burning aspiration of his own to serve in the United States Senate. He was a candidate for the House in 1904, and it was charged then that he conducted "a barrel campaign." They talk about friends drafting him into the race, that he was importuned to become a candidate. He made that statement upon the floor of the Senate on Monday, but he did not give the name of a single person, nor did he furnish a letter from a single person who had importuned him to become a candidate for the Senate. There is not one line of testimony in the record showing that any person asked Mr. Newberry to become a candidate. The Senators who contend he was urged to run have not one word of evidence to support them, except the bare statement of Mr. Newberry.

Upon the other hand, there is an abundance of testimony showing that he eagerly interested himself in the matter of becoming a candidate and that he himself was laying his plans in 1917 to become a candidate. Do you not know if a lot of people had been beseiging Mr. Newberry to become a candidate he would have given the names of some of them here the other day? Do you not know that if Mr. King, or Mr. Smith, the confidential agent of Mr. Newberry, Mr. Newberry's brother, and some of these people had known something of this spontaneous solicitation for him to become a candidate they would have gladly furnished the proof?

That is a part of the setting of the stage, to make it appear that he had this campaign thrust upon him. That is a part of the plan to make it appear that Mr. Newberry was very unconcerned and disinterested. That is a part of the scheme to make it appear that the campaign was directed by a business man's committee—a business man's committee that did not come into existence until after Mr. Newberry had tried to employ one campaign manager and had failed, until after he secured a campaign manager, Mr. Paul King. What a subterfuge this so-called business committee was. This fake business man's committee was organized, composed entirely of men selected by Paul King or else by Senator Newberry, and in any event approved by Mr. Newberry. One of them said he was a figurehead.

On the question of expenditures the so-called committee made a report of about a hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars. When this investigation was begun witnesses were brought in, and I dare say they did not get all of them. It developed from their evidence that about fifty-odd thousand dollars had been expended that had not been reported by the committee. An expert, in trying to figure that out, said there could possibly have been some of this amount included in their account, but there was at least $29,000 that was not included in their account. That is the testimony. Why was it they did not report all these things? Why was it that Paul King and others intimately connected with this campaign intimated to these field agents, some of them, to these county chairmen, some of them, to "report as much as you can on account of telegrams, on account of postage, on account of stationery."

They knew it was wrong and they did not want these people putting into their reports a statement of $10 given to Bill Jones to buy his influence or a statement of $40 given to John Smith to purchase his influence; "so put as much as you can under the head of postage and telephone and stationery." I submit myself that did look very innocent to the unsophisticated. That would come nearer obtaining a favorable verdict from somebody who wanted to acquit Newberry, but it makes no impression upon people who go right to the real facts of the case.

A little piece of strategy has been employed on the part of some to try to divert the minds of the public from the main issue in the case. They like to talk about Ford and Newberry. I do not care anything about Ford. I do not care anything about Newberry. Personally I feel kindly toward him. He is a pleasant gentleman personally. But all I am governed by and all that any Senator should be governed by are the facts in the case.

It is said they had to have big expenditures on account of Ford. Ford was not in the race until months after those expenditures began. The able Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] yesterday developed that the evidence disclosed that more than $28,000 had been expended by these gentlemen, and in addition to that $28,000, according to the statement of the publicity man of Mr. Newberry, a publicity campaign through the newspapers had already been planned that would cost from $25,000 to $30,000. There is $28,000 and $30,000, and we thus have almost $60,000 already expended or planned for before Mr. Ford's name had ever been mentioned in correspondence between Paul King and Mr. Newberry, or had ever been mentioned as a probable candidate.

Oh, this corruption, this buying of the election, this whole scheme was in full force, was in "full pressure," to use Mr. Newberry's expression, long before Mr. Ford's name was mentioned, so there is no use of trying to appeal to any prejudice that anyone might have against Mr. Ford on that question. Sixty thousand dollars was expended and planned for to drive ex-Gov. Osborn, ex-Gov. Warner, and Senator Smith from the field before Ford was considered.

The senior Senator from Michigan said this was no poor man's race; that there were three millionaires involved. It may not have been a poor man's race—and I agree that it was not—but the testimony discloses that there was only one millionaire, his campaign manager, and his friends, who were going out and corrupting the electorate of Michigan. The testimony establishes that there was only one millionaire, his campaign manager, and his friends, who were buying workers, who were spending money in all kinds of questionable ways to purchase a seat in the United States Senate.

I asked the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], when he was speaking the other day, whether or not there was any testimony or any evidence that ex-Gov. Osborn, whom he said was a wealthy man, had spent excessive amounts in his campaign; if he had gone out and carried on any such inexcusable campaign of debauchery as that conducted by the Newberry crowd. He has not yet answered that question.

I take off my hat to and I honor the rich man who, as a candidate, has sufficient sense of honor and patriotism, sufficient appreciation for the welfare of his country and the right of his people to a free election, to refrain from expending money for the purpose of trying to purchase a seat in the United States Senate. What a pity all millionaires who aspire to high office do not have this high sense of honor and love for the purity of the ballot. I say, all honor to those other two millionaires in that race if they refrained from such debauchery, such corruption as that which characterized the Newberry campaign.

However, to talk about the others being millionaires is begging the question.

Mr. Newberry spoke of the question of money in a letter to Mr. Miller. He said that neither King, Oakman, nor Cody were to receive any money, to use his language, "except actual travel and publicity costs from me." That was in April. Certainly if he was not to pay any actual travel costs, or any actual publicity costs, he would not have said "from me." The acknowledged "publicity costs" of the campaign was $140,000.

Another significant thing showing that Mr. Newberry was connected with the expenditures, and that he knew what was going on, was his letter to Paul King under date of May 23, 1918, which reads as follows:

MAY 23, 1918.

MY DEAR PAUL: I return herewith the draft letters with a few notations. Please be assured that these were made with no intention to criticize and only as a suggestion.

When you finally settle on the forms, please send me an index descriptive of the people to whom the various letters are intended to be sent, together with clean copies of the forms you finally decide to use.

This, Senators, is very significant:

If, in your opinion, I should, by the use of these letters, now declare myself to be a candidate under the primary law, would it not terminate our present plan of publicity?

Sincerely, yours,

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY.

He knew nothing about the campaign, and yet he wanted Paul King to give him a descriptive index of all the men to whom he was going to mail the letters.

Then, according to the way in which the letter was worded, he asked if it constituted an announcement of his candidacy would it interfere with their plans for publicity? What objection could there have been to announcing? There could have been none whatever, except that they were going upon the idea that when Mr. Newberry once formally announced his candidacy, then there was, under the Michigan and the United States laws, a restriction upon and a prohibition against certain campaign expenditures, and that until he did so that limitation and prohibition did not prevail. That, and nothing else, is what he had in mind. While he had not already made a formal announcement, he was in fact a candidate, and had been for months. Thousands of dollars had already been expended in his behalf. They were trying to evade the law by withholding the formal announcement. They could not dodge the law by any such tactics.

Now, Senators, the question of Mr. Newberry personally is not the paramount and primary one. The big American question is whether or not the United States Senate is going to place itself upon record as approving, condoning, and commending the purchase of a seat in the United States Senate by Mr. Newberry himself, by his family, or by anyone else at an acknowledged cost of at least $200,000. Some of you may give your approval, but as for me, I condemn without reservation "the boodle," "the barrel," and corrupting campaign, resulting in the nomination and election of Truman H. Newberry to a seat in this body. His commission is tainted all over with corruption. He should not be seated. The Senate should not approve of this campaign which recorded the greatest election scandal known to American politics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators having answered to the roll call, there is a quorum present.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, before this question is disposed of, I intend to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That Truman H. Newberry is not entitled to a seat in this body because his relatives and friends, against a sound public policy, confessedly expended approximately $200,000 at the primary election to acquire the nomination for him, and because such a precedent would be harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate of the United States and contrary to the best interests of the United States Government.

I intend by that proposed substitute to eliminate the question of whether or not Mr. Newberry has been guilty of any moral turpitude. So far as the amendment which I propose to offer is concerned, it will strike out every disputed point, and leave nothing involved except whether or not $200,000 or $2,000,000 can be expended to control a seat on this floor. I feel compelled by a sense of profound public obligation to express my opinion on this matter, because I believe that this precedent would be in the highest degree dangerous to this Republic.

Mr. President, regardless of the question of Mr. Newberry's moral turpitude, I can not refrain from reminding you that an indictment was found against him by a Federal grand jury and by a petit jury of 12 disinterested citizens, 11 of whom were Republicans, and before a Republican judge, Mr. Newberry was nevertheless convicted by a unanimous vote of that jury, who were sworn to give the defendant the benefit of every doubt; and he was released from the judgment of that court only by a technical opinion of the Supreme Court that Congress did not have the right to limit expenditures in a primary election. But, Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the language of the Supreme Court in the closing words of that opinion. The court said:

"As each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own Members," * * * the National Government is not without power to protect itself against corruption, fraud, or other malign influences.

In other words, the Supreme Court of the United States has said to the Senate, "You are in charge of the safety of this Republic with the power to pass upon Mr. Newberry's right to retain his seat. The responsibility rests upon you, Senators. Although we, as members of the Supreme Court, find technically that this judgment is not sustained you, as Senators of the United States, charged with the duty of passing upon his qualifications, have it in your hands to say whether or not this shall stand as a precedent."

The country is observing you. Every State in this Union has its eye upon this case. The honor and the dignity of the Senate of the United States is involved in this case. The safety of the Republic is involved, because if a man's friends can buy seats on the floor of the Senate this has ceased to be a democracy and has become a plutocracy, ruled by the corruption of wealth, regardless of all principles of honor, of decency, and of righteousness.

Mr. Newberry, in coming before the Senate, in his defense said to the Senate that when Mr. Templeton came to him in New York he said to Mr. Templeton that if he went into the campaign he hoped his business friends and associates in Michigan would organize a committee and take charge of the campaign. It was more than the expression of consent; it was the expression of a desire. It was his avowed hope that his associates and friends would do this. It was more than an invitation; it was an earnest invitation. Mr. Templeton himself swears that Mr. Newberry urged him to become a member of the committee, and to be active in it. Mr. Newberry, on the floor of the Senate, advises us that when Mr. King was sent up by this committee, organized by his business friends and associates in pursuance of the hope of Mr. Newberry, he talked with Mr. King about the expense, and said, "What is it going to cost?" "Well, Senator TOWNSEND's expenditures amounted to $20,000, but in this case it will cost your friends $50,000 at least."

Mr. Newberry in his defense extols Mr. King for the campaign he conducted, says twice the expenditures were "necessary"; that the Michigan law, as he understood it, allowed the committee to spend whatever it pleased; that he regretted to see $195,000 had been expended.

But he should have known better than to say he believed then and believes now the expenditure of such a sum was permissible under the Michigan law, for the law (sec. 48, 1915 election law) expressly forbids the candidate or his friends to expend over $3,750 on such a primary for Senator, and Mr. Newberry had available the best legal advice. At all events, he knew his chairman would expend at least $50,000, and probably more.

Did Mr. Newberry rebuke King for such an expression of opinion? No; he gave him his blessing. He consented to his being the chairman. He confirmed Mr. King as the chairman of the committee which his business friends and associates organized in response to his wishes to take charge of the campaign; and then the crux of the whole matter was explained to the Senate by Mr. Newberry himself, who said that as he understood the Michigan law any amount could be spent that the committee pleased under the enumerated 11 heads of the Michigan statute, just so the candidate himself did not expend it. There was his theory of the law.

Is that the law of Michigan? It is not. The law of Michigan is very plain:

SEC. 48 (act. 1915). * * * It shall be unlawful for any other person to do or perform for or on behalf of any such candidate, or to help or injure the candidacy of any candidate, any of the acts or things which it is by this act made unlawful for such candidate to do.

The candidate himself could not spend over $3,750. Three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars was the limit of his expenditures under the law, and under section 48 nobody else could do more than he could do. Why, here is this Michigan statute, also declaring that—

SEC. 46. Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives, lends, or agrees to give or lend, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration or office, place, or employment, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person in order to induce or have such person induce any voter to vote for or refrain from voting for, or support or oppose any candidate; * * * every person who by any means receives, agrees, or contracts for any money, gift, fee, loan, or valuable consideration * * * on account of doing or agreeing to do, or having done any campaign work, electioneering, soliciting votes for such candidates on primary day or prior thereto, * * * it being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto, * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment for a period of not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

That is the law of Michigan; and shall a man through his friends be permitted to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in violation of the statutes of his State and in violation of the laws of the United States and still be permitted to retain a seat on the floor of this body?

Why, Mr. President, one of the witnesses, Mr. Fletcher, testified that he was satisfied, from his knowledge of the matter, that $800,000 was spent. I remind you that the two hundred and odd thousand dollars confessedly spent here does not include the list of expenditures made by the hired workers, the leaders in that State. There was shown to be 200 of them. A long list of the individuals is presented to the Senate in this record, showing how much this one got and how much that one got. It is not added up in the final enumeration. Regardless of whether Mr. Newberry knew anything about this or not, regardless of whether Mr. Newberry spent any money or not, the bare question that is going to be submitted to you is, Will you on your honor as a Senator stand for this precedent as a sound, honest public policy?

Do not permit party exigencies or party gratitude to influence you too far in this matter. It is quite true that it was Newberry's vote that enabled you, in the preceding Congress, to organize the Senate. Mr. Newberry was the means by which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] became the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was then packed and organized for the defeat of the Versailles Treaty. Every Republican chairman of every controlling committee owed his seat to Mr. Newberry. Politically, you are under great obligations to him; but the very fact that one vote in this body can change the current of American history and the history of the world, and that that vote should be controlled by such grossly corrupt and unlawful means, imposes all the more strongly upon you the obligation to remember that this is a precedent which you are setting—a precedent, I take the liberty of advising you, which the American people are not going to stand for. This is going to be one of the leading issues in the next campaign; and we shall see whether or not the American people will approve your conduct in having Mr. Newberry retain this seat, which was in effect bought for him by organizing over 2,000 precincts in Michigan, by paying unnumbered men, all the active workers in the State, by sending money to every newspaper in the State, by hiring group workers, by moving pictures, and by every sort of device which the unlimited use of money could engage.

If you think the American people will stand for that, I advise you to recall the interesting case of Mr. Lorimer and those who supported him, and what became of them when the elections came around.

The only question that the Senate need consider is whether or not this precedent shall be made. All disputed questions can be eliminated, and the question comes down at last to this: Is it to the honor and the dignity of the Senate of the United States to allow seats on this floor to be bought? Is it to the safety and the welfare of the American Republic to allow such a precedent to stand? The people of Michigan expressed their opinion as to this matter in their statute, and strictly forbade the candidate or his friends to commit these corrupt practices. The people of the United States have through their Representatives in Congress declared such corrupt practices unlawful in the corrupt practices act which the American Congress passed, which not only forbids a man himself expending above a stated sum but also provides that he shall not cause or have others do so in his behalf, and it was under that statute that Mr. Newberry was convicted. The Supreme Court released him on a technicality, but the Supreme Court admonished the Senate of the United States that it was charged with the responsibility of passing upon the qualifications of its own Members. You are now sitting as the highest court in the world to determine whether such corrupt practices, such unlawful acts under the State and Federal laws shall be approved and ratified and made the future policy of our Government. Will you sustain the honor and the decency of the Senate and the rights of the American people to honest and righteous government or will you not?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Mississippi that no business has intervened since the last call for a quorum.

Mr. HARRISON. There has been a very splendid speech, which might not have sounded very good to some Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can do nothing but enforce the rules, and it has been ruled that after a quorum has been developed a quorum can not again be called until there has been intervening business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi desires to have a quorum present, for the purpose of accomplishing that result I move that the Senate adjourn, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate adjourn, and on that he demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, certainly by unanimous consent a quorum can be called, and I ask unanimous consent that a quorum be called.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That will be satisfactory to me. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the request made by the Senator from Mississippi, that a quorum be called, be granted notwithstanding the rule. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to offer a substitute for the pending resolution, which I ask to have read and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read, and lie on the table.

The READING CLERK. An amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by Mr. OWEN, of Oklahoma, to the resolution (S. Res. 172) declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, namely: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," in line 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That Truman H. Newberry is not entitled to a seat in this body because his relatives and friends, against a sound public policy, confessedly expended approximately $200,000 at the primary election to acquire the nomination for him, and because such a precedent would be harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate of the United States and contrary to the best interests of the United States Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the case now before the Senate does not present the ordinary question as to whether a Senator has been fairly and honestly elected to a seat in this body. It is not a question which confines itself either to the seat involved in the Senate or to the personality of the candidate for the office. As I see this case, and as I believe the country will see the case, the issue involved here is whether or not the Republican Party as a party intends to obey the law of the land. I think that is the issue involved here.

It is seldom that you find a contested case that is so closely connected with party organization as this case is. I am not saying this with any desire to stir up political animosities. I am only saying it because I believe it is a fact which every man in this Chamber must recognize; it is a fact growing out of conditions.

We all know that at the close of the Great War it was very doubtful at one time as to which great political party would be in control of the Government. The Senate of the United States was so close that it was wavering on a knife edge as to whether the great committees of the Senate would be dominated by the party on this side of the Chamber or the party on the other side, and as to whether that party atmosphere would be reflected in the legislation to be enacted in closing the era of the Great War.

I am not critical of the party on the other side of the Chamber because it desired to control the Senate and control legislation, and have its policies and its principles and its viewpoint reflected in the after-war legislation. That was a perfectly proper and natural desire. That was the condition, and one seat in the Senate could affect the result, and did affect the result, and that was the seat now occupied by Senator Newberry.

How do we find that that question was approached? A gentleman was running for the Republican nomination in Michigan whose political atmosphere was not satisfactory to the leadership of the Republican Party, a man whom they did not believe they could dominate and control if he was elected to the Senate, and probably they did not believe that if he was elected to the Senate under that nomination his viewpoint would coincide with their ideas of the legislation that was to come before the Senate.

Now, what was done? It is admitted what was done. A candidate for the United States Senate was selected by the Republican Party, not merely the Republican Party in Michigan, but you know as well as I know that the Republican leadership of the Nation was consulted in the selection of that candidate. It has been said on the floor of the Senate that Mr. Newberry is not at fault in this matter, that he was drafted by his party to make a fight within the machinery of the Republican Party. No man can deny that. There is not a man within the sound of my voice who does not admit that statement to be a fact.

Then when the issue became doubtful, when through the ordinary course of the campaign it developed that the drafted leader of the organization of the Republican Party, Truman H. Newberry, could not win, it was determined to buy the seat. Now, that is true. It was deliberately determined to buy the seat. I do not know how much money has been spent. It has been variously estimated in very large sums. But I do know that Senator Newberry, standing at his desk the day before yesterday, announced to the Senate that $195,000 had been spent by his friends in that campaign. It was probably more than that, but it is not necessary to go to a larger amount.

You know and I know that when a candidate for the United States Senate from any State in the Union spends $200,000, in round numbers, in a campaign for a nomination or an election for that one office, that money is not being spent for legitimate campaign purposes. Regardless of any limitation of law, it is not being spent for legitimate campaign purposes. It is an effort through the method of propaganda to mislead a people or, through the method of purchasing votes, to buy a seat. It is corruption in politics, and it does not make any difference whether the individual who occupies the seat temporarily is a party to the transaction or not. Somebody was guilty, and admittedly guilty, of an effort to change the will of the people of Michigan in an election to this seat in the United States Senate, by one method or another of corrupting that election and changing the vote from the channel where it naturally intended to be cast to the column of the man who would not have won or would not have received the certificate if it had not been for the corrupt use of money.

I am not charging that this money was used to buy votes. I believe that it is just as corrupt for a man or a party, in violation of the law of his State, to purchase newspapers to circulate political propaganda as it is to pay $5 a head for votes in the street. There is no moral distinction; there is no distinction, so far as the body politic is concerned. I challenge any man on the other side of the Chamber to say that when you admit you spent $195,000 in the State of Michigan and the law limited your party management to the expenditure of $3,750 it was not for a corrupt purpose.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, may I, in answer to the challenge of the Senator from Alabama, say that the testimony is uncontradicted that under the law of the State of Michigan any amount of money can be spent, without limit, for advertising purposes. One hundred thousand dollars, five hundred thousand dollars, any amount of money can be spent. Of that fact I think the Senator will find there is no dispute. There are 11 specified objects under the law of Michigan for which an unlimited amount of money can be spent, and one of them is advertising.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The only difference between the Senator and myself is that he said the testimony does not show it. I do not know what the testimony shows, because I have not read the testimony, but I know what the law of the State of Michigan shows.

Mr. SPENCER. I was referring to the law of the State of Michigan. If the Senator has it before him he can read it; if not I will refer to it in the record, because it is set out in full in the record. There are 11 objects specified.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think I have the exact clause before me.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator will find it in the record at page 932. I know how fair the Senator is. He will find section 3830 of the laws of the State of Michigan set out in full on page 932 of the record. Paragraph 3 has 11 specified objects, with regard to each of which there is no limit as to the amount of expenditure. The Senator will find that advertising is the first of those 11 specified objects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I am familiar with that class of work. Unfortunately, I have had to face it sometimes myself.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield. I am glad to have the suggestion.

Mr. POMERENE. While there has been some discussion as to whether or not there was a limitation which might be placed on a committee for the 11 purposes, that question need not be decided either one way or the other to determine this case, for the reason that under the evidence in this case, as we think it has been clearly shown by the minority report and the speeches which have been made here, that committee was Newberry's committee, organized by him; it was his agency, and if he can not expend by himself to exceed $3,750 he can not create an agency by which he can evade the law. In other words, that was his agency and he was responsible for what that agency did. As a matter of law, in my humble judgment, there can be no question about that position.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator, who is on the committee, is more familiar with the law than I am. As I have read the law and if I understand it—and I would like him to assure me if I do or correct me if I am wrong—it is that the candidate is limited in the State of Michigan to $3,750 for all purposes. Is that correct?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; the candidate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Senator from Missouri agree to that?

Mr. SPENCER. He does.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was my understanding of what I was coming to, that the candidate in this election was limited to $3,750, and his friends, not a political party organization but an organization of Truman H. Newberry's campaign management, come here and admit they spent $195,000. Do you think the Republican Party is justified in giving a seat on this floor to a man when the law of his State prohibits him from spending more than $3,750, and when he admits that a party of gentlemen organized into a campaign committee spent in his interest practically $200,000? Now, that is the issue.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. When it is admitted on all sides that the limitation, so far as the candidate's own contribution is concerned, is $3,750, the Senator certainly does not mean to infer that there is any limitation in the statute of Michigan on collecting from friends of the candidate and adding to that fund?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not understand it in that way. I do not understand that to be the law. I am sure that the Senator from New Jersey agrees with me that nobody could understand in good morals that it would be the case that when the people of a State limit the amount of funds to be spent by a candidate in order that an election shall not be corrupted yet a man could say in good morals that his friends might corrupt the electorate for him.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that the language of the law is—and he will find it in section 3828—that so far as the candidate himself is concerned as to the amount "to be paid by him"—and that is a quotation from the law—he is limited to one-half the annual salary of the office he seeks. In this case that amount is $3,750. Then in the next section but one it is provided that any political committee that may have charge of the matter may spend without limit for 11 specified purposes, and one of them is advertising. Certainly the Senator does not mean to say that newspaper advertising about a candidate is immoral?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do say this and I mean it, that when newspaper advertising is carried to the extent of paying for newspaper columns to the extent that it controls the newspaper, it is a way of purchasing the paper.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield in just a moment. The Senator from Missouri says he is standing on the law in this case. The Senator from Missouri ought to be more familiar with the law in this case than am I, but I wish to call attention to section 48 of the Michigan statute, which I have here before me, which reads in this way:

> It shall be unlawful for any other person to do or perform for or on behalf of any such candidate, or to help or injure the candidacy of any candidate, any of the acts or things which it is by this act unlawful for such candidate to do.

The Senator from Missouri seeks to give an interpretation to this statute that a committee of friends may spend an unlimited amount of money for certain purposes that the candidate can not spend himself, and yet I find right in the body of the act, in section 48, a provision which says that nobody shall do for the candidate what the candidate can not do himself. What is the reasonable construction of the meaning of this law—the construction which the Senator from Missouri puts on it or the construction which I put on it? What was the purpose of the Legislature of Michigan in limiting the amount of campaign expenditures in that State? It was to prevent the corruption of the electorate; to make sure that men should not attain office merely because they had pocketbooks and had dollars to spend; to guarantee to the great mass of the electorate of that State an honest election, an election that would fairly reflect the sentiment of the electorate. Then to say, although that was the manifest purpose of the Legislature of Michigan in passing a law limiting the expenditures, that the legislature intended that if a man had any friends his friends could spend an unlimited amount of money to do just what the law said he could not himself do, I say is an absurd construction of the law.

Mr. EDGE and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey in a moment, but I promised first to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] suggested that no Senator would say that newspaper advertising was a form of corruption in politics. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in one of the letters which were written by one of Mr. Newberry's managers to Mr. Newberry himself the writer specifically states that a certain newspaper—giving the name thereof—was "weakening," and adds "an advertisement goes forward to-day." What is the implication in that letter if it is not that the advertising which goes forward is to determine the position of that paper and to corrupt its publisher and editor?

Mr. POMERENE. And it was a labor paper, too, in which he was going to insert the advertisement.

Mr. GLASS. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri what implication he gets from that statement?

Mr. SPENCER. I say, as the Senator from Virginia puts it, that the implication would be precisely as the Senator from Virginia indicates. The marvel, however, to my mind is that the Senator from Virginia should pick out an insignificant detail, of which the junior Senator from Michigan never knew and which had no sanction from him, and should attempt to build up a case of expulsion around it.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, I am not attempting to build up a case around it.

Mr. SPENCER. The record does not give the testimony of the man himself, but runs something like this: Mr. Souter comes before the jury and Mr. Souter says that Mr. Dotsch said that Mr. MacGregor said, and then he announces the fact. If it is true, as the Senator from Virginia quotes from such a roundabout hearsay expression, that a newspaper was doubtful and that in its doubtful condition an advertisement was sent in, of course, the natural inference is that it was for the purpose of stiffening up the newspaper; but that is not the testimony of the record in its entirety.

I might as well call the Senator from Virginia a reckless, untidy man, because there should happen to be a spot on his coat, when everyone knows that the Senator's manner and appearance are delightful.

Mr. GLASS. If there is a spot on my coat, there is a spot on my coat, is there not?

Mr. SPENCER. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. GLASS. And if one of the managers in the Newberry case writes to Mr. Newberry that a certain newspaper in Michigan "is weakening" and that "an advertisement goes forward" to it, that happened, did it not?

Mr. SPENCER. I have admitted the very inference which the Senator from Virginia makes.

Mr. GLASS. Then, as a newspaper publisher of 40 years' experience, I say if anybody had said that about me I would have supposed he was trying to bribe me, and he would have been trying to bribe me.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not know whether the rumor was true or not, but if it was true, I do not differ from the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. It was not a rumor, but it was a statement of one of the Newberry managers in a letter to Mr. Newberry, and the statement was that the newspaper was "weakening" and that "an advertisement goes forward to-day." What did it go forward for?

Mr. KING. It went forward to bribe the newspaper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, there is a limit to my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Virginia a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The question I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia is, regardless of the question as to whether or not there is a spot on his coat, if there was a spot on his coat and he swore positively that there was not a spot on his coat, does he not think that would have something to do with the case?

Mr. GLASS. The Senator's question answers itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, this matter is rather aside, but it is pertinent to the case, and I think it is well that there appear in the record just what the record does show. Mr. King tells Mr. Newberry, for instance, in the letter which he wrote to him on August 15——

Mr. SPENCER. Is the Senator from Alabama reading from the brief of Mr. Lucking?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but the letter which I am about to read is taken from the record and is in the bill of exceptions at page 888. This is what Mr. King tells Mr. Newberry on August 15, 1918:

> Our only weakness is with the labor vote, and my reports indicate that we are getting stronger there. The Flint Labor News, which has been strongly Osborn, is weakening, and I am sending a man there to-day with a page advertisement for insertion just before the primaries.

That is what the head of Mr. Newberry's committee reported to Mr. Newberry as to the expenditure of a part of the $200,000 that has been admittedly expended in one manner or another to corrupt the electorate of Michigan.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Before the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Virginia entered into their colloquy, if I understood the Senator from Alabama correctly, he made the assertion that, under his interpretation, the corrupt practices act of Michigan would only permit a contribution of $3,750 from the candidate, and that no further contributions could be received from any other source; in other words, that $3,750 would be the total sum which could be legally received and expended for the purposes of a primary campaign. Is that correct?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was not talking about contributions. I read a section into the record in the presence of the Senator from New Jersey. Section 48 of the Michigan statute which provides distinctly that no person shall commit the acts which the candidate himself is prohibited from committing.

Mr. EDGE. I recall that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say that when section 48 of the corrupt practices act of the State of Michigan provides that no other person shall commit an act that the candidate is prohibited from committing, then it prohibited Mr. Newberry's friends from attempting to use money in one way or another to buy the nomination just as much as it prohibited Mr. Newberry from doing so.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I do not care to press the question from the standpoint of the moral side at all——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have given the Senator the legal side.

Mr. EDGE. But I simply desire to get the pure legal interpretation of the Senator. I ask again, does the Senator from Alabama, from his study of the act, believe that contributions could legally be received from other sources?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know whether it could legally be received or not, but I am sure there could not legally be expended in excess of $3,750. They might have been received, and the Senator dwells on the reception of the money. That, however, is not the question; it is the expenditure of the money that counted.

Mr. EDGE. That is precisely what I wanted to lead up to. Then, does the Senator under his interpretation of the law believe that if additional contributions from various sources could legally be received, there could not be expenditures without limit under the various headings designated in the corrupt practices act, some 11 in number, I believe? I refer now to the legal aspect and not to the moral aspect of the expenditure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I do not think the United States Senate ought to decide on a technical issue this great case, involving the rights of the American people. I know that Mr. Newberry himself said to the Senate that it was the understanding in Michigan that this money could be spent for certain purposes. I came here to listen to his speech, for I wanted to hear it; and he said that this money could be spent. He said he did not spend it, but that it was the understanding in Michigan that his friends had a right to spend it. I am not arguing the case from the standpoint of Mr. Newberry's friends or of the politicians in Michigan, but I say that when section 48 provides that no other person shall commit an act which the candidate is prohibited from committing, then there can be no other legal interpretation than that this money was unlawfully spent. That is my view of the legal aspect of it; and, so far as the moral aspect is concerned, I do not see how any man can stand in his shoes and dispute for a moment the fact that an organization of a part of the Republican Party went into Michigan with the sole intent and purpose of securing a seat in this body that would enable them to control the destinies of the United States Senate, and control them by a man of their own selection.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator, in the interest of fairness, let me read one sentence here? I am glad the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is in the Chamber, because the letter which the Senator from Alabama read indicated to the mind of the Senator from Virginia that there was an attempt to bribe that paper. Mr. King made his statement in regard to it, and his statement was to the effect that the purpose of sending that advertisement to the paper was not at all to influence the attitude of the paper, but was in order that its readers before the primary might get the facts as Mr. King believed them to be with regard to Mr. Newberry. This question was asked him. I will read it, with the Senator's permission, and then I am through.

Mr. GLASS rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to both my friends that I am always willing to yield, but I have only a limited time.

Mr. SPENCER. It is an imposition; but Mr. King was asked by the chairman this single question:

> Was there any direction given to that man to insert the advertisement only in case they would support Senator Newberry?

Which is the inference that the Senator from Virginia had. Mr. King answers:

> Not at all. We simply wanted to get this advertisement before the readers of that paper just before the primaries.

If that is true, the Senator, I am sure, will agree with me that there was no impropriety or wrong in it.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but the Senator from Virginia does not think it is true.

Mr. SPENCER. That may be.

Mr. GLASS. And I hope I do not look as simple as the Senator from Missouri seems to think I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPENCER. I did think so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, of course when there is a reasonable amount of money spent in newspaper advertising to place a candidate's position before the people, everybody understands that that is not an attempt to corrupt the newspapers; but when there is a very unusual amount of money spent in advertising by an individual or his party friends, then you naturally have to believe that there is some other purpose behind the expenditure of that money than the mere conveying to the people of the candidate's position in the primary, and that is self-evident in this case.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, we have heard so much here about the right, under these exceptions of the statute, to expend hundreds of thousands of dollars for advertising that I should like to ask the Senator this question: Does it not really become a question of fact whether the money is spent for proper advertising or whether it is used for the purpose of influencing the opinion of the newspaper?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Absolutely; absolutely. There is no question about that; and I think it is very clear in this case that the large amount of money that went into the newspaper columns was not for the purpose of conveying to the public of Michigan the position of Senator Newberry.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to follow that question with another one which I think logically should follow it. Wherever the amount of money spent for advertising was so very large, would it not be fair, morally and legally, to lay down the proposition that in that case the burden of proof to show that it was not spent for the purpose of intimidation and bribery is on the person who spent it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, the amount itself would prove it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Absolutely. The Senator from Mississippi has answered the question fully. The statutes of the State of Michigan prescribe that not more than $3,750 shall be expended; and when a candidate expends one dollar more than that amount undoubtedly the burden of proof is on him to show that the additional sums of money expended were legitimately expended. Here is nearly $200,000 in excess of that amount admittedly expended in this case, and no adequate justification is shown to the Senate of the United States.

Senators, I think I can say to this body that, although I am a partisan in the sense of believing in my party's principles and my party's cause, I do not engage in partisan debate in this body; I do not appeal to partisan issues; but I would be recreant to the position I occupy here if I did not say to you that it is not Senator Truman H. Newberry who is under indictment in this case; it is the Republican Party. It is not only Senator Newberry who is charged with violating the corrupt practices act of the State of Michigan, but it is the Republican Party. Your party has been foremost—we have taken our part with yours, but you have been just as prominent as our party has in the past—in demanding that this class of legislation prohibiting corrupt practices and limiting expenditures of money in political campaigns be placed on the statute books. Did you place it there merely to catch the sentiment of the people with the intention of denying it and repudiating it in fact? Did you place those laws on the statute books to enforce them honestly, and to abide by them honestly, or did you put those laws on the statute books with the intention in your hearts of breaking them and repudiating them whenever it was convenient for you to do so?

That is the issue that confronts the Republican Party, and you can not avoid it. You know as well as I know that Senator Newberry's friends spent a vast sum of money, more than the law contemplated or authorized, and more than the constituency of Michigan expected him to spend. He holds his commission to a seat in this body undoubtedly by reason of the expenditure of that money. If you confirm him in the title to that seat, you confirm the action of the Republican committee that elected him by these methods.

That is the issue that is before the country; and that is the issue, if you are going to plead guilty to it by a vote of confidence in Mr. Newberry and his committee, that we, as the opposition party, are entitled to carry to the American people and condemn you for the position you have taken.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I so cordially agree with what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says with regard to his fairness and nonpartisanship in this body that I venture to say one or two things in connection with the statements he made as he closed.

The Senator said that this enormous expenditure of money was greater than the constituency in Michigan ever expected would be made. I want to call his attention, and particularly the attention of those upon the other side who historically, at least, have always believed in the doctrine of State rights and State sovereignty and State government, to the fact that every dollar of the expenditure in the primary, the method of its acquisition, the way it was expended, the amount of it, the contributors who gave it, every one of those facts when the primary was ended was published throughout the length and breadth of Michigan. Everybody in Michigan knew about them. They were the issues of the campaign at the general election in 1918. The people of Michigan, with all the facts before them, placarded upon every wall and published in every paper, in the general election rendered their verdict as to what they thought about that fact.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SPENCER. Just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

More than that; under the law of the State of Michigan—and I call the Senator's attention to this—when a report is made, as it must be made after a primary is completed, it must be published, and every detail of it made public; and by the express provision of law any citizen in the State of Michigan who thinks the statement is unfair or incomplete or wrong has his opportunity of preventing the certificate of nomination or election from issuing until that question is determined.

Is it not passing strange that in the whole State of Michigan, with the power and purpose of Mr. Ford back of it, there was not one single citizen to complain of these things that now with vehemence are proclaimed as vitiating that election?

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. SPENCER. In a moment I will yield; not now.

Does any Senator imagine for a moment that if there had been any truth in the allegations that we now hear, Mr. Ford would have allowed them to slumber; that he would not have availed himself of them; that the courts of Michigan would not have been invoked; that complaint would not have been made?

When Michigan is silent, and the matter is brought here first, it looks, to quote the language of a Senator upon this floor, more like the persecution of an individual than the vindication of the Senate. After all, the Nation is concerned—of course, it is concerned—in the qualifications of the Members of this body. The States are so interwoven that what concerns one concerns every other; but the primary interest is in the State which a Senator is supposed to represent, and I ask again, is it not strange, if the things which we hear now are true, that there never was a single whisper of them in the State of Michigan; that nobody complained; that nobody availed himself of the statute; that no interposition of any kind interfered with the certificate of nomination or election? The truth of the matter is that Michigan knew about it, and Michigan believed in the junior Senator.

At least six men were indicted with the junior Senator from Michigan, who subsequently ran for public office in that State. Senators will remember that the general election we are now speaking about was in 1918. One man, Deland, who was indicted with the junior Senator, ran for secretary of state in 1920. The people of Michigan had an opportunity to speak as to how they felt on the so-called Newberry campaign, because it was made the issue of that campaign, and all over Michigan it was proclaimed, "Deland for secretary of state, the man who was indicted with Newberry, who was tainted with every bit of tar that tainted him, who was as guilty as Newberry himself was? Elect him to public office in Michigan?" It was the issue of the campaign. What was the result? When the people of Michigan had a chance to vote upon the question, by a majority of more than 500,000 he was elected, and he ran 125,000 ahead of the governor, who was running at the same time. That is the way the people of Michigan feel upon this matter.

I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Missouri, in his eloquent and impassioned manner—and I do not blame him for feeling impassioned at all, but I realize that nobody else does; it is a hard trial upon his conscience—says that any citizen of the State of Michigan had a right to complain, and he says that no citizen of the State of Michigan did complain. Yet there stands the fact that a jury of 12 Republicans not only found certain men guilty but found Mr. Newberry guilty, and penalized him to a term in the common jail, and the only way he ever got out of it was by the Supreme Court of the United States deciding that under the circumstances it had no jurisdiction, and relegating the trial of the case to the Senate of the United States. So much for no single citizen of the State of Michigan having complained. Twelve petit jurors, all Republicans, after indictment by a grand jury whose politics I do not know, tried the case in the Federal court and decided it.

Mr. OWEN. The grand jury indicted over 100 men.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As the Senator says, they indicted over a hundred men, and certain of them were convicted.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to yield the floor to him so that this will not come out of my time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Amongst the men intended to be punished was Truman H. Newberry, who was condemned to imprisonment, and he afterwards got out of it before the Supreme Court upon a legal technicality——

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. To wit, that the court had no jurisdiction in that particular case.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator allow me to yield the floor?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait just one minute.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, the impassioned Presbyterian elder would have us believe that the people of Michigan indorsed what was done in that campaign. What the Senator from Missouri has said amounts to this: That if Michigan were bought, it stayed bought for the next election; that is all.

Mr. SPENCER. I thank the Senator. I yield the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It may be that it did and it may be that it did not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Mississippi in his own right.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Senator from Mississippi does not claim the floor, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, they had a public sale up in Michigan. The property that was placed on the auction block was a seat in the United States Senate. The sale was public, the bidding was in the open, and the property was knocked down to the highest bidder. Every citizen of Michigan had an opportunity to get in and bid. Why, then, Mr. President, all this fussing and fuming? The only question before the Senate is, Shall that sale of a seat in this Chamber be confirmed? It is a question of confirmation of a sale which is admitted, it seems to me, to have been according to the rule.

The sale was public; the price was adequate. In fact, it rather seems to me as though the purchasers paid more than the blamed thing was worth. Why, then, should Senators hesitate to confirm this sale so made, so conducted, before the people of the entire country?

It is said by some of those who are opposing the confirmation that this would establish a precedent by which the poor man would be eliminated from the Senate Chamber.

Suppose it does. What business has a poor man here, anyway? If he catches cold, or some member of his family gets a toothache, so that he has to consult specialists or dentists in the city of Washington, he will be looking straight into the front door of the poorhouse.

As I look at it, Mr. President, this is just exactly what it is intended it should be, the establishing of a precedent so that we will have more men of means in this Chamber, and that seats will be put up in the marketplace, just as seats on the stock exchange. This will insure a high-class membership.

But, Mr. President, it does not follow that we mean any hardship for the poor man on that account. If the poor man has not money enough to put up the ante in the senatorial poker game, let him go to the back alley and engage in a game of craps. If he can not raise money enough to run for the United States Senate, let him run for constable, road overseer, or even for that ancient and honorable office, justice of the peace.

It is not intended by the establishment of this precedent to hurt the poor man. Senators do not realize how important this question is. If we do not confirm this sale, the first thing we know we will have a lot of poor men here. Mr. President, there will be farmers in the Senate, a "bloc" of farmers whom you can not control by loaning public money on cotton or inviting them to a presidential dinner, farmers with whiskers, yes, whiskers that will put in the shade the beautifully trimmed beard which adorns the face of our illustrious leader.

Mr. President, if we only knew it, we will accomplish much more when we confirm this sale than we realize, and it has been decreed by our masters that this sale shall be confirmed. It is all right for Senators to insurge and go against the machine occasionally, but we have come to a time now when you have to show your colors and obey the command, or in some future election you will find yourselves without friends and without money.

It is not for us to reason why, but it is for us to obey or die.

It is said by some Senators that if we confirm this sale we will be going contrary to the evidence. What has the evidence to do with this thing, anyway? This is not a question of evidence. This is a question of obedience, and, after all, a great deal can be said, and even has been said, by Senators on this floor, to the effect that the confirming of this sale is according to the evidence. It was said by the Senator from Missouri, on some phases of it, that the evidence stands uncontradicted. For instance, one of the questions involved in this case is, Whose money was spent, anyway? The attorney for Mr. Newberry, and various other Newberry interests, testified that he had 10, 11, or 12 accounts, and that he transferred money from one to the other as occasion demanded.

Now, some inquiring member of the committee said, "Let us subpœna these bankers with their books, and that will throw some light on the ownership of the money that was really spent in this campaign." But the committee very properly and very wisely decided that could not be done. In other words, the evidence of this attorney who testified that Mr. Newberry knew nothing about it stands uncontradicted. So how dare you go back on it? The committee were so wise and so judicious as to see to it that it should remain uncontradicted.

After all, the evidence does show in a good many respects just as has been claimed, and we ought, I think, to pass a resolution of thanks to that committee for making it so easy for us to follow the well-marked-out path that is determined upon for us to follow. It was their wisdom and their celerity that to some extent made this record so that it is easy for us to obey.

It was proposed that Mr. Newberry be summoned before the committee. He had been silent. That was very properly blocked by this very dutiful committee, and he was not requested and not subpœnaed, and would not perhaps have been permitted to testify if he had appeared. That helped us out on the record a great deal, because there is now nothing to show that he knew anything about any of these things. It is uncontradicted. Again, they prevented by their course of action what might have been embarrassing and made it embarrassing for us who are faithful to cast the vote here that we are expected to cast. Then, Mr. President, how humiliating and embarrassing it would have been to have subjected a United States Senator to a cross-examination by an ordinary representative of the common people.

It is said, Mr. President, by some of the Senators, that anyone who votes to confirm this sale will be defeated for reelection if he is a candidate for reelection to this body. Now, that is a threat that is unworthy of a Senator to make. In addition to that, it is poppy-cock, and there is nothing to it. The people will forget it. They will not remember this. There will be various other things that will get into the campaign, and they will forget about this.

Let me say to my friends who are threatening us with that dire disaster before the people that that situation is pretty well cared for now. It has always been the custom of both the great political parties to arrange soft berths for the lame ducks who are wounded while faithfully following the commands of our masters. If the people should be so unthinking and so unreasonable as to defeat any Senator for reelection because he voted to confirm this sale, those Senators who are still faithful and follow their leaders will find that they will be properly cared for when the time comes, and some place, somewhere, they will be tucked away in a soft berth with a salary attached to it greater and larger than that which attaches to a place in this body. So you can not scare us with that kind of talk. We are too well armed and too well fortified for that kind of threat to have any influence on us.

It is going to be said of us when we get through, as was said of some other great people, "He seen his duty and he done it." [Laughter.] Notwithstanding all that talk we are going to carry out the program; do not worry about that. To the faithful, those who are faithful unto the end, will come the reward for hard labor and for duty conscientiously and faithfully performed and when we have established this precedent we will have a Senate to be proud of composed of men of means, we will make Washington the social center of the world. We can then employ experts to do our thinking and Senators will have more time to give to golf and other kindred social duties.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in two speeches made this afternoon, the delightful bit of irony indulged in by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the unctuous and indignant speech of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

I desire, however, as a consolation to my friend from Nebraska to remark that he has overlooked one solacing consideration. The bitterness of his soul ought to be mitigated to some extent by the fact that this custom, which he tells us is to be established by this precedent, will at least have the virtue of putting a great deal of money in circulation, so that if the common people, of whom he speaks with such tenderness, do not get the offices they can at least get some of the coin.

But I desire to address myself very briefly to the latter part of the speech of the junior Senator from Missouri. His defense seemed to be that there is no case here because the people of Michigan had not instituted prosecution under the State law. That defense might be made by nearly every citizen who is arrested in a Federal court on a charge for anything from violation of the Mann Act to using the mails to defraud, because it always happens that when the Federal Government takes charge the State authorities stand back and allow the Government to proceed.

It happens in this case that almost immediately after the election the Federal authorities began an investigation and that fact was known throughout the land. That investigation proceeded with the full knowledge of the people of the State of Michigan until it was consummated by an indictment. The case was finally tried, the verdict of conviction was pronounced, and the sentence of the court was imposed. Under such circumstances what becomes of the plea that the people of Michigan did not act?

The Federal Government was there with all its machinery; it not only took a Federal grand jury and the agencies of the Department of Justice weeks and months to get at the facts in this case, but it took the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body not only weeks and months, but, if I recall correctly, over a year and a half of time more fully to develop those facts. What individual citizen of the State of Michigan, therefore, under such circumstances, would file a charge in a State court, and what becomes of this vehement argument that the failure of citizens of Michigan to prosecute constitutes a defense?

After all, if the case were being tried in the Federal court, what kind of a lawyer would plead that his client might also have been prosecuted under a State statute, and that the failure of the State to prosecute is a good defense to a charge brought by the Federal Government?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SPENCER. I wonder if the Senator is aware of the fact—of course, he is—that the primary occurred in Michigan in August, 1918, and the Department of Justice of the United States did not commence its work in Michigan until the summer of 1919, a whole year thereafter.

Mr. REED. Oh, certainly. The Department of Justice began in the summer following the election; in the meantime evidence was being accumulated to lay before this body, as was well known. Everybody knew that it would take many thousands of dollars to dig down into these crooked transactions, to trace them to their end. And when these thousands of dollars have been expended to develop the facts and the sworn testimony is before us, the junior Senator from Missouri rises to state that these facts were not adduced by a citizen of Michigan, but by some one else. Imagine a man arrested for any crime, if you please, who would make such a plea as we have heard to-day.

The question is, Was the money expended, and was it expended in such a manner as to charge Senator Newberry with full notice of the fact? Indeed, I think I agree to the doctrine that if no notice had ever been brought home to him in the world, if it were proven that others had expended this vast sum of money and that it had affected the result, the election would be tainted by that money. Whether the votes were bought by A, B, or C without the knowledge of the candidate, that would not improve his title to his seat.

But in this case to argue that candidate Newberry did not know what was going on is to argue that he is without sufficient mental capacity to find his way from this Chamber to his hotel. To assume that a man is intelligent enough to rise to a point of distinction where, even with his money, he can secure a nomination; that his money can be expended in his campaign through his closest and most trusted friends, through political adherents with whom he consults daily and weekly, and then to assert that he knows nothing about what is going on, is either to imagine he is an idiot or else to conclude that the person who indulges in the assertion is mentally deficient.

It is absolutely silly to talk in that way to men who have had experience in politics. I grant you, of course, a man might be running for office and some individual here and there might do something, might expend money, or might even do a criminal act without his knowledge, and he might be held wholly acquit from any responsibility, but here was a tissue woven to cover an entire State; every thread in it ran back into the fingers of Mr. Newberry or his closest and most intimate friends. The strands twined into his bank account; they ran into his brother's bank account; they ramified through the members of his family; they touched every hamlet and village in the Commonwealth; they reached tens of thousands of homes. The organization was as broad as the State, as complete as human ingenuity could create, and it is more clearly proven than any conspiracy has ever been proven in any court of justice in any case I have ever tried or of which I have ever read. It requires an unusual amount of piety and a grace of soul that must be inspired by the very light from above to enable a man to look at the record in this case and say that there is not sufficient evidence to find that Mr. Newberry knew exactly what was going on.

The truth about the matter is that there is only one plea that can be made, and that is the plea which Bossie offered in "The Texas Steer." When the old man was away, as Senators will recollect, Bossie, the favorite daughter, having full access to his bank account, went to a practical politician and drew liberally upon the old gentleman's account. So when the old man came home, he was indignant and said he would not take the office; that he did not want to come to Congress. Bossie tearfully exclaimed, "I do not see why Daddy should not take the office; I am sure he came by it honestly. We paid for every vote he got." [Laughter.]

The evidence in this case is a demonstration; it is complete; it is absolute; it is overwhelming. The defendant, if I may so term him, had an opportunity to appear upon the witness stand in court, but he exercised his constitutional right and kept silent and did not speak in his own defense. I have tried enough cases to know why the defendant is kept off the stand. Other lawyers here of greater experience than myself know that reason. A lawyer never keeps a defendant off the stand unless he is afraid he will break down under cross-examination or unless he knows he is too conscientious to tell a story that will help him. But I waive that because the ancient right of a citizen to remain off the witness stand is one which must not be broken down.

I come now to the circumstance that we had an investigation going on for months by the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, the presiding genius being my beloved and esteemed colleague from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER]. When that investigation was continuing, after the evidence had been massed and with counsel able and distinguished to assist, I asked why the defendant did not then appear and submit himself to an examination. Certainly he was not afraid that he would be browbeaten or in any manner abused by the genial and kindly soul who presided at the examination. He certainly could not have felt that he was in a hostile court or that his right to speak would be denied him or that his privileges as a citizen would be abused.

Certainly he would have felt as he sat there confronting the beautiful and smiling countenance of my colleague like a bride seated before an ardent lover waiting to impose his embraces. [Laughter.] He could hardly, therefore, have been in any state of terror or hesitancy of spirit because of the character of the committee. He would have known that all the questions propounded by my genial colleague would have come from loving lips in soft and dulcet tones, accompanied by beaming glances of affection. He would have understood that each irrelevant question would have been excluded; that everything incompetent would have been eliminated; that the privilege of counsel would have been accorded; and that under those conditions and in that environment he could tell his story in his own way and make his defense to the very utmost of his ability.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. I am sure my distinguished colleague will let me add just a brush of paint to the picture which he has so rapidly and vividly portrayed.

Mr. REED. I have no doubt the Senator can embellish it.

Mr. SPENCER. My colleague has had but little to say with regard to himself, but with all the power of his own personality he is a member of the same committee. His gentleness of speech, his moderation in action, and his sympathy with those whom he attacks would doubtless have assured to the junior Senator from Michigan every consideration in the hearing.

Mr. REED. Ah, but I was not a member of the subcommittee; that was the committee of my distinguished colleague, and I was not a member. So, no doubt the junior Senator from Michigan could have had the protection, the kindliness, and the gentleness of my colleague without being at all disturbed by my harshness of demeanor or cruelty of soul. I have thought that when the majority picked the subcommittee possibly I was left off for reasons, but I was glad to be left off, particularly when I learned that the respondent was not going to testify.

Let me repeat in this connection what I said a few days ago: I have, from the personal standpoint, nothing but the most kindly feeling for the junior Senator from Michigan. In the few times I have met him he has demeaned himself as so much of a gentleman that it seemed to me then and seems to me now a very sad duty to vote against him. I make no attack upon him such as I might make were it not for the state of my feelings. But when I hear the absurd argument made that there is no evidence—although here it is as a wall of granite through which you can not drive—I can not but think that it is a good thing some people have a God to forgive them. Surely, a man who did not have full faith that he could be forgiven for his sins in case of repentance would hardly dare make that kind of a statement.

Mr. President, this is a question above personalities. The Government of the United States is, after all, composed of a few agents of the people. A single man in the White House, with almost unlimited power in many respects, a man chosen from the body of the people, and always a man of high character, but an individual; a legislative body composed of two Houses, the one with 96 individuals, the other with 435 Representatives, and a Supreme Court of 9 men. Such is the Government of 110,000,000 human beings. Into the keeping of these few men is consigned the destiny of the greatest Republic and the greatest people ever erected under the providence of Almighty God. If the canker of corruption shall begin to eat into the heart of that Government, then this structure—which is, after all, the product not of one age or one Nation, but of the thought, the effort, and the struggle of centuries—will topple and will fall.

Liberty was not born in a day. Out of the night of time we hear the clank of fetters, the groans of slaves, the swish of cruel whips laid on the backs of suffering men. We see them rise and strike blindly at their oppressors. We behold brutal armies mustered by more cruel masters, a tidal wave of flesh and blood sweeping back and forth over Europe until all her plains were sodden with gore and all her fields were white with bleaching bones. To gain liberty for men thousands of heroic souls have lain in dungeons until brown locks turned to gray and rotted on their temples.

That we might be free men have been stretched upon the rack, have felt the torture of the thumbscrew, and have stood rigid at the stake to give their lives amidst the flames that consumed them. Out of it all, and at the end of it all, there came a consummation in our country's struggle for independence and the creation of this Government. This, for which men hoped through the ages, is temporarily in our keeping. Will we hold it secure? Will we protect its purity? Will we keep the edifice strong and mighty and enduring? Or will we, to give one man a seat in this body, permit corruption to gain the day, and villainy to reap its reward?

Mr. President, there was a time in ancient Rome when the Pretorian Guard marched to the capitol, slaughtered the just Pertinax upon its marble steps, and, standing in his weltering gore, sold the government of the world at auction. I am unwilling that any part of the Government of the United States shall be sold in the opening hours of this great century. I am unwilling that the serpent of corruption shall coil its scaly folds about the central pillar of the temple of freedom, or that it shall thrust its forked tongue into the face and bury its poisonous fangs in the heart of the Goddess of Liberty. I protest, in the name of the Republic and in the name of the heroic dead who erected it, against the sale of a seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in my opinion the question before the Senate is not the guilt or the innocence of Senator Newberry. It is not even the question whether he knew of the scandalous character of the campaign which resulted in his election or whether at the time he was ignorant of that character.

In my opinion the real question before the Senate is not a legal question. It does not involve the constrtuction of any law of the State of Michigan or of the United States. To my mind this question goes much deeper.

The Constitution of the United States makes the Senate the sole and only judge of the elections, the returns, and the qualifications of its Members. Upon that great power vested in the Senate there is absolutely no limit. It is a power and a duty which rests solely and only in the conscience of Senators. It was not given to the Senate of the United States for the purpose of punishing candidates who resorted to lawless methods. It was not given to the Senate of the United States for the purpose of punishing committees that corrupted elections. It was given to the Senate of the United States for the purpose of protecting the integrity of this great body as a part of this representative Government.

We therefore on the present occasion are called upon to decide, upon our consciences, whether or not such methods as imperil the integrity of this body were resorted to in the Newberry case. We are called upon to establish a standard for the future. We are called upon to make a precedent to be followed hereafter.

That the election was a scandalous election is admitted. We need not go into the controverted parts of the testimony. Senator Newberry himself stood here and told us that $195,000 was expended in the various stages of his election. He told us that when he learned of that amount he was filled with amazement and regret. That is a pretty broad admission for the beneficiary of the election to make; nor is that all, Mr. President.

An attempt has been made here to show that Michigan was satisfied with this result. The fact is that at the meeting of the legislature which followed this scandalous election the lieutenant governor made his inaugural address before the State senate largely upon the topic of the scandalous election that had been held, and he demanded of the legislature that some effort be made by the legislature itself to prevent such scandals in the future.

It should be remembered that Michigan is an overwhelmingly Republican State; that the body addressed was, as I recall, a solidly Republican body; that the lieutenant governor who made the address was himself a Republican; and here is what he said:

> Primary elections will call for action on your part. From what has occurred during the past political campaign it would afford me relief if I could pass by this question, but experience teaches that the disagreeable acts of an office are the ones people demand the most strenuously. More communications on this line asking for legislative action have come to me by far than all others combined, and almost without exception Republicans, not only from all parts of Michigan but from other States.
> This, you know, is the outgrowth of a candidacy that doubtless cost more money than ever before was paid for a nomination for office in all the world's history.
>
> You also know this candidacy from one of the best-known families of the State, of a man of high standing, unquestioned integrity, and acknowledged ability, in the face of an abnormally large party majority, came near an ignominious defeat through the resentment from nearly every voting precinct in the State, of the farmer, the laborer, the business and professional voter, because of the enormous amount of money acknowledged to have been used in his behalf, and generally believed to have been used contrary to laws several sections of which were enacted for the stipulated purpose of restricting the use of large sums of money in campaigns.

I omit a couple of paragraphs and include the following:

> From almost every part of the State have come to me pleas that this legislature make it impossible in the future to witness the sale of a public office on the auction block, but rather that the laborer, the farmer, the business or professional voter, however humble, but able and respectable, may have a chance with the man of millions.

Mr. President, that shows pretty clearly, it shows conclusively, that the Republican people of Michigan were outraged by the corruption of the ballot in that State. It shows very clearly that that State did resent, even if it did not through its State courts prosecute, the great crime against government which was committed there.

Mr. President, we see a further evidence of that when we glance at the election returns by which Mr. Newberry procured his seat. In the previous senatorial election, which resulted in the election of Senator TOWNSEND here, Senator TOWNSEND received a majority at the polls of 106,707 votes; but the resentment of the Republicans and voters generally was so great against the boodle campaign which was carried on by Senator Newberry's committee that when the votes were counted and after they were verified by the committee of the Senate Senator Newberry's majority instead of being 106,707 was only a little over 4,000. It was a hundred thousand less than that of his colleague. I think that is very good evidence that this campaign was regarded by Senator Newberry's own State as an outrageous thing, something that his people could not indorse.

Mr. President, this is not a party question. I have heard it stated here by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], who presided over the deliberations of the subcommittee, that political hatred and personal animosity were behind this effort to deny Senator Newberry a seat in the United States Senate. To my mind, the exact opposite is true. The Democratic Party has nothing to gain politically by throwing Senator Newberry out of the Senate. The Republican majority is painfully large, and we would gain nothing at all by denying him a seat.

Not only that, but Senator Newberry has been here long enough, and he was well enough known to many of us before he came here, so that he has many personal friends here, not only on the Republican side of the aisle but on this side of the aisle as well, and there are men who will vote to deny him a seat with the greatest personal regret. If they followed their personal feelings, they would vote to give him his seat. But the issue is something more than a Senator's personal interest; it is larger than a single seat in the Senate of the United States. The issue here is of the integrity of representative government. The issue here is whether we shall lay down a standard for elections hereafter which may be followed. If in Senator Newberry's case a committee can expend $200,000 or $300,000 to elect him, then committees in any State are at liberty to expend $200,000 or $300,000 to elect their candidates, and if we so hold we will have destroyed practically the integrity of the Government; we will have impaired the confidence of the people in the Senate of the United States.

I know what public opinion is on this subject. I think we all know. The testimony of newspaper men is that this question to-day is the one of absorbing interest to the country. The papers all over are calling for more special reports on this particular case than have been called for on any pending question in a long time. There has not been an issue before the Senate of the United States in some time which has interested the people so much as this particular election case is interesting them. The people want to know whether it is possible to elect Members of the United States Senate by the unlimited use of money, and it is for the Senate to answer that question.

Senator Newberry is not on trial; the Senate of the United States is on trial. The Senate of the United States is squarely up against a great responsibility under the Constitution. It can not hide behind the decision on criminal responsibility made by the Supreme Court; it can not hide behind technicalities; it can not hide behind friendship for the individual. The Constitution gives it the power to set the standard. The Constitution places no limit on what we shall decide as to the returns, the elections, or the qualifications of Senator Newberry in this case, and if we say that the election was legitimate, if we say that $200,000 or $300,000 can be spent on the election of any Senator, we say that it may be spent in the election of every Senator.

I say, therefore, that the Senate of the United States is on trial, and if we expect to retain the respect of the voters of the United States, if we want them to respect the laws which we pass, we must vindicate ourselves by saying, in plain language, "It makes no difference whether Senator Newberry knew of this expenditure or not. It makes no difference whether he spent it personally, or whether it was expended by the committee which he created. It makes no difference whether he furnished the money or his brother furnished the money or his relatives furnished the money, or his business associates furnished the money; it was the corruption of an election, and the Senate of the United States will not in the future tolerate such a destruction of representative government."

I say that the public opinion of the United States will brush aside all technical questions. The people of the United States will brush aside all of the defenses which have been raised in this case. The people simply want an answer to the question: Will the Senate in the future tolerate the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars in a campaign for a single Senator?

I think I know what the answer to that will be by the people of the United States. I am not acquainted, of course, with the public opinion in all the States. I know very well what the public opinion will be in my State and in the State of my colleague—Nebraska. It will be a public opinion, not of Democrats only but of Republicans and of men of all parties, that the expenditure of $200,000 by anybody or any committee, with the knowledge of the candidate or without the knowledge of the candidate, to secure a seat in the Senate, constitutes a scandal and a subversion of popular election.

I believe that is the opinion in the adjoining State of Iowa, the State from which Senator KENYON comes. I believe that is the public opinion in the State south of Nebraska, the State of Kansas, from which Senator CAPPER comes. I believe it is the public opinion in North Dakota and in South Dakota, which lie to the north of Nebraska, and I am sure that it is the state of public opinion in Oklahoma and all the other Western States. It will be the public opinion in Oregon particularly, which was foremost in bringing about the constitutional amendment for the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, by establishing the Oregon plan, in order that legislatures might no longer be trusted to elect Senators.

Why was that constitutional amendment adopted? Why was the constitutional power taken from legislatures to elect Senators of the United States? It was because of the scandals which had arisen from the expenditure of money in the various legislatures, and the use of corporate influences in those legislatures, and the people believed that if they could take that power away from the legislatures they would end the scandals. The people believed that if they could vest in popular elections the right to elect United States Senators, the Senate would be free from the corrupting influence of money in elections.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Granting all that the Senator has said as to the state of public opinion to be true—and I believe it is, and properly so—does the Senator feel that if the committee confined its activities within the law, even though the law apparently is a very bad one, not limiting expenditures along certain lines, and if Senator Newberry himself broke no law, admitting all the moral issues which the Senator has discussed, does he still feel that Senator Newberry, under such conditions, should be disgraced and made a sacrifice, and does the Senator feel that the people of the United States would not be satisfied if, as a result of the necessary and proper publicity which has surrounded the debate of this case, legislatures would properly limit expenditures under the separate corrupt practices acts so that a repetition of such a shock to the moral sense of the Nation would be impossible?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have already stated that in my opinion Mr. Newberry is not on trial. It is the Senate of the United States which is on trial.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator believe that Mr. Newberry should be made a sacrifice?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Neither should he be the beneficiary of this outrage. Individuals count for nothing. It is a question of protecting the integrity of the Senate of the United States, and if Michigan had passed no law and if the United States Congress had passed no law it would still be the duty of the United States Senate, under its constitutional powers, to protect its membership from the corrupt and outrageous use of money in a campaign to secure a seat in the Senate; and that is the opinion of the people. They will brush aside these technicalities. They will say, "Let the Supreme Court pass upon the guilt or innocence of Newberry. Let the courts do that, but let the Senate of the United States protect its own seats. Let the United States Senate lay down a standard. Let the United States Senate in good morals and decency say to the voters hereafter and to committees hereafter, 'You can not spend a scandalous amount of money in procuring the election of Senators, even within the technicalities of local statutes. The Senate will not tolerate it, because the Senate is going to protect its own integrity.'"

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator consider it a mere technicality to disgrace a man for life, to vote him out of his seat in the greatest legislative body in the world, if he has not broken any law whatever? Is it not the duty of the Senate, if in any way possible, to try to create a sentiment throughout this country so that legislatures will pass acts which will make it impossible to have it repeated? Why should we take a pound of flesh from Senator Newberry, who has been duly elected by the people of his State, a recount demonstrating that conclusion? Even after this primary occurred the people of Michigan elected him to the Senate. So far as I have heard the debate, no one questions the proper shock to the moral sense of the American people because of this tremendous expenditure and explanations as to its necessity, so far as I have heard them, have made little impression on me; but I do feel that it is our duty to prevent the opportunity and not punish an innocent man.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will not permit the supporters of Senator Newberry to take me on to a ground where, in order to vote against him, I have to convict him of a penitentiary offense. I say that is for the courts. I accept his vindication in the courts. But I say, on the other hand, that Senator Newberry is not on trial here. It is the Senate that is on trial, and if the Senate of the United States seats Senator Newberry under these circumstances, it gives ratification to all the acts of the committee which expended hundreds of thousands of dollars in procuring his election. It lays down a standard for the future, and if the Senate does that it can not question any other candidate when he comes here as the beneficiary of an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars to procure his election.

Senator Newberry was not elected to the Senate of the United States. Two hundred thousand dollars were elected. That is what carried the victory in Michigan. That is what won the election. Notwithstanding the fact that the lieutenant governor has denounced the election as a purchase, as an auction of the Senatorship in the State of Michigan; notwithstanding the fact that the voters resented it at the polls by reducing a majority of 106,000, which Senator TOWNSEND had two years before, to a mere bare majority of 4,000, the Senator from New Jersey insists on asserting that Senator Newberry was vindicated by the people.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, did not the lieutenant governor, in his address at the opening of the legislature, make the address, as a lieutenant governor or the presiding officer of a legislative body usually does, for the specific purpose of having that weak corrupt practices act amended by the legislature?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but, Mr. President, the Senate of the United States can not hide behind the Legislature of Michigan. They had their duty then; we have our duty now. It is for us to say here, by our votes, whether we are going to establish it as a standard for the future that candidates may be elected by the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars in a campaign. That is the issue; and I repeat, the Senate of the United States is on trial, and individual Senators are on trial, and individual Senators are going to be held responsible by their constituencies; and if the Republican majority seats Senator Newberry under these circumstances, in spite of the great rebellion of many Republican Senators, the Republican Party will have to defend that act in the next campaign, and one of the big issues will be whether seats in the Senate of the United States can be bought by the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars. I repeat, not only is the Senate on trial but individual Senators are on trial also.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish that all Senators could have heard the speeches of the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and of his colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. One of them said that the question here was whether we would confirm the sale of a seat in this body. The other one said that the question was, Are seats for sale in this body? So these two Senators, coming from a great Western State, one a Republican and the other a Democrat, are agreed upon the issue and they are going to vote alike on the roll call.

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in his speech on yesterday made a powerful and masterly argument, and in the course of his remarks laid down two propositions that can not be gainsaid. I read one of them:

> That the amount expended in the Newberry election was such as to lead to the conclusion that it was intended to and did corrupt the results of the primary.

Another one I desire to read:

> That the committee which expended this money was Newberry's committee. If not actually selected by him, it was accepted by him and he cooperated with it, so that the committee's acts became his acts.

There is not a lawyer worthy of the name who can deny that proposition. Whether he selected the committee or not, if that committee went into the State of Michigan to conduct a campaign for Truman H. Newberry for the Senate and did conduct that campaign, and if Mr. Newberry had to do with that committee, had reports from that committee, wrote instructions to that committee, he is bound to be held responsible and accountable for the acts of the committee.

If he ever repudiated that committee, there is no testimony on record anywhere to that effect. We do know that when the primary was over he eagerly seized the fruit of their work, rejoiced in it, thanked them for what they had done in securing it, accepted it, and came to this body. Now, can he be heard to say that he knew nothing about it? Will Senators here accept that statement? How can they do so in the face of the facts? He selected his manager, and he went into the race after his manager, Paul King, told him that the campaign would cost at least $50,000.

I repeat what I said the other day: Then was the time for him to say to Mr. Paul King, "I do not indorse a money campaign. I will have nothing to do with a money campaign. If it is going to cost $50,000, as you say, I will not be a candidate." That has the right ring to it for a real patriot who wants to safeguard the ballot and the rights and liberties of the American people. But he did not say that. He went into the campaign knowing that it was going to cost $50,000 and more.

Then, Mr. Newberry stepped to one side. The curtain goes down upon him, and John S. Newberry appears, full-blood brother of Truman H. He calls Fred Smith to one side, the confidential agent of both of them, and says, "If my brother is a candidate and they want money, give it to them, let them have it." Mr. Smith, did Mr. John Newberry put any restrictions upon you? No, sir. He did not tell you when you drew $50,000 to let him know about it? No, sir. When you drew $100,000 on him, were you to remind him? No, sir. He just told you to let them have it and put no limits or restrictions on you whatever? That is right. Senators, that is the proper inference. He did not ask what you were going to expend it for? No, sir. He did not ask you to report to him at any time regarding the expenditure of a single dollar? No, sir.

Senators, is there a man in the world who would run a campaign like that if the money to be checked upon were his own? Here is the truth about it: That money was Truman Newberry's money, and John S. Newberry told Fred Smith what he did in order to shield Truman Newberry and to keep Truman Newberry from being connected with any money transaction. That is the proper inference to draw and conclusion to reach. Why did not John Newberry ask to have some report made of moneys spent? It was because the money was not his. If it had been his, would he not have had some limitation or restriction on its expenditure? If he had had any sense he would have done so, because if that fellow would turn a Michigan campaign committee, such as the Truman Newberry campaign committee, loose on his bank account without any kind of restriction he ought to be sent to an institution for the feebleminded.

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] said that John Newberry told them the money would be furnished. To whom did he tell it? Why, Mr. Templeton, I suppose. The Senator himself does not seem to have read all of the testimony. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] rose and reminded him that John Newberry swore that he never had any conversation at all with Templeton, Mr. Newberry's chairman; no conversation with Oakman; no conversation with King, his manager. Now, Senators, as soon as John Newberry performed his little service of shielding his brother and eliminating him, as he thought he had done, from connection with the money end of the campaign, why he went off and would have nothing more to do with it, and the money is checked out of his fund and Truman Newberry's fund by Fred Smith, and we find Mr. Truman Newberry objecting later on about his bank account running low. John did not object; John never did object; but Truman Newberry objected, so Fred Smith said under oath. Why did he object? If he was not spending a dollar, why did he object? Is not that a fair question to ask? If Truman Newberry was not having anything to do with the financing of the campaign, why did he object? You will hear that question many times, Senators, those of you who vote to seat him.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] asked us if we wanted to drag a man down and punish him for something he has not done. Mr. Newberry indorses the conduct of his committee. He said so in his speech in this body. He said this money was necessarily spent. He therefore approves the expenditure of it and the purpose for which it was used, and nobody can deny that.

Did Truman H. Newberry repudiate his committee's conduct? Not a bit of it. On the other hand, he approves it. Then if he approves it, it is his act. He is here, and we must act on him and not on the committee. Whether he bought the seat or his committee bought it, the principle is the same. I wish to show Senators how bold and arrogant those who represent Mr. Truman Newberry were and are, and the attitude that they assumed before a committee of the Senate of the United States. Listen, Senators, to this statement of Mr. Newberry's attorneys. They concluded their case with this statement:

No man connected with the Newberry senatorial organization in a managerial or executive capacity has had the slightest occasion to apologize for or be ashamed of anything he did in that connection.

What do you say about that, Senators? Are you going to apologize to Mr. Newberry's lawyers? Is the Senate of the United States called upon to bow the knee and truckle to that arrogant spirit displayed by men who have literally bought a seat for Mr. Newberry in the United States Senate?

Then, following that suggestion of his attorneys, Mr. Newberry himself comes in here, when whipped and lashed by Senators in this Chamber and by public opinion, and denies Senators the opportunity to ask questions and refuses to accept additional time for that purpose. The manager of his campaign in the Senate, Mr. SPENCER, also refused to have time granted him for this purpose. Mr. Newberry makes a brief statement, and, in substance, congratulates the committee for what it did, declines to repudiate its acts, and boasts of the friendship that he has for the man who managed his campaign, who conducted it in such a reprehensible fashion that the Nation is aroused to-day because of this, the most scandalous senatorial campaign in all its history. That is what you have before you to-day, Senators.

I wish to comment again upon our inability to keep Republican Senators in the Chamber. Mr. President, it seems that we have come upon the degenerate days of the boss-ridden Republican Party. Here is a case of the very highest importance that can come before us, now pending, liable to be voted upon at any time, a question involving the honor and integrity of this body, a question of pure and clean elections in the sovereign States, clean politics in America, and yet we can not keep constantly here more than half a dozen Republican Senators. At no time will more than a dozen of them remain.

They have a majority of 24 in this body, and we can not keep even half of their majority present. What will the people think of your conduct in this matter?

I think the Republican Party is drunk on the victory achieved in 1920. They had a majority of 7,000,000. We hear that boasted of frequently. I suppose they think because money was so lavishly furnished, and undoubtedly some of it by Mr. Newberry, that they can buy elections in the future and that the die is cast so far as this seat is concerned, and that they are going to seat Mr. Newberry without regard to the evidence and without regard to the principles involved.

I want this record to teem with the facts in this case, and the situation that exists here. The other day when the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] made his speech, several Republicans came in, heard what he had to say, and then left the Chamber. Then Mr. Newberry appeared, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] said he insisted upon being heard. That is the first time I ever heard him insist on anything but keeping as silent as the tomb. He was brought in and he read his statement, and we could not get an opportunity to ask more than a very few questions. He turned and walked out, and several of them walked out with him.

Mr. President, we are the sworn jurors in this case; we are to pass upon it. Suppose some of the jurors trying Mr. Newberry in Michigan had walked out of the courthouse and frolicked about the streets, had been absent while the testimony was going in and while the arguments were being made. Mr. Newberry's counsel would have arisen and said, "If your honor please, we insist that the jurors who are to pass on this man's case be required to remain here and to hear the facts and the arguments." The judge in the court would have insisted upon it. If the jurors had been permitted to wander out and engage in conversation with the enemies of Mr. Newberry and then came back and sat down just in time to vote on the verdict, everybody would have said the verdict was unfairly reached and ought to be set aside. Now, we are about to pass on this case and we have only about five Republicans present.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will yield merely for a question.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Alabama has once or twice made a remark as to the number of Senators who are present in the Chamber, both Republicans and Democrats. I have had prepared a brief statement covering about two hours of to-day's session showing the actual number of the Democrats and Republicans who were present in the Senate Chamber at five-minute intervals; and, if the Senator from Alabama has no objection, I will put it into the RECORD. It may be illuminating. It commences at 11.50 this morning and goes down to 1.35 this afternoon.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will not allow that to be done in my time.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to put it into the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not yield for that purpose. If the Senator desires to tell about it, he may tell about it when he comes to speak in his own time.

Mr. SPENCER. I am not going to discuss it; I merely want to put the statement into the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator may put it in in his own time if he desires to do so, but not in mine.

Mr. SPENCER. Let it be read.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; not now.

Mr. SPENCER. I thought perhaps the Senator might not want to hear it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not in my time. I want to keep the Senator here. The American people must know, they shall know, about this case.

My good friend from Missouri is a mighty clever gentleman personally, and he has certainly manifested a keen interest in this Newberry case. I want to read from an Associated Press dispatch published at the time the Senate committee were investigating the case:

Chairman Spencer interrupted the examination, and though Alfred Lucking protested vehemently, held to his decision that "This is enough about these checks."

They were trying to get a summons to have the checks brought in, but could not get it. Mr. Spencer and the majority of the commitee would not permit it.

Senator POMERENE (Democrat), of Ohio, however, left the committee room in some heat after trying to force an adjournment.

Out of the morass of flying checks, stubs, check registers, and accounts was drawn from Floyd, an explanation of one transaction which all concerned agreed was outside and above the reported Newberry expenditure.

Now, listen, Senators:

Mr. Green (the industrial leader summoned) came to me (Paul King) after the primary, and after our report was made up he said, and drew me a check for between $12,000 and $15,000, and I paid all bills that had come in after our accounting report.

Mr. President, there was $15,000 in just one item of this big slush fund that they failed and refused to report in campaign expenses. This amount is the salary of a Senator for two years. When the chairman of the committee was trying to stop the cross-examination the Senator from Ohio got angry and threatened to leave the committee room. The witness said, before he left the stand, that one item of $15,000 was paid by Mr. Green after the campaign was over and they had not accounted for it.

Senators, if these big concerns were buying this election for Mr. Newberry they must have expected to profit by it after he was elected.

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] belittles Mr. Cody. He said he was his (Mr. Newberry's) friend, his very talkative friend, and he wanted to laugh Mr. Cody out of court because Mr. Cody, representing Mr. Newberry, came to Washington and saw Mr. Hayden, who said he did not want to have anything to do with a money campaign, that he could not take the chairmanship; but Cody told him, in substance, "Do not say that; he (Newberry) will pay you so much money that you can not afford to refuse it." They were going out to influence people with money to start with.

Who is this man Cody that the senior Senator from Michigan would have us think was merely a talkative fellow? Mr. Fred Cody was the chief manager and intimate friend of Mr. Newberry. He "has an office in the downtown section of New York, and ostensibly is an insurance man, but is principally a lobbyist for the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., the American Book Co., Standard Oil Co., and other large and important Wall Street interests."

Who put up the $15,000 which Mr. Green paid after the campaign had closed? Mr. Cody was an active man in all of this, and he represented Wall Street interests. Mr. Cody is the man who went to Hayden; Mr. Cody is the man who arranged for the meeting with Paul King; Mr. Cody is the man who saw nearly everybody for Mr. Newberry; and Mr. Cody represents Wall Street interests. That accounts for two New Yorkers giving $25,000 each to the Newberry campaign fund.

Another item may be interesting in this connection. According to another Associated Press dispatch—

> Mr. Smith (Fred P. Smith) said he did not want to repeat gossip, but that "officials of the American Exchange National Bank (of Detroit) were very anxious to see Newberry nominated."

Mr. Blair, who was the head of the Union Trust Co., of Detroit, was Mr. Newberry's treasurer and Mr. Newberry's partner in business. Oh, Mr. President, these big interests were hugging this campaign mighty close to their heart all the way through the race.

It would be interesting if I had time in this speech to call to the attention of the Senate what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said so ably and well against Senator Stephenson, of Wisconsin, when he bought a seat in this body, and to read—which I shall do before I finally finish in this case—the statement of my good friends, the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and others who stood here with drawn swords and defended the honor and integrity of this body. I want to read into the RECORD, for the benefit of the country, what they stated so ably and well here against a Senator who had bought a seat in this body; but I must pass on.

Mr. President, I referred here a few days ago to an instance cited by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] of Newberry workers seeking out a man of prominence, an ex-mayor of his town, who had been convicted in the court, and telling him that if he supported Newberry they would keep him out of the penitentiary, but if he did not support Newberry he could go to the penitentiary. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] does not deny that and can not deny it, but he says a man can not be held responsible for the acts of his fool friends. I submit to the Senate and to the country that when Mr. Newberry's campaign committee and workers were permitted to go out and use such tactics as that, and when they are called to his attention, as they were in a general way by Vandenberg, of Grand Rapids, and by the lieutenant governor of the State, who wrote Mr. Newberry that his was the most scandalous campaign ever conducted, and he does not come out and protest against them in the newspapers of the State, he condones and approves them.

Now, I wish to cite to you, Mr. President, another instance that we will place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to be read by the people of the country, the men and the women who still believe, although it may be old-fashioned, that this Capital belongs to the people of this country; that this Government is theirs, and that its institutions belong to the great American masses. The men and women who read this RECORD after the roll is finally called will have an opportunity to see what sort of facts looked Senators in the face when they voted to barter a seat in this body.

Now, I want to show you how the Newberry managers worked on the farmers of Michigan; how they slipped up on their blind side; how they obtained their votes under false pretenses. Listen. A man by the name of Ladd, a lecturer for the Grange of Massachusetts, was sent out from Massachusetts into the Michigan campaign by Mr. Newberry's friends. They hired him, a Massachusetts man, to come into Michigan to lecture amongst the farmers and urge them to support Mr. Newberry.

Listen, Senators: He said they told him not to announce that he was speaking for Newberry; that he could do more good just by lecturing and working on the side and doing what he could for Mr. Newberry. That is the substance of his testimony. Was there ever a campaign like it? Paul King said not, and I am satisfied there never was, and I pray there never will be again.

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] told us that he is a candidate for reelection, but, said he, "I know that there will be millions put up against me." That statement is testimony already of the demoralizing influence of the Newberry campaign of 1918. The senior Senator from Michigan practically admits that this thing has already taken hold, and in effect that Newberry bought his seat, and they want to undertake to buy another seat. If they are going to put up millions against the senior Senator from Michigan, had he not better vote against setting a precedent for the sale of seats in this body?

Mr. President, if a goodly number of Republicans will not stay here, I ask those who are here to cease their conversation over there in the corner. They disturb me. If they do not want to hear the speech, they may go, like the others have gone, to play golf or sit around in the theaters or somewhere else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order, and the Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, they had a nice thing staged here for the Senate. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] said he—Newberry—knew nothing about politics; he was just a business man; his friends begged him to run, and he ran from a sense of duty. I wonder what kind of sense it was that ran him in 1904, when the papers of Michigan charged that he had a barrel campaign. We do not have to take the statements of men who resort to fiction. The Bible says: "By their fruits ye shall know them"; and the papers of Michigan tell us that in 1904 he opened a barrel campaign against Denby, now Secretary of the Navy, and that he himself, in person—Truman H. Newberry—was out, going through the district, giving out cigars by the box. Now, you know, he learned about politics from that experience. When this campaign came on he said to himself: "They accused me of having a barrel opened in a congressional race in 1904. I was on the ground and participating in it. I will get out of the State and have nothing to do with this one, and say I had nothing to do with it, and maybe I can get by with it."

Now, listen, Senators:

If Mr. Newberry would go to the extent of opening a barrel for a seat in the House in 1904, how far would he go in 1918 to secure a seat in the Senate? Yet they would have us believe that he had nothing to do with it; that he was busy up in New York, so busy that he did not even notice what he was writing to Paul King. He hardly knew what was going on, he was so absorbed in his business. A race for the Senate was on, the ambition of his life at stake. He had tried to get in the House with a barrel and failed. He did not want to fail now, and yet they undertake to have us believe that he just backed off; he knew nothing about it; John and his friends were furnishing the money. Well, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] was right. He said, "A man has fool friends."

Now, I want to submit this for the consideration of Senators:

If we do unseat Mr. Newberry—which we ought to do under our oaths before our country and God—he can stand up and say, if he chooses, if that will give him any comfort: "You did not unseat me for anything I did, because I laid it on the committee. Of course, I indorsed what the committee did. The committee is responsible for nominating me. Therefore the committee is guilty of the thing for which they have turned me out, and I do not feel hurt or humiliated about it. The committee did it." Let him unload on the committee.

I want to comment on this feature of this case just here.

Why was it that Mr. Newberry did not go upon the witness stand in Michigan? His lawyers told him not to. Why? Because he doubtless told them what he knew about the case, and they said, "Well, you stay off the witness stand." He said here that they advised him to stay off the witness stand.

When he came to the Senate, after the prosecution was wiped out and the verdict set aside upon a technicality by the Supreme Court, he came here in the hands of his friends, and they would not let him testify. They would not invite him. They would not request or require him to appear and tell United States Senators the truth and the whole truth about his case. He would not volunteer to come, and we never had an opportunity to cross-question him. What do you say to that, Senators?

Then we said: "If we can not get Mr. Newberry, let us have the bank books. You said John Newberry did this." "Yes, sir." "You say you transferred money from one account to another, Mr. Fred Smith?" "Yes, sir." "All right; we want those books and checks, so that we can see." "Oh," they said, "they are gone. They have been destroyed. They have disappeared."

Senators, how would a jury look upon a case like that in court if a man were to destroy testimony that was against him? What happened at Grand Rapids, Mich.? "Oh," they say, "some of his bank books and checks were there." My reply is, "Yes; and upon the testimony they disclosed the grand jury indicted him."

Now, before we can get them they are destroyed. If a grand jury composed largely of Republicans would indict him for a serious offense that meant going to the penitentiary if he should be convicted, right in his home State, the testimony must have been exceedingly strong, Senators.

Mr. President, if Mr. Newberry's friends saw the powerful and damaging effect of that testimony before a grand jury in Michigan and before a petit jury in Michigan, was not that the motive for destroying it before they came down here? Would not any fair lawyer argue that point to the court? If so, why can we not argue it here? Then when we say to them: "Go bring the bank books," they say, "They are gone." "Let us see the stubs." "They, too, have disappeared." "Will you not bring the checks?" "They, too, are gone. They all are gone." "All right; if they are gone and if Mr. Newberry will not testify, then let us summon the bank officials"; and the committee over which my friend from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] presided would not summon the bank officials!

What do you say to that, Senators? Do you think he can get away with a case like that at the judgment bar of the American people—hiding the evidence in the case, the Senate committee arbitrarily refusing to summon men who know the facts, keeping it all hidden from this senatorial jury sworn to return a true verdict under its oath, and the man himself refusing to testify? Can he get away with it?

Then they bring him into this Chamber under the limitation of one hour, when his right to a seat in this body is involved, and our rights are at stake and those of the American people, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] says, "Let us give you unlimited time, so that we can ask you questions," and the effect of his answer was, "No; I want to get out of here as soon as I can." Then the Senator from Mississippi asked the other day, "Let us give him unlimited time, so that we can ask him questions, and he can have an opportunity to answer all of the questions that we want to propound"; and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] objected to that.

What do you think of that, Senators?

Oh, Mr. President, there are some curious things in this case. Why is this man shielded? Is there any politics in it? There ought not to be. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] said that if Mr. Newberry were a Democrat he would have been turned out long ago. I suppose that is true. There ought not to be any politics in a case like this. I am reminded of what occurred in Tennessee when Bob Taylor—the lamented and beloved Bob Taylor of Tennessee—was a candidate for the Senate, and they gave him such a large vote. Some one asked a Republican in a Republican county: "What was the vote in your county?" He said: "Bob got 1,500 majority." The first man said: "I did not think the majority was over 100, one way or the other, sometimes Democratic and sometimes Republican." The Republican replied: "You know, it is this way: When old Bob is running we don't have any politics. We are all together then."

Senators, when the honor and integrity of this body is at stake, there ought not to be any politics in this Chamber on either side. I have indorsed that course of action before. I indorsed it at the time the Senate turned out a Democrat from Montana and when you turned out a Republican from Illinois. There ought to be no division amongst us with regard to politics when a man comes here with no other right to his seat except that he has bought it in the political market place.

I have undertaken to show to the Senate, in the five or six speeches that I have made in this case to the Senate, that these votes that Mr. Newberry got cost him more than $2 each, probably more than $5 each, because the testimony of some of the witnesses is that he spent $500,000 to $800,000. And, excepting the Newberry committee, God only knows how much was spent.

Here is another point I want to make, Mr. President, to my friends on the other side, for some of whom I have a great affection personally, and I do not want to see them tie their names up to this thing, because they are not going to hear the last of it:

There never has been in the history of this Government a case like this—not one. The Stephenson case was not a circumstance to it. The Lorimer case pales into insignificance compared to it. It is the rottenest, the most damnable purchase of a primary nomination that ever has been perpetrated on a free people in the Commonwealths of this Union, and I do not want to see them hurt in the wrath and indignation that is bound to come from the American people.

Here is the point: Do you remember that we have had to rely upon evidence that we have got from this man's witnesses, from witnesses who tried to shield him at every turn, from witnesses who were in his employ, from witnesses who drew thousands of dollars from him?

I should like to know what Paul King received for his service. I am satisfied that they paid him $50,000, not a cent less. Here are these men. They are trying to shield their chief, Mr. Newberry; they want to protect him. They wanted him to get this seat. They stood by him, and yet we have convicted him upon their testimony. How are Senators going to get around that? I propound that question to you in the closing hours of this debate.

Listen, Senators: Newberry refused to go on the witness stand in Michigan. Paul King, his manager, went on the witness stand, and when he had told his side of the case just exactly like he wanted to tell it, he said: "I am sick"; and went off the witness stand, and they never had a chance to ask him a single question—not one.

That is the kind of stuff that surrounds this case. What did those 11 Republican jurors do under their oaths, sworn to return a verdict according to the facts, citizens of that commonwealth, partisans, 11 of them, 11 Republicans and 1 Democrat? They returned a verdict of "guilty," and a Federal judge, a Republican in the Commonwealth of Michigan, pronounced a sentence of two years in the penitentiary upon a man who had just emerged from a primary covered all over with the slime of a slush campaign.

Those are the facts in the case. Senators, let me ask you a question: Do you not know that in my State, where I got votes enough to be elected to the Senate, and in your State, where you got votes enough to be elected to the Senate, the assembling of a grand jury that would indict you or me would be impossible except upon evidence overwhelming against us; and even after they had indicted you or me if the Federal petit jury knew that a conviction meant the penitentiary for you or for me, would they not have made a mistrial, or would they not have said, "We find him not guilty," in order to keep us out of the penitentiary, if the evidence had not been so strong and convincing against us? But, Senators, they convicted Mr. Newberry on the testimony of his own witnesses, and the judge sentenced him, and the Supreme Court never touched the question of his guilt or innocence. They simply said that the act was unconstitutional; and they said more than that. They said: "The Senate is the judge, and must itself decide whether or not Mr. Newberry is entitled to a seat here." And here we are to-day grappling with that question as men sworn to try it according to the testimony and to do our duty in the case.

Let me read again. Do you wonder that the grand jury indicted him? Do you wonder that the petit jury convicted him?

No man connected with the Newberry senatorial organization in a managerial or executive capacity has had the slightest occasion to apologize for or be ashamed of anything he did in that connection.

I would hang my head in shame if I should go to a poor, unfortunate man who had been convicted, appealing to the courts of his country, hoping that justice would prevail, and who was trying to save himself and his family from the disgrace of his going to the penitentiary, and take advantage of his misfortune. They stand over him with the Newberry candidacy and say, "If you do not vote for Newberry you will go to the penitentiary. If you do, you will stay out." They went to the newspapers. They purchased the support of many of them. They bought supporters for Newberry, and yet they say we are not sorry for anything we did. Ten dollars a week, $20 a week, $30 a week, $70 a week, $100 a week, $300 a month, thousands of dollars a month, and on up, were spent to hire men to go out to induce people to vote for Mr. Newberry. And then Senators say we can not turn him out; that we can not declare the seat vacant. Why not?

Mr. President, in this connection I want to bring out this point: What did Mr. Templeton say he was doing in New York? They said, "You were up there talking to Mr. Newberry about the campaign?"

"Well," he said, "you know, we are partners in business, and we were selling to the Government large amounts of supplies."

They were making money out of the Government. I think he said the Government was one of their largest customers at that time. The Government was buying from Mr. Newberry and Mr. Templeton supplies galore, and they were charging all sorts of prices to the Government. That throws a little light on the fact that John Newberry did not put any restriction on Fred Smith with regard to checking out money.

Mr. President, I know how they feel about it. They feel and act like they think that Mr. Newberry has bought this seat and he is entitled to it. Are we going to sanction that? That is what we have to decide. There is no getting around it. If a man buys a seat, if the committee that tries him says he spent too much money, if he himself admits that they spent too much money, and if I know that they spent too much money, and that money caused him to be here, and I vote to seat him, I can not escape the conclusion that I indorse the sale of the seat. There is no getting around that.

I shall conclude my remarks in a very little while if Senators want to adjourn, because there have been four or five here over on the other side, and I thank them for staying here to-day. I do not want to keep them here too long, or they might get the habit of their colleagues and go somewhere else to-morrow. I wish they would use their influence to bring the others in.

But I want to say this before I conclude, that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] tells us that these facts were before the people of the State of Michigan and that the people of Michigan elected Mr. Newberry in spite of them. I deny that; I challenge that statement of the Senator from Missouri. The people of Michigan did not know the facts that have been brought out before the committee here. These facts were not before them. If they had had the facts that we brought out in this committee, he would in all probability have been defeated. Henry Ford lacked only 4,000 votes of defeating him in a State where the Republican majority is normally 100,000.

Let me tell Senators what happened in that State. A week before the general election the Newberry papers covered the State, placarded it, with this statement: "Newberry has been vindicated. There will be no investigation." They did that when it was so late the voters could not learn the facts. So they obtained the general election under false pretenses.

Before I sit down, let me say that Henry Ford is out of it. He is not entitled to a seat here. Newberry is not entitled to a seat here. Let us say, then, it does not make any difference who the Senator is, whether he is a friend of the President and sits with him in box parties at the theaters, and the social lobby works for him at the receptions and every other place, and he dines in the White House, or whether he is covered all over with dollar marks, that we shall say by the help of God that no man shall come into this Senate and help shape and control the destinies of this people, unless his credentials are without spot and blemish, and his title clean and clear.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. President.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, after consultation with Senators upon the other side, I suggest a unanimous-consent agreement, to the effect that at 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon the Senate shall proceed to vote, without any further debate, upon the pending resolution, or upon any amendment or substitute offered thereto.

Mr. ROBINSON. I take it there is no intention on the part of the Senator from Missouri, in submitting the unanimous-consent request, to preclude a motion to recommit, with or without instructions, if any Senator desires to make such a motion.

Mr. SPENCER. If such a motion is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. There has been some discussion in anticipation of such a motion. I do not yet know whether it will be presented or not, but I want to have it understood that the unanimous-consent agreement will not preclude such a motion. A number of Senators, I understand, have made engagements which will take them out of the city at an early date, and it therefore seems important that an agrement be reached, if it can be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether we could have an understanding among ourselves that the time shall be equally divided?

Mr. SPENCER. I quite agree to that. It can not be put in the unanimous-consent agreement, I suppose, but among ourselves it can be understood that the time shall be equally divided between the two sides.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to occupy the time of the Senate for about 35 minutes to-morrow on some phases of the case I have not yet touched, which I am saving for a final appeal to my friends on the other side in the hope that some of them may be converted. I can not give my consent to the proposed agreement unless I can be assured now that I will have that time to-morrow, because I do not want any home-stretch work, such as the bringing in of Mr. Newberry at the eleventh hour, and Republicans filling up the RECORD with their speeches to-morrow. I think we had better let this matter go over until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and see how the land lies then.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Alabama is right.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator objects, there is no use to say anything more at this time.

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not agree to it now.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Alabama does not object, I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has said so much about the number of Republicans and the number of Democrats who were in the Senate at different times that I had compiled the number of Republicans and the number of Democrats in the Senate to-day, commencing at 11.50, at five-minute intervals, until 1.35 to-day, and I ask leave to insert the memorandum in the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suppose that covers the time when Senators were at lunch.

Mr. HARRISON. What does it show at 12.20?

Mr. SPENCER. As the Senator from Mississippi knows, because I showed him the figures a few moments ago, at 12.20 it shows that 12 Republicans and 16 Democrats were present. For my own peace of mind, I may add that at 1.25 it shows 27 Republicans and 17 Democrats.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Democrats were eating their lunches at that time.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I would like to ask the Senator if he went out and brought them in in order to have them here?

Mr. SPENCER. The record was not kept by me; it was kept by one of the officials of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. It was the first time the Democrats had seen so many Republicans here for quite a while, and they decided to take advantage of their presence and get something to eat, as that was the lunch hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is their objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to take just a few moments of the time of the Senate to state briefly my position with reference to this case.

I agree fully with all the legal propositions laid down on yesterday by the able and eloquent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I doubt if those who support the right of Mr. Newberry to a seat in this body can question the soundness of many, if any, of them. Over their application to the facts in this case there is room for honest differences of opinion.

Some of the propositions of those opposed to the right of Mr. Newberry to a seat in the Senate are utterly abhorrent to me and to my conception of the duty of a Senator, and are, in my judgment, more dangerous to our system of government than the acquisition of a seat in this honorable body by methods and practices which, to say the least, have been followed and acquiesced in for many years, and which have not yet been banned by legislative enactment in many of the States of the Union.

The chairman of the Democratic national committee, Mr. Hull, a few days ago threatened the Republican Party with the wrath of the people if Mr. Newberry is given a seat in the Senate. Similar arguments are hurled at us on this floor. This is not and can not be made a party question. It must be determined upon the individual judgment and conscientious convictions of Senators, and they will be held responsible by their respective constituencies. Can the Democratic Party take the position as an organization that if it is given control of the Senate it will settle cases of this kind upon the partisan demand of the people and not upon the merits of the cases? If it dares to take such a position, the people will repudiate it more signally than they did at the last election.

Senators are threatened from within and without with the wrath of the people if they vote to seat Mr. Newberry. No man within the party and no man without the party will dare to make a campaign against a Senator on that issue. Is there a man so ignorant of the sense of justice of the American people as to dare to ask them to elect him to the Senate on the issue that if he is elected to the Senate he will vote in cases of this kind on his fear of the people's wrath and not upon his honest convictions of duty upon the merits of the case? The people will make but one response to an appeal of that sort. They will prefer a man who may be conscientiously wrong to a man who may happen to be cowardly right. Some impulsive citizen may denounce his Senator for voting as he may, but if he believes in the honesty and courage of his Senator, on second thought he will honor and respect him for voting his convictions rather than his fears.

This telegram came to me yesterday:

Am sure your conscience will dictate your vote in reference to retaining seat by Senator Newberry with which the people should and will be satisfied. Resentful feeling against any attempted outside influence is expressed. People here know much less regarding the facts than do you. On yourself rests the responsibility.

Not all my telegrams are like that, but I am sure that that telegram represents the sober judgment of the great mass of the people of my State, regardless of politics, not only as to myself but as to all Senators. I am proud of it. I hope I am worthy of it. That should be the sentiment of the people of every State in the Union, and every Senator should strive to justify that sentiment and confidence.

When they stop to think, the people know what our duty is. They know that the Constitution makes us the sole judges of the qualifications and election of our Members. We are supreme. No power can overturn our verdict. No special rules of evidence, no fine legal distinctions, hamper us. We are the sole judges of the qualifications of the man who presents himself here and of the methods used to get here.

There is much to appeal to me on behalf of Mr. Newberry. He is a man of fine character, education, and refinement, a gentleman in every sense of the term. In two wars he has done a patriot's part. While the campaign for his nomination and election was on he was in New York doing his work as a lieutenant commander in the Navy. Political conditions in his State were exceptional and encouraged lavish expenditures of money.

At the request of friends he became a candidate for the Senate. While he did not give up his naval duties he went about making arrangements for an effective campaign. Paul King, recognized as one of the strongest political leaders in the State, was suggested for the manager of his campaign, and after a conference was selected as such. He became Mr. Newberry's agent and carried on his campaign in his behalf. His authority was unlimited. Mr. Newberry placed no restrictions upon him, either as to the raising of money or of spending it. He was kept advised from time to time as to the campaign, but apparently nothing was said as to the money that was being raised or expended. For some reason he made no inquiry about this, and says that he had no knowledge of the large expenditures and that they were made without his consent. I can not see how it can be truly said that this money was raised and spent without his consent. Grant that he had no actual knowledge of its raising or expenditure, he did know his campaign was being carried on. He knew it was going to cost a whole lot of money. Mr. King had told him so, and had even said it would cost at least $50,000. He knew a great deal was being spent from what was being done. He made no protest. He seeks to benefit from it. His consent must be conclusively presumed.

It is conceded that not less than $195,000 was raised and spent in his behalf in securing the nomination. It is not certain that it was not over $250,000. The expenditure of such a vast sum of money in a primary where the issue was what man should be named by a political party as its candidate for the office of United States Senator must shock every man who believes in and reveres our principles of government. This conceded fact is one that the people can clearly grasp, and I can not escape the conclusion that its approval or condonement by the Senate will tend to undermine the foundations of the Republic and alone justifies and demands the rejection of Mr. Newberry.

There is another outstanding fact which, in connection with the admitted spending of such a vast sum of money, compels me to the conclusion I have reached. The spirit and, I believe, the very letter of the Michigan primary election laws have been violated, and the Senate should not approve or condone the violation or disregard of State laws in the election of its Members.

The people of Michigan have seen certain methods and practices grow up in connection with primary elections that are obnoxious to pure elections. In 1909 they passed stringent laws against such practices and made them apply to the nomination of United States Senators.

I ask that I may print without reading, because I think it has been read and referred to many times, section 45. There are three numbers given in the report with reference to this section, 858, 3554, and 45. It is found on page 939 of the hearings in this case. I ask that I may print it without reading.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(858) § 3554. SEC. 45. Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives, lends, or agrees to give or lend, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration or office, place, or employment, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person in order to induce or have such person induce any voter to vote for or refrain from voting for, or support or oppose any candidate, or on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any primary election in this State; every person who by any means receives, agrees, or contracts for any money, gift, fee, loan, or valuable consideration, office, place, appointment, or employment for himself or any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting in a particular manner at any such primary election; or for inducing or undertaking to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner, or to do or perform any of the acts or things forbidden by this act, or on account of doing or agreeing to do, or having done any campaign work, electioneering, soliciting votes for such candidates on primary day or prior thereto, or who after any primary election in this State, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives or receives any money or valuable consideration or place, position, or employment on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting, or having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any such primary election; or having induced or undertaken to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner or for any particular candidate at any such primary election, or on account of any person having done or been a party to doing anything forbidden by this act, it being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto; also every person who in behalf of any firm, partnership, association, or corporation, gives, lends, or receives, or agrees to give, lend, or receive, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, place, position, or employment, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration, in order to aid or promote the nomination of any particular candidate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment for a period of not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator include in that section 48?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am going to include another section, which is probably the one the Senator has in mind.

Mr. KING. That ought to go into the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall not discuss the evidence at all at length. I will refer to one feature of it. It is clear to me that men were hired to go out and induce men to vote for Mr. Newberry. One man was hired to go among the laboring men and induce them to vote for him. Another was hired to go among the Masons to induce them to vote for him. One was hired to go among the Poles to induce them to vote for him. And still another was hired to go among the soldiers to induce them to vote for him.

All this in the very face of the statute which I have just read, and I wish to call especial attention to one declaration in the statute which makes clear what the Legislature of Michigan intended to prevent by the passage of this section. It says:

It being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of position, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto.

It is urged that the act of 1913 permits this. I can not think so. I ask that I may print as a part of my remarks without reading (668), section 3830, or section 3, found on page 932 of the record of the hearings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

The section referred to is as follows:

(668) SEC. 3830. SEC. 3. No candidate and no treasurer of any political committee shall pay, give or lend, or agree to pay, give or lend, either directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing for any nomination or election expenses whatever, except for the following purposes:

First, for traveling expenses and personal expenses incident thereto, for printing, stationery, advertising, postage, expressage, freight, telegraph, telephone, and public messenger services;

Second, for dissemination of printed information to the public;

Third, for political meetings, demonstrations, and conventions;

Fourth, for the rent, maintenance, and furnishing of offices;

Fifth, for the payment of clerks, typewriters, stenographers, janitors, and messengers actually employed;

Sixth, for the employment of challengers at primaries and elections, to the number allowed by law as such;
Seventh, for the payment of public speakers and musicians at public meetings, and their necessary traveling expenses;
Eighth, for copying and classifying of election registers or poll lists and investigating the right to vote of the persons listed or registered therein, and conducting proceedings to purge the registers and lists, and prevent improper or unlawful registration or voting;
Ninth, for making canvasses of voters;
Tenth, for conveying infirm or disabled voters to and from the polls;
Eleventh, for employing as counsel attorneys licensed to practice in accordance with the laws of the State, and for the necessary expenses of such counsel.
None of the provisions of this act shall be construed as relating to the rendering of services by speakers, writers, publishers, or others for which no compensation is asked or given.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I take it from a careful reading of the exceptions made in this section, the only exception which can be claimed to permit what I have just referred to is the exception relating to the canvassing of votes, which reads as follows:

9. For making canvasses of voters.

I can not construe this language in that way. It is not intended and does not permit the hiring of men to solicit and induce men to vote for a certain candidate which the former statute was specifically framed for the purpose of preventing.

Mr. President, looking at the expenditure of this vast sum of money as I do, feeling that its condonement by the Senate will tend to destroy the pillars of the Republic, and firmly believing that the spirit and the very letter of the Michigan primary laws have been violated, I can not vote for Mr. Newberry to retain a seat in this body.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate I desire to withdraw the substitute resolution offered by me and to tender in lieu thereof the following.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by Mr. WALSH of Montana to Senate resolution 172 declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, viz: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," in line 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That Henry Ford, contesting the election of Truman H. Newberry as United States Senator from the State of Michigan for the term commencing March 4, 1919, not having received a majority of the votes cast at the election, is not entitled to a seat in this body.

"Resolved further, Considering that it is against a sound public policy that huge sums of money should be spent for the nomination or election of a candidate for the United States Senate, and that such excessive sums were spent to secure for Truman H. Newberry the Republican nomination as such candidate for the State of Michigan at the primary election in that State for the term mentioned, and considering that the campaign for his nomination was conducted in gross and flagrant violation of the laws of the State of Michigan and in contravention of the statutes of the United States, he was not duly elected and is not entitled to a seat in this body.

CLEARWATER, ST. JOE, AND SELWAY NATIONAL FOREST LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 77) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. MYERS conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a proposition to amend the rules of the Senate in regard to the appointment of conferees was proposed by me, I think, during the last Congress. After a great deal of talk among Members it was finally taken up at a conference of Republican Senators and a committee was appointed to take the matter under consideration and report to another conference. That was done. At that conference a resolution was agreed to, amending the rules of the Senate and providing that when conference committees were appointed any Senator who was chairman of any one of the so-called major committees, which includes the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, should not be appointed as a member of a conference committee on the part of the Senate on any bill that was not passed on by the committee of which he was chairman.

The Republican leader [Mr. LODGE], under instructions of that conference, introduced the resolution, and it was supposed it would only be a matter of form until it became a part of the rules, but it was never reported out from the committee. The Committee on Rules has never acted on it and it has laid there and slumbered, but I take it that, at least as long as the Republicans are in control of the Senate, they will obey the spirit of that resolution.

That is the reason why I rose to suggest now, and I can do it with perfect propriety at this time because it happens that I have been appointed by the Chair as a member of this conference committee on the part of the Senate, that, being chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, if that resolution is in force I should not be appointed, and I therefore ask the Chair to name another conferee.

Mr. SMOOT. Was not the proposed rule a little different from the way the Senator states it? The Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was not one of the major committees, but if it had been one of the major committees the statement made by the Senator would be correct. That committee not being a major committee, the Senator from Nebraska can serve on the conference committee which has just been appointed.

Mr. NORRIS. I may be in error about it. If I am, I stand corrected.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure the Senator is in error.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to serving on the conference committee. At the same time I was the author of the proposition to amend the rules, and although the Republican conference took it out of my hands and never did anything with it afterwards, I feel as though we are morally bound to carry it out. I should like to see it carried out. It ought to be part of the rules.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure that it applies only to major committees.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may be right. It may be that it did not apply to the minor committees, of which the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys is one.

ADJUSTMENT OF WAR CONTRACTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to Senate resolution 159, information relative to action taken under the act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, which will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KING. That reply is in response to a resolution which I offered some time ago. It contains very important information which I am sure the Senate will be glad to receive, and I ask that the reply of the Secretary of War be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, January 12, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 11, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Spirit of God, do Thou impart to us Thy presence according to Thy will and word. We would have the wisdom that longs and seeks for the best things of life. Help us to lean upon Thee that our hearts may be inclined in this way. O turn our doubts into faith, our loss into gain, and our grief into joy. The Lord see to it that the hungry have bread, the poor have shelter, and that the people everywhere have great comfort. When our course runs out at the ebb of the world and we have our last look upon the earth that we love, may we stand as victors through Him who hath loved us. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate resolution 207.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JONAH KUHIO KALANIANAOLE, late a Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

TRANSFER OF BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 9060) on the Private Calendar, No. 136, be transferred to the Public Calendar. It is to all intents and purposes a public bill, and my purpose in asking that is so that I can put it on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bill No. 136 be transferred from the Private to the Public Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, we ought to know something about what the bill is.

Mr. ANTHONY. It authorizes the Secretary of War to transfer a lease on which a water plant is located on the military reservation at Leavenworth, Kans., from the corporation that owns it to the city of Leavenworth, which has purchased the plant. The only parties involved are the corporation of the city of Leavenworth and the War Department.

Mr. WALSH. Therefore it would seem to be proper on the Private Calendar.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are only public interests involved in it now.

Mr. WALSH. There are often bills on the Private Calendar in which the public is interested, but it seems unfair to pick out one particular bill and transfer it.

Mr. ANTHONY. We place bridge bills, for instance, on the Public Calendar, giving permits to construct bridges across navigable streams. Now, this bill is much more public in its nature than is a bill granting the privilege to a corporation or a person to construct a bridge.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. MANN. At different times this class of bills has been placed on the Private Calendar and then again on the Public Calendar. For myself, I think they belong on the Public Calendar. They are printed as public laws and not as private laws. They are not private bills in fact. I have no criticism of the Speaker for ordering them placed on the Private Calendar, but I think that bills that run to a public corporation ought to be on the Public Calendar.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, how they are printed as laws will not control the House as to how they should be considered or on what calendar they might be placed.

Mr. MANN. Certainly not. It does not control the House. Still they are recognized as public laws after they are printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the transfer will be made to the Union Calendar.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker will be away to-morrow and possibly for two or three days, and designates Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts to act as Speaker pro tempore.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair). This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk proceeded to the call of committees.

Mr. LAMPERT (when the Committee on Patents was called). Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ansorge	Dunn	Hogan	Lawrence
Barkley	Dupré	Hooker	Lee, N. Y.
Black	Echols	Humphreys	Lineberger

Radcliffe	Rodenberg	Snell	Voigt
Rainey, Ala.	Rucker	Stiness	Ward, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. On this vote 330 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. LAMPERT rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. LAMPERT. I call by direction of the Committee on Patents the bill (H. R. 7077) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up the bill H. R. 7077, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7077) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself for its consideration into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7077) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7077), which the Clerk will report by title.

The title of the bill was again read.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. This bill is being considered, as I understand it, under the Calendar Wednesday rule, under which there is an hour given to those in favor of the bill and an hour to those opposed, in general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. WALSH. And if no member of the committee opposes the measure, some other Member will be recognized at the proper time in opposition?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LAMPERT] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the bill H. R. 7077 is almost identical with H. R. 11984, which was twice passed by the House in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

So far as the number of employees is concerned, and so far as the salaries are concerned, it is identical with the measure which twice passed the House, except for the salaries paid three officials.

This bill has three main provisions—

First. It provides a necessary increase in salaries.

Second. It provides a slight increase in force, 48 in all.

Third. In order not to make an additional charge on the taxpayers during the present time of retrenchment, it provides an increase of fees to cover the increased expenditures.

When H. R. 11984 went to the Senate after having passed the House the first time, a so-called Federal Trade Commission section, having nothing to do with the administration of the Patent Office, was added by the Senate and the bill was otherwise amended and then passed. The House refusing to consent to the Senate amendments, the bill was sent to conference. All the conferees agreed upon the salary features of the bill, but one Senator refused to sign the report as long as it contained the Federal Trade Commission amendment. Finally, however, the House again passed the bill, even including the Federal Trade Commission section. When the bill went back to the Senate, it failed to pass, owing to the opposition aroused all over the country to the Federal Trade Commission section.

As above stated, this Federal Trade Commission section is not germane to the bill, since it has nothing to do with the administration of the Patent Office, and it has been omitted from the present bill, H. R. 7077.

The present bill has the approval of the Patent Office and has been unanimously reported by the House Committee on Patents.

The history of the original bill, H. R. 11984, was given by former Chairman NOLAN of the House Committee on Patents—see the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 5, 1920, page 3908. From that I quote as follows:

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill, H. R. 11984, is the committee substitute for three bills introduced early in this Congress by myself, as chairman of the Committee on Patents—H. R. 5011, 5012, and 7010. These bills were prepared by the patent committee of the National Research Council, consisting of a number of gentlemen connected with the arts, science, and industries of the country. They made an extensive investigation of the conditions in the Patent Office with regard to the Patent Office force and salaries. The Committee on Patents devoted considerable time during the month of July, 1919, to hearings on these bills, the hearings consisting of 320 pages. Appearing in favor of the measures was the patent committee of the National Research Council—I will not weary the House with the reading of the names, as you will find them in the report—the former Commissioner of Patents, Hon. Thomas Ewing; the present Commissioner of Patents, Hon. James T. Newton; a number of prominent inventors and scientists, as well as representatives of a large number of big manufacturers' associations of the country. The trouble in the Patent Office has been that during the war and since the signing of the armistice probably no other bureau of the Government has suffered from raids, or the taking away of its employees, both by other Government agencies and by the big industrial concerns of the country, as the Patent Office. The testimony that was presented to this committee was to the effect that the men would sooner retain their positions with the Government than go to outside institutions if there were any inducements in the way of salary or promotion. The statement was made and figures produced to show a large number of men, especially in the examining corps, had left the Patent Office during the war and since the signing of the armistice. The statement was made that at times we had as high as 80 temporary examiners on the roll. At the present time they have approximately 40 temporary examiners on the roll. It seems impossible to get the right caliber of men, or men with the necessary foundation in the way of technical education, to take the examination for examiners in the Patent Office or any of the other technical positions in that department.

* * * * * * *

I just stated that the Patent Office force, especially the examining corps, have left the Patent Office to a greater degree than any other Government agency, due to the lack of opportunity in the way of promotion and the increased salaries and excellent opportunities offered to men of their technical knowledge on the outside, going with patent lawyers, going with the patent departments of the big industrial institutions of the country, going with engineering organizations and chemical organizations, as well as all kinds of positions where men of high technical training are needed. All industrial organizations in the country that have any considerable amount of patent business or business with the Patent Office have a patent department, and they have made a systematic raid on the Patent Office for their best men.

The "raid" on the Patent Office examiners referred to by former Chairman NOLAN has continued and is continuing, so that the Patent Office has come to the breaking point. In fact, during 16 months preceding the last fiscal report 110 examiners had resigned, 1 out of every 4. During 32 months 231 examiners resigned—more than half the entire examining corps. Resignations are still coming in, and the Civil Service Commission is unable to fill all the vacancies. "Green" or inexperienced men have taken the place of experienced examiners, and it takes years to train these men to any degree of efficiency. The consequence is that the Patent Office has fallen in most divisions from 6 to 12 months behind with its work, and complaints are received from all parts of the country.

The work in the Patent Office is increasing by leaps and bounds, as may be seen from the following:

During the calendar year 1919 the number of patent applications filed rose to over 76,000—exceeding by 19,000 the number in 1918. Nineteen hundred and twenty exceeded 1918 by 24,000 patent applications; 1921 exceeded 1918 by 30,000.

The increase of work is also shown in the cash receipts of the Patent Office, which in 1918 amounted to $1,977,000; in 1919 to $2,417,000; in 1920 to $2,680,000; and in 1921 to $2,775,000—an increase of $800,000, or 40 per cent, over 1918.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMPERT. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman mean 1921 or 1920?

Mr. LAMPERT. 1921.

Mr. SNYDER. Has the gentleman a complete record for the applications for patents for 1921?

Mr. LAMPERT. I think that is correct.

Mr. SNYDER. I just wanted to make sure of that; that is all.

Mr. LAMPERT. I have a comparison here:

Comparison calendar years 1918 and 1921.

	1918	1921	Increase in number.	Increase in per cent.
Patents	57,180	87,408	30,228	53
Designs	2,232	5,596	3,364	150
Trade-marks	6,846	16,234	9,388	137
Total	66,258	109,238	42,980	65

Increase in work in 4 years, 65 per cent.
Increase in personnel in 4 years, 5½ per cent.

(The biggest year—1916—in the history of the Patent Office, prior to the war, showed receipts of 68,000 patent applications, 2,684 design applications, and 8,628 trade-mark applications; 1921 showed an increase of 38 per cent in work and $435,000 in cash receipts over that year.)

The increase of work is overwhelming and the Patent Office is hopelessly in arrears.

There are now over 59,000 patent applications and 6,000 trade-mark cases awaiting action, and with more than one-half the force composed of untrained men the Patent Office can not escape going further in arrears.

Even with the relief afforded by the present bill, it will take several years to build up the present force, with so many inexperienced men, into a stable, competent examining corps, able to make any material impression upon the arrears of work already piled up.

Without relief, the situation is hopeless.

Relief is, therefore, imperative. An increase of salaries is the only thing that will save the Patent Office. The 110 examiners who resigned in a little over a year were experienced examiners, with from 2 to 20 years' training. It is needless to state that young men just graduating from college and with no patent experience can not act on intricate technical cases, such as automatic telephones, calculators, adding machines, metallurgical and chemical inventions, as rapidly as those who have spent years in the Patent Office on these specially intricate and technical subjects. Not only does it take years to train these examiners but in the meantime all their actions must be minutely supervised by the remaining experienced men, in order to prevent mistakes which would be costly alike to the inventors and to the manufacturing industries of the country. In fact, the time of the experienced examiners is being dissipated in training the inexperienced men.

THE AMOUNT OF SALARY INCREASE.

The bill as reported raises the salaries of the chief or principal examiners from $2,700 to $3,900 per year, and the assistant examiners are given increases ranging from $150 per year to $900 per year. The salary of the principal examiner is the key to the whole situation. Back in 1848 the principal examiner was paid the same salary as was paid to Congressmen—$2,500 per year. He now receives the same salary plus only $200 per year. The American Patent Law Association has taken a referendum vote among its members resident in 47 different cities of this country, and many believe the salary of the principal examiner should be at least $5,000. In fact, as far back as 1912 the Taft Economy and Efficiency Commission fixed $3,600 as the proper salary. The National Research Council placed it at $4,200, in endeavoring to put it at a figure that would pass Congress during a time of economy and retrenchment. Under the Lehlbach bill as it passed the House the principal examiner can draw from $3,720 to $4,620. The Wood-Smoot measure provides still higher pay. While it is generally believed that the salary of the principal examiner should be higher than $3,900, as fixed by the present bill, this figure was agreed upon at the time the bill originally passed the House with the hope that the bill would immediately pass as an emergency measure to save the Patent Office pending the reclassification of all Government employees.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMPERT. I would rather finish this first, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I understand that patent attorneys do not have to have the legal training that the usual practitioner has, and that the bar association will take no action in matters of complaints of fraudulent practices on the part of patent attorneys, because they are really not attorneys at law. Is there any provision in this bill whereby a party who has a grievance against a patent attorney can get any redress? If not, does not the gentleman think that this bill ought to contain a provision that will give them some redress? A patent attorney is not allowed to practice law as a regular attorney is allowed. He is not required to have the same legal training and skill and experience, and so forth. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the public ought to have some protection by having a provision inserted in this bill that will correct that evil?

Mr. LAMPERT. If the evil exists; yes. I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman the question because he is the chairman of the committee, and he ought to know, and I presume he does know. I would like to have him answer that question.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I would like to get some information if the gentleman will give it to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I would like the gentleman to answer my question. Did he answer the question? If so, I did not hear him.

Mr. LAMPERT. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Well, I think that the gentleman does not know.

Mr. LAMPERT. The Commissioner's salary is increased from $5,000 to $6,000—$1,500 less than recommended by the National Research Council and $1,500 less than paid the Director of the Census or the Director of the Bureau of Mines—the First Assistant Commissioner from $4,500 to $5,500; the Second Assistant Commissioner from $3,500 to $5,000; five members of the Board of Examiners in Chief—who must be appointed by the President and who, under the statute, must have both scientific and legal training—from $3,500 to $5,000; chief clerk, who must be skilled in patent matters, from $3,000 to $4,000; one solicitor—who must represent the Patent Office before the courts—from $2,750 to $5,000; five law examiners from $2,750 to $4,000; two examiners of interferences, who act as judges in patent and trade-mark suits—interferences—from $2,700 to $5,000, and so on.

At the time the bill passed the House, March 5, 1920, it was predicted that the resignations would soon fall off, and it was also prophesied that the influx of work had reached the peak.

The opposite has proved to be the fact.

As already explained, the work has increased by leaps and bounds and the resignations have been and are continuing.

The present situation at the Patent Office is without parallel. The Patent Office with an accumulated surplus of $8,500,000 of inventors' money piled up in the Treasury above all expenses, and making annually from $150,000 to $300,000 above all expenditures, is in the unique position of having its patrons from all over the country rush to its defense, and in order to get an increase of salaries for the officials of the Patent Office these patrons agree that the fees shall be increased to pay the bill. Usually our constituents demand that their bill for public services be paid out of the Public Treasury, but in this case all the big institutions from every part of the country have appeared before the various committees of Congress asking for the increase of salaries and cheerfully agreeing to the additional fees to pay for such increase in salaries, so that the expense shall not fall upon the already burdened taxpayer.

Among the institutions appearing before the committee in support of this bill are the following:

The National Research Council, the Manufacturing Chemists' Association, the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, the American Patent Law Association (having members in 47 different cities from Portland, Me., to San Francisco), the National Association of Manufacturers (representing 5,000 manufacturers, who sent a special delegation to Washington in behalf of the patent bill), the Patent Law Association of Chicago, the Cleveland Engineering Society (composed of about 1,000 members), the Chamber of Commerce of Cleveland (3,500 members), the Merchants' Association of New York (over 6,000 members), the American Society of Civil Engineers, the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, the American Society of Mechanical Engineers (12,000 members), the Automotive Electrical Association, the Westinghouse Co. (with plants in 15 different localities in the United States, employing an army of men), the Electrical Manufacturers' Club, the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers (6,000 members), the American Bar Association, the New York County Lawyers' Association, the American Chemical Society, the American Engineering Council (comprising 150,000 engineers), and many others.

SENATE COMMITTEE REPORTS "LEGISLATION OF THIS KIND ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY."

In report No. 596 of the Sixty-sixth Congress the Senate Committee on Patents unanimously reported (May 18, 1920) as follows:

Your committee, after a full investigation of the subject, have reached the conclusion that some legislation of this kind is absolutely necessary for the efficient management and handling of the business of the Patent Office.

Thousands upon thousands of letters and resolutions have been received by Congress, and newspapers from all parts of the country are demanding relief for the Patent Office.

The inventors have not only paid for the Patent Office Building but, as above stated, they have piled up a surplus of $8,600,000 above every expense of the Patent Office, and now the inventors of this country are asking merely that sufficient money be expended out of their fees to insure their inventions reasonably prompt and accurate adjudication. [Applause.]

Comparison of reclassification bill, H. R. 8928, as it passed House, and H. R. 7077.

Title.	Reclassification bill.	H. R. 7077.
Principal examiners	$3,720 to $4,620	$3,900
Assistant examiners	1,620 to 3,540	$1,500 to 3,300
Solicitor (grade 5)	4,860 to 5,460	5,000
Law examiners (grade 4)	3,720 to 4,620	4,000

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he sits down?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any member of the committee who is opposed to the bill and who desires recognition?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No. The members of the committee are unanimously in favor of the bill. It is unanimously reported.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I expended?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-three minutes have been expended.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is no doubt in the world that something ought to be done to reorganize and rehabilitate the Patent Office. But there is no justification whatever for the compensation fixed in the bill pending before the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who is addressing the House is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I am sure the membership ought to hear him, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-three Members present, a quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. We want to remember that there are more than 300,000 other employees of the Government outside of the Postal Service. The salaries of the employees of the Postal Service have been classified, but there are more than 300,000 other employees in the Government service whose salaries have not yet been classified. There is a bill pending to classify the salary of every Government employee, including those in the Patent Office. That bill has passed the House. The compensation fixed in the bill before us to-day is much higher than the compensation fixed for like service in the classification act which has passed the House.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I do not want to yield now. The classification bill which passed the House provides for the classification of men engaged in professional service and fixes the compensation in the various grades. Now, these men in the Patent Office are engaged in professional service. The bill that is before us provides that the pay of the commissioner shall go up from $5,000 to $6,000 at once. The bill that passed the House provides that the pay of the commissioner shall go up to $5,400 and eventually as high as $6,600, depending entirely upon the volume of the business, the importance of the work, and the efficiency with which he conducts the office.

The next salary in the bill before us is that of first assistant, and it is provided in this bill that it shall go from $4,500 to $5,500. The bill which passed the House a short time ago provides that the salary of the first assistant shall go to $4,860 instead of to $5,500, and finally, in the course of the years to come, his salary may go as high as $5,460.

As to the second assistant, provided for in this bill, he is now getting $3,500. The bill provides that he shall get $5,000, an increase of $1,500. The bill that we passed in the House a short time ago provides that he shall get $3,720 to begin with, and that finally his salary shall go up as high as $4,620.

Examiners are now getting $3,500. This bill proposes to put them up to $5,000, while the bill that passed the House proposes that they shall get $3,720 instead of $3,500, and that they shall go up as high as $4,620 later, in various steps.

The solicitor is now getting $2,750. The bill proposes to give him $5,000. The classification act that we passed a short time ago provides that he shall go up to $3,720, and finally up to $4,620 in the course of the years.

Chief clerk. He now gets $3,000. It is proposed in the bill to pay him $4,000. We propose that he shall get, to begin with, $2,940, a reduction of $60, and that he shall finally go up as high as $3,660.

The law examiners get $2,750 to-day. This bill carries them up to $4,000. We propose to put them at $2,820 in the bill that passed the House and to go up as high as $3,540 eventually.

The principal examiners are getting $2,700. This bill proposes to put them at $3,900, and we propose under the bill that we passed to give them $2,820 to start with and finally up as high as $3,540. The first assistants are getting $2,400, and this puts them up to $2,900, $3,100, and $3,330. We propose in the bill that passed the House to give them $2,100, $2,280, $2,460, and $2,640.

The second assistants now get $2,100. This bill proposes to give them $2,350, $2,500, and $2,800. In the bill that passed the House they are classified in grade 2.

Gentlemen of the House, remember that these places are all classified in the bill which has passed the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. When will these increases of salaries become effective in the bill which has passed the House?

Mr. MADDEN. The hope of the Senate is that they will pass the bill by the 1st of April. That is what the chairman of the committee over there says.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Wait. I am answering the question of the gentleman from Ohio. I talked with the chairman of the committee over there, and he told me that he expected to have the classification act passed by the 1st of April. Of course, the bill as it passed the House provided that it should not become effective until the fiscal year 1924, but there is no reason why it can not become effective before that.

But remember that it is not the money involved in this bill that is at stake. It is the money that is involved in a further increase of the pay of the other 300,000 people in the Government service who are included in the Lehlbach bill.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not now. You are not dealing merely with the Patent Office. You are dealing with the entire Government service. What right have we to think that if we pass this bill to increase the salaries in the Patent Office we will not have to increase the salaries in the Lehlbach bill from top to bottom, as to the other 300,000 people? Does anybody suppose that people engaged in like service, performed by equally competent men, as thoroughly trained in the technique of the law, doing professional work for the Government in all the other departments, will be satisfied with the increases carried in the Lehlbach bill if you put these men in the Patent Office much above them?

Gentlemen, we have a serious proposition before us. It is the problem of the American people. The problem with which the American people are struggling is how to get bread, how they are to keep shelter over them; not how to increase their compensation, but how to get any kind of compensation.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not yield now. The question for us is, Do we speak for the American people in the conditions which they are compelled by existing conditions to confront, or do we speak merely for those who want to get their arms up to their shoulders into the Federal Treasury? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for two minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I have used all the time that I care to occupy.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL].

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I want to answer the distinguished gentleman from Illinois on this proposition of salaries. I undertake to say that an examination will show that the statement he made in reference to the salaries in the Lehlbach bill and the salaries of this bill would show a difference of 50 per cent is erroneous.

Mr. MADDEN. I gave the figures.

Mr. VESTAL. The figures the gentleman used as a basis for his comparison were figures in a bill that was considered two years ago. After that bill was considered a new bill was passed.

Mr. MADDEN. I gave the same figures that were in the Lehlbach bill.

Mr. VESTAL. I beg the gentleman's pardon, and I will show that they are not. After the first bill was considered the committee considered another reclassification act, and upon that act the Lehlbach bill was drafted and they have in that bill a patent-examiner group, and under the patent-examiner group as shown by the Lehlbach bill every salary in this bill comes within the Lehlbach classification bill except the salary of the assistant commissioner.

Here are the groups: Grade 1, as proposed in the bill the salaries range from $1,800 to $2,100. The Lehlbach bill has the salaries ranging from $1,620 to $1,980. That is the first grade under the patent-examiner group. In this bill upon which the Lehlbach bill was fashioned and drafted in committee, under grade 2 the bill provides salaries from $2,340 to $2,880. Under the Lehlbach bill the salaries are $2,100 to $2,640. Under grade 3 the bill as finally passed the compensation ranges from $2,820 to $3,540. I am giving you the figures to show that they are the same figures as the gentleman in his statement said were before the House. Under grade 4 the compensation is $3,720 to $4,620. Grade 5, the compensation is from $4,860 to $5,460. Grade 6, from $5,400 to $6,600.

Take the salaries as set forth in the bill under consideration and see where they fit into the Lehlbach bill. Take the first assistant commissioner, and in the statement read by the gentleman from Illinois that is the only one I say in which the salary proposed in this bill is out of line with the Lehlbach bill. In the Lampert bill they propose a salary of $5,500.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I can not yield now. The first assistant under the Lampert bill receives a salary of $5,500; under the reclassification bill, under the patent-examiner group, under grade 5, which gives the Assistant Commissioner of Patents the maximum salary of $5,460. Now, as I say, that is the only one in which the salary is at all out of line with the classification bill that we passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. VESTAL. Now, take the examiner in chief. The examiner in chief as set out in the reclassification act under the patent-examiner group, and that is the last one, the one upon which this was made, they are set out under group 5. There are five examiners in chief, constituting the board of appeals, and these are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and at the time they were first appointed, as shown by the chairman of the committee, they received the same salary as a United States district judge. They do appellate work entirely. If they decide that an invention is patentable, their decision is never reviewed by the commissioner. They carry on the most advanced professional work. In fact, the judges perform the same work as the commissioner, except they do not have the administrative duties. They certainly would go under group 5 in this reclassification bill, which allows them a salary of from $4,860 to $5,460, and we give them a flat salary of $5,000.

Now, gentlemen, it is not a theory but a condition that confronts the Patent Office. They are 60,000 applications behind that they are unable to pass upon. You have got to have somebody competent to pass upon them if you expect the Patent Office to do its work, and the salaries should be commensurate with the service rendered.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the chief examiner go into the same class?

Mr. VESTAL. Absolutely.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the gentleman will find any authority for that in the Lehlbach bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman says that the Patent Office is 60,000 applications behind. Has the gentleman considered that there are always 40,000 applications in the Patent Office? He does not mean that they are 60,000 behind, but 60,000 in the office.

Mr. VESTAL. No; 60,000 behind.

Mr. SNYDER. All right. Then we have that cleared up if the gentleman is correct in his statement.

Mr. VESTAL. I want to take up now the solicitor. We give the title of solicitor to one of the law examiners because of the duties he has to perform. Let us see what his duties are and whether he ought not to be placed in group 5. This particular solicitor of the Patent Office represents the commissioner as counsel in the court of appeals in the District of Columbia. During the last four years he has argued 66 cases before this court alone. On the November call he had 11 cases; on the January call, now running, he has 20 cases. He has appeared as counsel for the commissioner and has had opposed to him the best patent lawyers from all parts of the country. In addition to that, he has to act as counsel for the Commissioner of Patents in all mandamus cases before the court.

If you will read the Lehlbach bill through, it is doubtful whether you will find any place fixed for a solicitor in the Government. But on account of the important work placed upon the solicitor of the Patent Office, it seems to me that he ought to come under or within grade 5. He serves as a consulting specialist, using the language set out in grade 5 in the reclassification bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. VESTAL. Let us now take up the law examiners and the principal examiners. Grade 4 of the Lehlbach bill provides for those who perform independent and highly expert professional work, or for those in charge of minor divisions of a large organization. Their salaries range in this bill, under group 4, from $3,720 to $4,620, while our bill provides for $3,900 flat. Yet under the reclassification bill the salaries would run from $3,720 to $4,620, while we fix the salary at $3,900 flat, as I say. Each of the principal examiners performs independent and highly expert professional work, and, moreover, is in charge of a minor division of a large organization. Each of these examiners has from 8 to 10 professional assistants, besides the ordinary clerks; and their work is of such an independent and highly expert professional character that if they decide an invention to be patentable there is no appeal from their decision; and I submit that the only place provided for those principal examiners in the reclassification bill is under grade 4, and the salaries, as before stated, in this grade range from $3,720 to $4,620, while we provide a salary of $3,900.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Which represents a saving of $720 a year.

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Now, let us take the law examiners. The law examiners at the present time are regarded by the statute as a trifle higher than the principal examiners, as may be shown by the fact that the present statutory salary is $50 more per year.

These law examiners are detailed by the commissioner to take certain classes of work of a highly technical and professional nature, and they are, in fact, "consulting specialists." They perform the most advanced work in the Patent Office, and they, with the principal examiners, belong in grade 4.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. VESTAL. I have only one minute more. Let us take the chief clerk. Certainly he should go under group 4. The range of salary in this grade is from $3,720 to $4,620, and the salary we fix is $4,000. We fix the salary of the principal examiners at $3,900.

ASSISTANT EXAMINERS.

House bill 7077 provides for four grades of assistant examiners, as does the present statute, and these assistant examiners are paid from $1,500 to $3,300 per annum. They fit within grades 1, 2, and 3 of the Lehlbach bill, which provides for from $1,620 to $3,540 per annum.

As an example, let us refer to the first assistant examiners as styled by H. R. 7077. These first assistants are compelled to act as principals in the absence of the principals; they have at all times to do highly professional and technical work, because there are from 8 to 10 assistants under the principal, and one principal can not review all the work. The volume of work in each division is such that the first assistants have to be left largely to themselves, so that, in the words of the Lehlbach bill, they—perform duties independently or with a small number of subordinates in the junior or assistant professional grade.

Frequently two or three of the junior assistants, as, for example, the fourth and third assistant, have to be supervised by a first assistant. Hence, these first assistants come within grade 3, which provides for services—the duties of which are to perform independently or with a small number of subordinates, in the junior or assistant professional grade, responsible professional work requiring training and previous experience.

The assistant examiners are all scientifically trained, and almost all of them are members of the bar and hold degrees. All of the examiners are compelled to pass examinations in French or German upon entrance in this work.

The first assistants under H. R. 7077 receive from $2,900 to $3,300, while under the Lehlbach bill, in grade 3, they would receive from $2,820 to $3,540.

The second, third, and fourth assistants would fit into grades 1 and 2.

Grade 2 of the Lehlbach bill would take care of most of the second assistants, but there are a number of the second assistants who must necessarily and often do perform professional work involving the exercise of independent judgment, and therefore the senior assistants should not be placed in grade 2 but under the minimum salary provided for in grade 3 of the Lehlbach bill.

In addition to the fact that two-thirds of the second assistants should go into grade 2, this grade would also take care of the third assistants. These third assistants perform "under general direction assigned professional work requiring professional training and previous experience, but not the exercise of independent judgment." For this reason the third assistants can not go into grade 1, but must go into grade 2, because they have all had "professional training and previous experience." In fact, some of the fourth assistants could very properly go in this grade also, since they have had "professional training and previous experience." However, most of the fourth assistants undoubtedly belong in grade 1, since the duties of this grade are "to perform under immediate supervision the simplest kinds of work requiring professional training."

This bill should be passed without delay. The Patent Office is having resignations every day. The number of resignations during the first six months of 1921 were 28, for the last six months 24. The receipts of the office for 1918 were $1,977,000 and for 1921 were $2,775,000, an increase of $800,000, or 40 per cent.

Patent applications filed in 1918 were 57,000 and in 1921 87,000, an increase of 52 per cent.

The increase in personnel has been about 5½ per cent.

The Patent Office two and a half years ago was behind in its work 18,000 cases. March, 1921, they were behind 42,000 cases. December 31, 1921, they were behind 60,000 cases.

Is it any wonder we are asking for relief. We can not wait for the reclassification bill for the following reasons:

First. The reclassification bill does not provide additional employees.

Second. The reclassification bill does not take effect until July 1, 1923, and the Patent Office must have immediate relief.

Third. The reclassification bill places the expenses of the increase of salaries on the already overburdened taxpayer, whereas H. R. 7077 provides an increase of fees to pay for the increase of salaries, so that the taxpayer does not have to bear one cent of the burden.

We need the relief now. This bill gives us relief without increasing the burden of the taxpayer.

I hope the bill will be speedily enacted into law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

[By unanimous consent Mr. VESTAL was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. This gentleman is the chairman of the Reclassification Committee, and I think he should have a hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-five Members present, a quorum.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration and its terms are an excellent example of the viciousness of the present system of fixing compensation for the personnel of the civil service of the Government. A committee, such as the committee reporting this bill, is interested especially with the work of the particular Government activity over which its jurisdiction extends, and is generally in sympathy with it and desires to give it all of the assistance possible. It has no special interest and no knowledge of conditions in departments doing commensurately equal work throughout the Government service. It makes no comparison with other departments and bureaus and divisions in other departments and treats the particular bureau and division for which it reports legislation independently, without such reference to other governmental work that is being carried on.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman think the work in this office is of a highly specialized kind, which would require special consideration and men of unusual attainments?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Certainly; and there are dozens of governmental activities that require likewise highly specialized employees and men of unusual attainments, and we have them by the thousands throughout the service of the Government. It has been stated here that the salaries in this bill are commensurate with and approximately equal to and within the scope of the salaries in the reclassification bill passed by this House on the 15th of December.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. According to the gentleman's philosophy stated a while ago, is it not a fact that if that were pursued the House should disregard the recommendations of all committees dealing with different departments and leave it to only one committee, upon the supposition that that committee could become more familiar with all of the various departments of the Government than several other committees?

Mr. LEHLBACH. As to substantive legislation, certainly not; but when it comes to fixing the salaries of Government employees that ought not to be done by one committee of the House having knowledge only of a particular bureau, but it ought to be done generally. That is the fundamental principle of the reclassification bill which this House only a few days ago passed by an overwhelming vote.

The schedules in the reclassification bill as revised by the House in Committee of the Whole provide in general terms for the broad services of the Government and the grades into which the employees in those services shall be divided.

The original plan for a reclassification was by a classification by titles of positions. Here is a bill, H. R. 15225, which was introduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress, which is such classification. By name and title it provides for the various occupations and positions in the Federal service and fixes a salary range for them. It was manifestly impossible to ask Congress to give consideration to a bill of this volume and to read it and consider it section by section and line by line. Furthermore, it was deemed that a classification by precise positions throughout the service was a too rigid classification, and it was determined that it was better to take this classification and generalize it and divide it into appropriate services and divide those services into grades into which each one of these positions so classified would find an appropriate place and a salary range fixed, and that was done.

The classification bill that you passed is based upon the classification of specific positions in H. R. 15225, of the Sixty-sixth Congress, and by reference to it you can find where each one of these patent positions were supposed to be allocated. You take the position of principal examiner of patents, and we have examiners in chief; we have special examiners for various subjects; and then we have the examiners themselves, who have first, second, third, and fourth assistants. Those are the principal examiners, and they have these assistants. Their duties are defined specifically in H. R. 15225, which is the basis of the classification bill passed by the House, and we find on page 94 of the bill, under grade 3, patent examiner; patent examiner—trade-marks and designs; patent examiner—patent interferences; patent examiner—classification; assistant chief clerk, Patent Office; patent adviser. Those come within this grade, and their duties are defined as follows:

To perform under direction the most difficult technical and legal work involved in examining and making disposition of applications for patents or designs, or for registration of trade-marks, and in making related investigations and reports; to assist in supervising the work of a patent or interference or trade-mark division; to assist in determining the proper classification of patents and patent applications; to assist the chief clerk of the Patent Office in clerical administration; or to perform highly technical patent and related legal work for a department, bureau, or independent establishment of the Federal Government.

This is exactly the definition of the work that the principal examiners do, and the range of compensation is from $3,120 to $3,840, which by the House was scaled down in the bill from those figures to $2,820, $3,060; $3,300, and $3,540.

Now, this work is described as highly specialized, requiring technical knowledge and legal knowledge. And in all other departments there is work of that character, or in a good many departments, namely, in scientific, technical, and legal bureaus, and that is the range of pay for this work throughout the Government service for that. And we find in the Lampert bill, while everybody else is doing specialized work requiring training, experience, and specific knowledge of a given subject as well as legal knowledge, that while in all the other departments of the Government they get but $2,820 they are to start in under this bill at $3,900, an increase of $1,200 over the present pay. Is that fair to every scientist and lawyer in every other department who is not going to get the benefit of specific legislation?

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman point out any other branch of the service in Washington, any other Government service, where they have the same class of people as mentioned in the Patent Office, that are getting the salary which the gentleman mentions?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The Bureau of Chemistry, the Bureau of Standards, and the Attorney General's office, the Customs Service, and in dozens of other services, where a man has to have a lifetime of training and experience and has to know all about a commodity, its origin, the manner of its manufacture, and its constituent parts. The Bureau of Standards will come and tell you the same story, and the Attorney General's office will come and tell you the same story, and all these stories are just.

And I admit that in the Patent Office the necessity for relief is immediate. I hope the bill passes giving immediate relief in anticipation of reclassification, but the relief ought not to be so inordinately out of line with the salaries that Congress deemed proper for like work in other departments of the Government.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Last summer, I think, the gentleman informed me that under this reclassification bill it was not the intention to lower the pay or salary of any governmental employee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And it will not happen unless the employee is receiving a salary in excess of the maximum fixed for the grade in which he falls.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Has the gentleman been informed that the reclassification bill reduced the compensation of 1,700 employees in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not so know, but it may be possible. The scaling down of the pay in the bill as it was originally reported to the schedules as finally passed was a proposition that was yielded to in deference to the wish of the House. It may effect such a reduction in the Department of Agriculture in these grades, but I do not know. But if it does reduce the salaries, then in the judgment of the House those individuals were being paid in excess of what was reasonable and fair compensation. That was the judgment expressed by the House in accepting the amendments to the bill as it was reported to my committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. PERKINS. If this bill be passed and afterwards the reclassification bill be passed, will not the salaries in the Patent Office be subject to the reclassification and not to this bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Surely.

Mr. PERKINS. Then would it not be a good idea to pass this as an emergency measure?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Well, it would be a good thing to pass it as an emergency measure, but I do not think it is a good policy to give people anywhere from $500 to $1,000 more per annum than you intend they should have permanently, and particularly in view of the fact that it is intended to bring a lot of new employees into the office. It is not fair to them or to the Government to bring them in on a salary which you intend in a short time to cut by 50 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I shall insert in the RECORD with my remarks a comparison of the present salaries in the office, running from commissioner down, and the second assistant examiner of patents, both the present salaries, the salaries contained in the Lampert bill, the salaries in the reclassification bill as passed, and the salaries in the reclassification bill as reported originally, and also the salaries as they would be under the Wood-Smoot bill, which was under consideration at the time reclassification was considered.

Now, briefly, I pick the principal examiner as an example, but in every instance we find the same increase. Now, here are the law examiners, increased by the Lampert bill from $2,750 to $4,000. The reclassification bill which you passed increased their salary, initially of $2,820, to $3,540. But here you jump them to $4,000, higher than the topmost salary provided for that grade in the reclassification bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I insert here the table to which I have referred, as follows:

Salaries in the Patent Office.

Title.	Present salary.	Lampert bill.	Reclassification bill as passed.	Reclassification bill originally.	Wood-Smoot bill.
Commissioner	$5,000	$6,000	$5,400, $6,000, $6,600 (professional service, grade 6).	$6,000, $6,600, $7,200 (professional service, grade 6).	$5,700, $7,500 (grade 17, p. 2).
First assistant	4,500	5,500	$4,860, $5,160, $5,460 (professional service, grade 5).	$5,400, $5,700, $6,000 (professional service, grade 5).	$4,500, $5,700 (grade 16, p. 3.)
Second assistant	3,500	5,000	$3,720, $4,020, $4,320, $4,620 (professional service, grade 4).	$4,140, $4,440, $4,740, $5,040 (professional service, grade 4).	Do.
Examiners in chief	3,500	5,000	do	do	Do.
Solicitor	2,750	5,000	do	do	$4,500, $5,700 (grade 16, p. 2).
Chief clerk	3,000	4,000	$2,940, $3,180, $3,420, $3,660 (clerical service, grade 6).	$3,300, $3,540, $3,780, $4,020 (clerical service, grade 6).	$3,000, $3,600 (grade 13, p. 10).
Law examiners	2,750	4,000	$2,820, $3,060, $3,300, $3,540 (professional service, grade 3).	$3,120, $3,360, $3,600, $3,840 (professional service, grade 3).	$3,600–$4,500 (grade 15, p. 5).
Principal examiners	2,700	3,900	$2,820, $3,060, $3,300, $3,540 (professional service, grade 3).	$3,120, $3,360, $3,600, $3,840 (professional service, grade 3).	$3,000–$3,600 (grade 13, p. 8).
First assistants	2,400	2,900 3,100 3,300	$2,100, $2,280, $2,460, $2,640 (professional service, grade 2).	$2,340, $2,520, $2,700, $2,880 (professional service, grade 2).	$2,460–$3,000 (grade 11, p. 19).
Second assistants	2,100	2,350 2,500 2,800

Employees begin at lowest salary in grade unless receiving more, in which case they begin at rate nearest present pay not involving decrease. Increases only to next salary rate in range, upon high efficiency rating, and only when increase is appropriated for by Congress.

Heads of departments may fix for position any salary within the limits of the grade in which the position falls. No legislative restrictions on increases within grades.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the chairman has told you that this bill is almost identical with the bill which passed in the Sixty-sixth Congress. The bill passed the House and it passed the Senate with a Senate rider, but with just three changes in compensation.

There is not a branch of industry, there are not any people who are interested in the arts and sciences in this country who are not interested in the immediate passage of this bill. To-day as chairman of the Committee on Labor I passed the call of the committee; although we have on the calendar subject to call what I considered a very important bill, and a bill which passed this House on a previous occasion, namely, the minimum wage bill. The reason why I passed the call that our committee has is that the reclassification bill practically carries the same basis as the minimum wage bill, and I do not think we ought to have too much legislation on that subject. I do think, however, so far as the Patent Office bill is concerned, that it is one of the most important bills that this House could consider during this session of Congress. Business in this country is prostrate. Here is an institution that can do something to revive it. Five years ago they were passing upon 50,000 applications for patents a year. To-day the annual average will go over 100,000 applications. And do you know what they are doing, due to an inefficient force and due to a force not sufficient to take care of it? They are 60,000 applications behind, and it takes about nine months to get at them in the Patent Office. They can not get the proper caliber of men to go into that office to train them to become examiners—not examiners in chief, but subordinate examiners. Every one of these men must have a legal training as well as a very high technical training, and when one of them passes upon an application of your constituent he is either passing out a valid patent or he is giving your constituent a certificate for a lawsuit. That is what they have been getting recently at the Patent Office on account of its inefficiency and on account of the low salaries paid there.

There are 447 positions practically that are receiving these increases. There are 100 fourth assistant examiners, there are 100 third assistant examiners, there are 100 second assistant examiners, there are 100 first assistant examiners, and there are 47 primary examiners, and here is how they start: They try to get boys or young men out of the colleges. They do not start at exorbitant salaries. They start at $1,500. There are 30 fourth assistant examiners under this bill, under which it is claimed exorbitant salaries will be paid. There are 40 fourth assistant examiners. There are 30 at $1,650 and there are 30 at $1,800.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give me five minutes more?

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman, how much more time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has expended 40 minutes. He has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. LAMPERT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. NOLAN. Look at the list of third assistant examiners. You will find that when they are promoted as third assistant examiners 30 of them will get $1,925, 30 will get $2,050, and 40 of them will get $2,200. Look at the second assistant examiners, and these are the men that you are absolutely dependent upon for valid patents. The calendars of your circuit and district courts throughout the country are congested with Patent Office cases, simply because in the last four or five years the Patent Office has broken down and industry has suffered.

Gentlemen, you can not compare the Patent Office with any other branch of the Government service with respect to the caliber of men that are needed to render efficient service, not alone to the Government, but to industry and to the arts and sciences.

Let me tell you what this bill does. Practically all of the work on a patent is done when the application is first made, and the first fee is $15. The secondary fee upon the granting of the patent under the present law is $20. This bill raises the primary fee from $15 to $20, and it will bring into the Treasury of the United States over half a million dollars, and it is the only piece of legislation in the way of wage increase that has been brought out that not alone pays for itself but that will bring revenue into the Treasury.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman think it is just and equitable that a man in an office producing revenue for the Government should get more money than a man in another kind of an office?

Mr. NOLAN. No. That is not the only reason. The reason why you are fighting this bill is not because you are raising salaries; it is because some of our leaders, our so-called leaders here, are howling about economy. That is the reason that is forcing the fight upon a measure of this kind.

This is a constructive measure, and it ought to be passed, as it has already passed this House. [Applause.] In the last Congress it passed the House and it passed the Senate, and it would have been enacted and become a law if it had not been for the Senate rider.

I would like to make an argument to-day that would be possible if I had my health with me. I want to say that if you want to stimulate business, if you want to do something of a constructive nature, you must on both sides of the House pass this Patent Office bill immediately, and when the reclassification bill goes to the Senate do not let it go through so that these salaries will be reduced; let it be understood that an amendment will be offered to it over there to protect that class of men who mean so much to industry in this country. They should be the most technical, they should be the most efficient and the best trained corps of men you have got. The Bureau of Standards is a great institution, but it does not compare with the Patent Office.

It does not mean to industry in this country what the Patent Office means to it. Why should we quibble here to-day because we are going to give to the highest-trained corps in the Government of the United States just a little bit more than the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] provided for in the reclassification bill? [Applause.]

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is useless to say over again that just a few days ago we passed through this House, after considerable discussion and debate and investigation, a reclassification bill that was supposed to reclassify the salaries of the Government employees in all the branches of the service within the District of Columbia. Now to-day, about a fortnight afterwards, we are asked to pass a special bill for a particular group, on the ground that this is a special case and that we ought to give them salaries above what we set as a fair and respectable scale of salaries for Government employees in all classes. It may be true that we were mistaken, and it may be possible that we set the scale of salaries too low. If that is true we, to be consistent, should repeal the bill we just passed. It may be true also that the salaries in the Patent Office to-day are entirely too low. I shall not argue that proposition at all. If those salaries are out of harmony with the scale of salaries set in the reclassification measure, which was the best judgment of this House, then I am most heartily in favor of making those the salaries at once if you can prove that the Patent Office is ceasing to function because of a low salary schedule.

The charge is made that they can not keep the personnel. Yet my good friend from California [Mr. NOLAN], who spoke just before me, said that the personnel in the Patent Office was the best there was anywhere in the Government service. He said that business would be revived if you would raise their salaries. The report of the committee is to the effect that one-half of the personnel now in the Patent Office is less than two years old. If you should pay them $10,000 apiece, they could not do one dollar's worth more of work than they are now doing if they are doing their duty. The congestion in that office will not be relieved by increasing salaries. The new force coming in must come under the civil service; you can not get it in the open market, and those men must be trained.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I am sorry that I can not.

Mr. NOLAN. I do not want the gentleman to misconstrue my statement. What I intended to convey was that they had to have the highest training to make them competent.

Mr. BEGG. I will quote the gentleman accurately. I dispute that. I will simply take the legal training of the Attorney General's department and I will match every man they have in the Patent Office with men in the Department of Justice. As far as basic training is concerned in the Department of Agriculture, I will match every hour's academic study and preparation in the Patent Office with like preparation in the Department of Agriculture, and you can apply that in every department of the Government.

I want to take up the question of losing men. Is it a calamity to have the Government lose some of its men because they are good? You business men, I want to ask you, would you rather have a man so good that you could not hold him, if you could have him during the period of his growth, or would you rather have a man satisfied to stay in your service and never have ambition beyond $4,000 or $5,000 a year? Why, I need only to refer you to the captains of industry. Henry Ford earned a hundred dollars a month as an engineer. Well, will any man stand up and say that because Henry Ford was worth $20,000 or $20,000,000 a year the engineering business could afford to pay him that amount of money to keep him at work as an engineer? Charles M. Schwab was a puddler in a steel mill at one time at less than $100 a month, but because Charles M. Schwab had the stamina and the ability to climb out of that do you mean to say that the puddlers ought to be paid the same salary that Charles M. Schwab can earn to-day?

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. You can not run the Government business on the basis of bidding against the competition of private industry. Nor do we want to. Now I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman has answered the question I wanted to ask.

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. BEGG. A brief one.

Mr. VESTAL. What about the conditions in the Patent Office, when other Government bureaus having patent work go into the Patent Office and take their best men out and pay them higher salaries in other Government bureaus?

Mr. BEGG. That would not happen if we raised the salary on a par with every other department, which I favor. God bless them, I never saw a man in the United States who could not be displaced. What would happen to the Patent Office if a hundred of them should die this year? Are you going to close it down? There is nothing in that argument that you have got to bid to hold the men.

Mr. VESTAL. I do not think the gentleman understands——

Mr. BEGG. I can not yield any further. I want to ask you how many men have you lost during the last year in the time of idleness? Of course, they left during the flush times of the war. Of course, they had opportunities then. Every business lost men during those days.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for an answer to his question?

Mr. BEGG. I can not yield any further.

Mr. PERKINS. For an answer to his question?

Mr. BEGG. I can not yield. I say to you men, seriously, the Republican Party is pledged to a platform of economy, to cut down expenses. Everybody the world over is cutting down expenses to-day except this Congress, and we bring in bill after bill wanting to raise salaries when the farmers are compelled to cut down or go into the bankruptcy court. And what is true of the farming community is true of the manufacturing interests of New England and of business everywhere.

I want to go back to the matter of bidding against the outside world in Government business. I maintain that it is not the business of the Government to set the pace in wages. There is a certain accretion to every man's earning power by having an opportunity to serve his Government during a certain period of time. I am worth more to myself in an earning capacity than I ever was before because of the experience I have had in the last four years. Every man who serves the Government gains something for himself. If that is not true, I do not know what is. I picked up a circular from my table this morning in which it says that Lincoln Orr is the most expert man there is on the question of fine poultry, and when I say fine poultry I mean for the profit business. He is an ex-department agricultural employee, and so advertises, and there are 25 who have left the Department of Agriculture since 1918. Are you going to come in here and say that because a few men have ambition and quit their salary job and go out and establish a business, capitalize their education and experience—are you going to say that you can pay with Government money enough to hold those men in their position? I am glad they leave, for they are usually successful business men.

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman yield for me to answer his question?

Mr. BEGG. I am sorry, but I can not yield. Now, will this bill if passed clear up the conditions in the Patent Office. We will concede that there is congestion there and that some employees have left. I will vote to give them all the help they want on a par with that of any other department—the Interior Department, the Attorney General's department, and all that. But when it comes to raising a salary and saying that it does not cost anything, that is all a hoax and camouflage. I could come in and ask for an increase of salary for employees in the Attorney General's department, multiplied by 5 on the earning power of the Attorney General's department, because last week they earned for the Government over $2,000,000. You come in here and say that because the Patent Office earns $400,000 that we ought to give it to the fellows that earn it. There is just as much sense in saying "give the Department of Justice the amount of money that it earns."

I question seriously whether the Patent Office has more influence on the prosperity, welfare, and happiness of the human family than does the Agricultural Department or some of the rest of them. I for one shall vote against making an exception of any department. I will vote for a bill, for an emergency bill giving them the same salary that we are providing for other departments, and I think it is only giving other departments a lever to come in here and say: "Well, you are paying the Patent Department employees $6,000 or $5,000 or $4,800, and you must pay us the same." They will say that "my department is just as important as the Patent Department."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining under the control of those opposed to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MANN). The gentleman from Massachusetts has 28 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Wisconsin has 15 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that there is a very great pressure on Congress for the enactment of legislation for the relief of the Patent Office. How much of it comes from men who are really acquainted with the facts and how much of it is pure propaganda, we can not say. I have more than 100 telegrams on my desk relating to this legislation, received within the last 48 hours. Ordinarily I am not very much impressed by that sort of thing, because our experience is that floods of telegrams very frequently reach us with regard to legislation relative to which those sending the telegrams have only a very general notion.

This bill is urged particularly upon the ground that the House has passed it twice. I think that very fact should give us pause in proposing to pass it again in exactly the same form. Something has been wrong with it. Gentlemen claim to believe that the Senate had no objection to the salary list, but to other features of the bill. It is my opinion, based, I think, on very excellent information, that this bill has not become a law because, first, some of those who voted for it here were not certain that its rates and its provisions as to personnel were justified, and, second, because in another body there was a very definite, clear, and strong opinion that the higher rates were too high and the personnel provided unnecessarily large.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry, I have only eight minutes. Since this measure was considered there was presented here a bill for reclassification of the Federal service. That bill was violently opposed on the floor on the ground that it increased Federal salaries. So strong was the opposition to it that it became necessary to present amendments reducing the salaries carried in the bill about 10 per cent in order to get the bill through the House. And yet gentlemen who proclaim their love and desire for economy and who fought the general classification bill vigorously find themselves, for some curious reason, supporting a bill which proposes to take one bureau of the Government out from the others and raise the salaries 50 per cent above the rates finally fixed in the classification bill.

Who can justify such action as that? On what theory can it be justified? It is claimed by some that the Patent Office differs from the other services of the Government, and that service there requires greater knowledge and experience than elsewhere. Everyone familiar with the public service knows that is not true, knows that professional and technical training and knowledge are just as essential in various bureaus of the Government scattered through the various departments as in the Patent Office.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. MONDELL. The Department of Agriculture with its scientific bureaus, the Bureau of Mines, the Geological Survey, the Topographical Survey, the legal and professional services in the Department of Justice, and through all of the departments of the Government, all require the same or greater training and experience than this office does. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman show me one place in this bill where there is an increase of 50 per cent, not over the reclassification measure, but over the present rates? Show me one case.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, there are many.

Mr. NOLAN. Show me one.

Mr. MONDELL. There are many.

Mr. NOLAN. Show one.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has had his own time. Will the gentleman be good enough to give me mine. The gentleman knows that without a copy of the bill before me, I can not in the time allotted me pick out all the cases of large increase.

Mr. NOLAN. But the gentleman spoke of a 50 per cent raise.

Mr. MONDELL. I said approximately, and that is true—approximately 50 per cent. This bill ought to be returned to the committee with instructions to bring its rates within the rates provided in the general classification bill, and no other vote can be justified here or elsewhere.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman wish me to give several examples of where the present bill increases the salary about 50 per cent?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. For instance, the two examiners of interference, from $2,700 to $5,000; the first assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs, from $2,500 to $3,000; one second assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs, from $1,500 to $2,700; one from $1,500 to $2,500.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has given enough to show that I am right; there are many more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, when this bill passed the House on March 5, 1920, the same arguments then were made that we hear to-day, that unless the bill were passed immediately the Patent Office would go to the bowwows. Yet it is still functioning. The other day the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations admitted here on the floor that neither Gen. Dawes nor the Budget Committee can effect economy and stop waste of themselves, that after all it must be done by Congress, that they can only recommend, that it is the action of the Members on the floor of the House by our votes that eventually must effect it. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MADDEN] recommends that this bill be not passed. He told us the other day that if he were to give us information that he has about the finances of this country it would astound us. He recommends that the bill be not passed. The chairman of the committee who has had reclassification in charge [Mr. LEHLBACH] recommends that the bill be not passed. The majority leader of the House [Mr. MONDELL] recommends that the bill be not passed, and yet with these recommendations are we to go ahead blindly because of the propaganda that we have received within the last month and pass the bill nevertheless? That is what we are asked to do. We are asked to pass it because of the propaganda that we have received. I have received more propaganda in behalf of this bill from interested parties within the last 30 days than I have received on any other piece of legislation except one since I have been in Congress. Yet because of that propaganda we must push this piece of legislation on the people of the country.

It is said that no objection was made by the Senate to the salary raises in the last bill. The Senate itself, if gentlemen will remember, reduced those salaries very materially when the bill went over to the other body. They took up each position and reduced the salary in some instances nearly $1,000 from the bill that is now proposed, and it was only in conference that those reductions were afterwards set aside, and the vote upon that conference afterwards when only a very few Members were present who knew what was going on with respect to the legislation.

If the action of the House with respect to the reclassification bill means anything, we ought to pay some attention to the work that this committee has done with regard to the rights of technical employees in all of the departments of the Government. There are bureaus in the Department of Commerce, there are bureaus in the Department of the Interior, there are various bureaus in the Department of Agriculture where there are men of just as great scientific training as you will find in the Patent Office. I warn gentlemen of this fact. Whenever you go to appointing so many second and third and fourth and fifth assistants for bureau chiefs, you will find that the bureau chief himself can not ever be found when you want him. He is delegating his work to somebody else. Ring him up on the telephone and you can not get him. Go down and look for him and he is not there. Ask for his first assistant and his first assistant is not there; ask for the second assistant and he is not there, and finally you will find about the third or fourth assistant in charge, doing the work. If you want the work done and done rightly, put it up to the man himself and not arrange it so he may delegate it to be done by somebody else.

I think this bill is giving entirely too many employees down there. Go down and look at them. Is there any rush? Are they in any great hurry?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], the ranking minority member of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. This is no new or ill-considered proposition. The bill in substance, the same measure as this, was carefully considered and investigated by the Patent Committee of the Sixty-sixth Congress. We held extensive hearings, which have been published, constituting several hundred printed pages, and after this thorough investigation the committee unanimously reported the bill, and in March, 1920, the bill practically unanimously passed this House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] stated that at the time it was then considered there were not many here, but the RECORD shows that he made a motion to recommit the bill with instructions to reduce the salaries in certain specific instances, and only 6 Members voted for that motion to recommit, including himself, while 272 Members voted against the motion to recommit.

Among those 272 who voted against the motion to recommit and ultimately voted for the bill was every Member who has to-day spoken against this bill, except the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. The RECORD shows that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] all voted against that motion to recommit, which merely involved a reduction of the salaries as now carried in the bill. And then subsequently the conference report was adopted by this House without a record vote, but a motion was made to recommit that involved certain reductions in salaries, and that motion to recommit was defeated by a vote of 272 to 54.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. For a brief question.

Mr. MONDELL. Will all the gentlemen on that side who then voted to reduce these salaries help to reduce them now?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am not prepared to state, but there were very few on either side who voted for the reduction then. Now, since the gentleman from Wyoming has arisen, I wish to refer to a statement he made a while ago to the effect that the fact that we had twice passed this bill through the House by overwhelming majorities was reason why we should all the more pause and consider, because the bill was not passed by the Senate. The bill, after hearings by the Senate committee, was unanimously reported by that committee. There were a number of amendments adopted in the Senate; the bill went to conference, and the conferees, both on the part of the House and the Senate, unanimously agreed upon a conference report, with the exception of Senator BRANDEGEE, who declined to sign the report solely on account of the Trade Commission section, which had been placed in the bill by a Senate amendment, he stating that he favored all the other provisions. And that bill was held up and finally failed to pass in the Senate, according to those who were opposed to it, not because of the salaries carried but because of the Trade Commission section which was then embodied in the bill. But that provision is not in the bill now under consideration. Those are the facts. It did not fail to pass on account of the salaries or any of the other provisions, but on account of that Trade Commission section.

In this connection I wish to state that there are other very important provisions in this bill besides those carrying an increase in force and salaries.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman call the attention of the House to the fact that in the last 16½ months 110 examiners out of a total of 437 have resigned?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That is true, and they are still resigning every month at the same rate that they have heretofore, although it was previously predicted that when the industrial depression and conditions of unemployment had arisen resignations would stop, but the fact is that they have continued, and we are confronted with a condition and not a theory. The gentlemen can theorize all they want to, but the conditions exist as they have already been described here, and the only relief that can be had is in the manner indicated by this bill.

Now, they talk about propaganda. That propaganda, as you call it, is not worked-up propaganda, fostered by a professional or hired lobby, but it arises from a necessity for action for the relief of the Patent Office. It comes from the inventors, and from the manufacturers, and from the patent attorneys all over this country, who are willing to pay a $5 additional filing fee, which more than covers the increase in salaries, in order to obtain expeditious and accurate service. When this bill passes, this increase in filing fees will not only cover the increase in salaries but the receipts of the Patent Office will still be something like $300,000 per annum more than the expenditures in behalf of that bureau.

In 1848 Congress considered patent examiners such important officials that their salaries were then fixed at $2,500, same as the salaries of Members of Congress and district judges at that time. There has been an increase of only 10 per cent in the salaries of the employees of the Patent Office in the last 72 years. It is suggested by some of the speakers that we ought not to take up one department at a time; that we ought to wait for this reclassification bill. They have been holding up this bill on account of the reclassification bill for an indefinite period of time, and the reclassification bill has not become a law yet, and we have no assurance that it will ever become the law. The fact that it has passed the House is no assurance that it will pass the Senate, because there are more bills that pass the House and do not pass the Senate than there are bills that pass the House and then pass the Senate.

If the reclassification bill passes, it will become applicable, and if it does not pass, this bill will, at least to some extent, give the relief that is so necessary, not only from a governmental standpoint but from the standpoint of the interests of the entire country that are so deeply interested in the passage of the bill.

Now, it was suggested, as I said, that we ought not to take up one department at a time. Well, that policy has been applied to the Patent Office in the past, because, as I said, there has been an increase of only 10 per cent since 1848. But that does not obtain in the other departments. And the result is that in the Bureau of Standards, in the Agricultural Department, and in other departments, there are numerous employees of the same general character who are now, before the passage of the reclassification bill, receiving higher salaries than even the primary examiners will receive in the Patent Office if this bill becomes a law. Those who are opposed to this bill speak only of the primary examiners who will be paid $3,900 under the provisions of this bill. There are now 21 technical employees in the Agricultural Department receiving salaries of $4,000, $4,500, and $5,000, and there are about the same number in the Bureau of Standards receiving similar salaries, yet the highest salary, with the exception of a few higher officials, paid any examiner, the primary examiner, would be $3,900. And those are only of the higher grade. There are four lower grades of patent examiners, and even under this bill their salaries range from $1,500 to $3,300. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of course, I, like many other gentlemen here, would favor almost anything that would expedite the consideration of applications for patents through the Patent Office to final decision. But there seems to be considerable misunderstanding in regard to the statements that have been made as to the amount of business which the Patent Office is receiving and turning out, and I am one of those who believe that since this bill has been before the House for the past two years there has been a disposition on the part of those in the Patent Office to not expedite the business of that office, but probably to retard its consideration, with a view of showing the necessity which some of the friends of this measure are advocating so thoroughly and fully and enthusiastically here.

Now, it is stated that they are 60,000 applications behind. That, however, is not borne out by this report. The report says they were 47,000 behind. It is also stated here that this is 60,000 applications behind the normal amount that would naturally be in the Patent Office at all times. It seems to me that some one ought to be able to straighten up that situation.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I have only five minutes. I regret I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; I must decline to yield.

That phase of the matter has not been cleared up by any member of the committee. It is also stated that more than 80,000 applications were received in 1921. The report only shows the receipt of applications to May 31, 1921. In this very short limit of time, of course, I am unable to make all the points I desire to make, but it strikes me that if a different system were employed in the Patent Office and different rules and regulations were put in operation, so that the applicant for a patent might be limited to a reasonable number of claims covering a certain application for a patent, much of the work and much of the time that is wasted down there to-day would be saved, and the work very much expedited.

Now, this question of our continually increasing salaries at this time is a very important matter, to my mind. Those of us who are interested in production in this country are faced with an economic situation in order to bring about a change in the cost of the necessaries of life in this country, and bring them to a point where you and I are in sympathy with the price charged for them. Further and great reductions must be made in wages throughout the United States; and here we are setting the example day after day of increasing salaries and putting the stamp of congressional approval upon the increase of salaries. What position are we going to be in back home with our people, when many hundreds of thousands of them are to-day out of work? Right now reductions are being made in order to meet competition in most lines of merchandise, and——

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. What has the gentleman to say about the interests of great numbers of manufacturers throughout this country who are asking that this legislation be put through in order to stimulate their activities?

Mr. SNYDER. If we wait for prosperity to return on account of the advantage to be gained by the passage of this bill, we shall have long whiskers and gray hairs before it is brought about.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is all right; but I would like the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. SNYDER. There is no doubt but that this would help in some degree, but it is not a general panacea that will bring back industrial conditions to normal. It is only one of a number of things that should be done.

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman will admit that the condition that exists in the Patent Office interferes with the development of American industries? Why is it that men who have to pay these salaries, the men who are willing to pay this bill, come forward, almost without exception, and urge us to do this very thing, one of the very things which, among other lines of business, we are sent here to represent?

Mr. SNYDER. In my judgment that is simply because of the propaganda that is put upon them by the men who make applications for patents, and not the patentees themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I realize that there is a situation in the Patent Office that needs adjustment, but it is very difficult for me to understand just how we are going to get the relief, which gentlemen say is so badly needed, by simply increasing the salaries of officials now employed in the Patent Office all the way from 25 to 50 per cent, as, some one has stated, is proposed to be done by this bill.

There is not a man on the floor of this House upon either side of the Chamber who was not elected at the last election upon a pledge of economy to the people. The President of the United States told Congress, in his message presenting the budget, that there would be a deficit of $24,000,000 for this fiscal year.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. I regret I have not the time. I am sorry.

Since that time Congress has added to that deficit at least $7,000,000 by passing a certain bill carrying $20,000,000. The President of the United States told Congress that there would be a deficit for the next fiscal year, unless economy were practiced by Congress, amounting to more than $167,000,000.

Now, gentlemen, Congress can not practice economy by passing bills creating new commitments and making new drains upon the Treasury of the United States. Why, it is said that this bill will pay for itself. I deny that assertion. It is true that under the estimate here it is stated that the increase for fees will amount to $409,000, in round figures. This increase in salaries for the Patent Office amounts, in round figures, to $447,740. It is true that by another piece of legislation, passed several years ago, $112,000 is being derived by way of an increased cost of copies of patents from 5 to 10 cents. But gentlemen who were in Congress at that time will remember that that provision was carried in a bill to take care of an increase of appropriations made at that time for the Patent Office because Congress since 1917, at the instance of the former Commissioner of Patents, Mr. Ewing, of New York, has made appropriations which were approved by him and approved by the Patent Office at that time, which carry a total increase of over $180,000, and providing 92 additional employees, and the committee was told at the time that these appropriations would enable the work of the Patent Office to be made current. Now it is sought to pass this bill in spite of the fact that the House has only recently passed a reclassification bill. I am willing to accept the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], who had more to do with the framing and preparation of the reclassification bill than any other Member of the House, and who showed great ability in bringing about its passage—I am willing to accept his statement that in this bill we are proposing to increase the salaries of the employees in the Patent Office over and above the amounts allowed in the reclassification bill, and I do not think it is fair to other departments and bureaus of this Government, merely because patent attorneys and others interested have worked up a propaganda all over this country, to single out the Patent Office to the exclusion of other offices that are demanding increases of salaries and who, if you will listen to them, can present a case equally good. Why, this bill seeks to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Patents to $6,000.

It provides for increasing the salary of the First Assistant Commissioner from $4,500 to $5,500 and to increase the salary of the Second Assistant Commissioner from $3,600 to $5,000. Why, the Bureau of Patents is under the Interior Department, and the Assistant Secretary of the Interior gets only $5,000. Yet you propose by this bill to give the Second Assistant Commissioner of Patents as much as you pay the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, who acts for the Secretary of the Interior in his absence, and who, of course we all know, has much more responsible duties.

Gentlemen, I say that under our pledges, in the situation which confronts our Treasury, this bill ought not to be passed at this time, but we ought to wait until the reclassification bill becomes a law and let the employees of the Patent Office receive the same salaries for similar services that employees in the other bureaus and departments of this Government will receive. I realize that there may be need of some kind of relief, but I do not agree with the proponents of this bill that the way to obtain it is by increasing salaries to the extent of nearly a half million dollars, nor am I in favor of discriminating between different bureaus of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes remain to each side.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the millions of men who are now out of employment, many of whom are standing in the bread lines, will be delighted to learn from the spokesman of the laboring class on this floor that if we pass this bill increasing the salaries in the Patent Office, they will soon be able to return to their jobs. That is quite a remedy, and I am surprised that the gentleman had not thought of passing this bill in order to relieve the starvation in Russia, instead of appropriating $20,000,000 out of the Treasury. As a matter of fact, it will not make a particle of difference. It may be that 110 examiners resigned during the past 16 months; but how many of those places are vacant to-day? Very few. Those who have been chosen to fill their places will require some time before they will become as skilled as those whose places they took.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I decline to yield. Under the rules and regulations of the Patent Office claims are required to be subdivided and again subdivided, and they encourage the filing of claims against applications for patents. Of course, that is a very good thing for the patent attorneys who undoubtedly inspire this propaganda that we get in our mail, and who are undoubtedly behind the dozens and scores and hundreds of telegrams that we have received. Why, there has been almost as much paid for telegrams and for printer's ink behind this measure as would pay the increased cost.

I am opposed to going beyond the scale fixed in the reclassification bill. If it is necessary that the increases in that bill be given to the Patent Office at once, let us say so and let us not make them wait until the reclassification bill shall have become effective; but why should we pick out this particular bureau of the Government simply because it has a few technical experts in it and pass a reclassification bill for them and a general reclassification bill for the rest of the Government service? Gentlemen, if you do it you need not expect to see either one of these measures travel back along the corridors of the Capitol for further consideration in the House. I submit that this bill, if not recommitted to the Committee on Patents, ought to be amended, and we ought to put into effect the same increases, the same rates, and the same classifications as we included in the general reclassification bill.

This is no time to say to the country at large, in this winter season when many who heretofore have been employed at good wages are now without work, that one of the great constructive pieces of legislation of the Republican Party, aided by the gentleman on the other side, was the passage of a bill increasing the force and increasing the salaries and compensation of the technical men in the Patent Office of the United States Government. That is not constructive legislation at this particular time, nor is it constructive to increase the rates so that possibly the increases in salaries may be taken care of by the increased receipts. We have made one job of this heretofore. Now, why should we not wait and let that law go upon the books? Notwithstanding the excess work in the Patent Office, I believe that if we increase the salaries we can reduce the personnel in that office. We were very liberal with them during the war. As I recall it, we gave them several lump-sum appropriations, not very large in amount, but we increased their personnel. When this bill first came up there was a great rush for patents, and the business prospects of the country looked as though prosperity was coming on us in a great wave; but that wave of prosperity has paused in its progress, and I say that we had better stop, and that if there is sufficient emergency to warrant our putting into effect this reclassification, and apply it immediately to the Patent Office, then let us amend this bill and bring the rates down commensurate with those in the general reclassification bill, and not give other departments of the Government cause and justification for saying that they have been treated unfairly. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMPERT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, none of those who are opposing this bill have dealt with the practical proposition of the conditions existing at the present time in the Patent Office. The number of applications for patents is constantly increasing, while the examining force for many years has been insufficient and has not increased in proportion to the business. In the last two and one-half years the business in the Patent Office has increased 40 per cent, while the personnel has been increased less than 5 per cent.

In March, 1919, the Patent Office was 15,000 patent applications in arrears. In August, 1921, there were 49,000 applications awaiting first action. To-day there are 60,000 applications awaiting first action. The increase in the business of the office has been from 62,000 applications in 1919 to approximately 100,000 in the year 1921.

By reason of the great increase in business in the office and the failure to provide a corresponding increase in the personnel, many patents have been granted which would not be granted if the examiners had time to make a thorough search. Now, what man in this House who has ever conducted a business would continue to conduct it on that basis?

The chief argument made against this bill is that it clashes with the reclassification bill. As a matter of fact this bill is needed principally as an emergency measure. So far as salaries are concerned it will be effective only until such time as the reclassification bill is passed and becomes effective. There is no certainty as to the final passage of the reclassification bill, but there is absolute necessity for relief of conditions in the Patent Office by the passage of this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I can not; I have only five minutes.

It has been urged that this bill ought to be defeated on the ground of economy. This bill will not increase the taxes one cent, since it provides that applicants who ask for patents shall pay larger fees, which will pay the increase of salary and still leave a surplus over every expense of about $300,000 per year. Furthermore, the Commissioner of Patents has stated in a letter that the Patent Office can be much better handled with 500 examiners, graded up to and including grade 4 of the Lehlbach reclassification bill, than it can with 700 or even 800 examiners graded in the first three thereof. Five hundred examiners under the first four grades will cost $1,471,250, while 700 under the first three grades will cost $1,711,514, or about $240,000 more, and that from an intensive study of conditions in the Patent Office he is convinced that 500 examiners under the first four grades will do more and better work than 700 examiners under the first three grades.

The Patent Office has always been self-supporting. It pays a profit into the Treasury of the Government of about $300,000 a year, and has a Treasury credit of upwards of $8,000,000. The argument for economy is in favor of and not against the bill.

The opposition to this measure has repeatedly charged on the floor of the House that there is a propaganda on foot in favor of the bill. The people who are asking for the passage of the bill, who are charged with conducting a propaganda, are the 60,000 applicants for patents, who are waiting for first action on their applications and who, unless this bill be passed, will wait a year longer before their applications are duly acted upon. These are the persons who are behind the propaganda. If any Member of this House had an application for a patent lying in the Patent Office unacted upon for six or seven months, do not you think he would be justified in writing a letter or sending a telegram asking that this bill go through?

This bill does two things: First, it increases the personnel of the office by 48 members; and, secondly, it raises the salaries to take effect at once and subject, as I said before, to the passage of the reclassification bill.

No one questions that the increase in personnel is imperative and that the Patent Office can not function properly without more examiners.

The only semblance of argument against the bill is that it raises salaries. In the last 70 years the salaries in the Patent Office have been increased by less than 10 per cent. The result of underpaying the force is a vast turnover of the help. In 16 months 110 examiners have resigned, or 1 out of every 4. In 32 months 231 examiners have resigned—more than one-half of the force. During the calendar year 1920, 142 clerks resigned. In one division there are 31 new employees out of a total of 61. Previous to the resignation of the 231 examiners the Patent Office was 15,000 applications in arrears. In 1921 there were 49,000 cases in arrears. On the 1st day of January last there were 60,000 in arrears. There is no other remedy, and no one has even attempted to suggest one, except to increase the salaries as provided for in this bill.

Now, gentlemen, it is not only the man making the application for a patent who is interested, it is not only the employee looking for an increase of wages so that he may remain with the Patent Office, but it is the people who are interested in the industries of America who are asking for the passage of this measure. The American patent system is one of the most potent factors in the development of prosperity in our country. If a man by thought and study produces a new method or new machine, he should have as a reward the right to control the use of that invention. He ought not to be obliged to wait years before he can get first action from the Government on his patent. He is entitled to have his invention considered within a reasonable time. The development of methods and machinery which will harness the forces of nature for the service of man is the basis of our industrial progress. The condition existing to-day in the Patent Office is seriously hampering our industrial progress. The way to bring about this progress is to promote the activity of inventors by giving relief in the Patent Office.

At the dedication of the library in Springfield before he was nominated for President, Abraham Lincoln said that there were certain incidents in the history of the human race that were of preeminent consequence. One of them was the discovery of America; one was the invention of printing; the third was the establishment of a patent system. The patent system is preeminently an American institution. The patent systems of other countries are more or less copies of the American system. We established our patent system in this country under the provision of the Constitution which says that Congress shall have power for the promotion of the useful arts to grant to an inventor a monopoly of his invention for a limited term. This was a radically new idea. The American people have taken advantage of the establishment of this system. At the present time there is a great increase in the number of applications, notwithstanding the gentleman from Massachusetts who said that the wave of prosperity has passed away and that we have gone back. Two years ago there were only 69,000 applications. Last year there were over 90,000 applications filed in the Patent Office. Gentlemen, you have got to do one of two things, either let the Patent Office fall into a decline from which it can never emerge or pass this bill as an emergency measure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 477 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 477. The salaries of the officers mentioned in the preceding section shall be as follows:

"The Commissioner of Patents, $6,000 a year.

"The First Assistant Commissioner of Patents, $5,500 a year.

"The Assistant Commissioner of Patents, $5,000 a year.

"Five examiners in chief, $5,000 a year each."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out "$6,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,400."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, that amendment intends to fix the salary of the Commissioner of Patents at the figure at which it would be fixed if the reclassification bill, which passed the House recently, were in effect to-day. I intend, as the various items are reached, to introduce similar amendments, and as far as possible make the salaries as they would be were the reclassification bill effective.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman intend in every case to propose the minimum salary?

Mr LEHLBACH. I propose to fix the salary at such figures, as far as I can judge, as would be applicable under the reclassification—what the salary would be at which the man would enter. These are the actual salaries that the employees would get if the reclassification were to go into effect to-day, because the reclassification bill provides, unless it involves a reduction of salary, that every entrant goes in at a minimum salary and has an opportunity to work through the range to the maximum salary. In each case I do not put the minimum of the grade, because in some instances the employee is receiving an excess of the minimum.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The highest salary in this grade is $6,600.

Mr. LEHLBACH. But nobody can get that unless he gets $5,400 and then $6,000.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I wanted to make sure that I had the right grade.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If your bill becomes a law, will not some of the employees start in with $6,000?

Mr LEHLBACH. Not unless they are getting $6,000 now, or in excess of $5,400 now.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. There are various officers less important than the Commissioner of Patents receiving $6,000.

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; I do not think so.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] is to decrease the salary provided for the commissioner from $6,000 to $5,400. The commissioner is in fact a judge in charge of a court which is different from any other court in the Government, as I understand it. He acts in a judicial way, and appeals are not taken from the commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior as in the case of the other bureaus.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WALSH The gentleman realizes that this amendment would even provide an increase in the salary of the commissioner and not a decrease.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I understand. I am showing that here is a position which is entirely different from that of heads of other bureaus. The appeals from the Commissioner of Patents do not go to the Secretary of the Interior. They do not even go to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, but go to the Court of Appeals. The power of this commissioner is the same as that of a supreme court judge in the District of Columbia. Six thousand dollars a year is not too high for an office which carries such responsibility, in connection with the most scientific, technical, and legal questions.

I had a conference last Friday with the Commissioner of Patents on a very interesting matter. One of the large manufacturers in Pittsburgh, a man who has been in business for years, who himself is an inventor of several nationally used devices of various kinds, came to my office. He showed me that he had perfected a process by which he can use a waste product, which has never been used before, producing many valuable products worth millions of dollars; ample capital was ready for investment as soon as patent protection was afforded to the investors.

I took this manufacturer to the Commissioner of Patents and explained the situation to him. I showed him how the money was available and how thousands of men could be put to work. The commissioner told us that in the ordinary procedure it would take 10 months before this application could be reached and a patent granted. The commissioner saw the value of the process, and upon the filing of an affidavit showing the employment of labor now idle, he made it special, and in two weeks we will get a decision upon it. I was told that in Rhode Island within the last three months $760,000 had been put into a plant, where some 800 men are employed, because the Patent Office had made a case special. Out in California there is another case which was made special, and men are being employed because they could get capital through patent protection. But in all cases not made special the invention waits 10 months because 60,000 patent applications are clogging all the machinery of the bureau.

Mr. Chairman, two years ago I stood upon this floor and urged action upon a similar measure and made the argument that the reorganization of the Patent Bureau was a matter of vital importance. I outlined at that time the situation which has since come to pass. Sixty thousand patents are held up, men are out of employment because inventors are unable to get action, and we hear sneers on this floor this afternoon for the suggestion that here is a measure which will lessen the unemployment situation in the country, which will employ capital, and start new industries. I say to you that it was a mistake two years ago, and it will be an inexcusable mistake if this Congress fails to pass this bill at this time. The additional salaries will be raised from the fees paid by willing inventors. It will be an economy—not the kind of economy which some one says is like a brier before the eye which shuts out the light of the sun, but the real economy of creative, constructive achievement. The business men who are paying the taxes, whose dreadful condition has been bemoaned so piteously this afternoon, are unanimously for the passage of this bill; the workmen of the country are for it, and it can be put into operation without an additional cent of burden on the Treasury of the United States. I am hopeful that this Congress will see a vision of the possibilities of the Patent Bureau, different from any other bureau of the Government, with its power to set men to work and to put capital to work, and will perform a real public service by encouraging the industries of the country which are bound up in the patent system. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have voted for this bill in two Congresses and I speak as a friend of the bill. I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH]. I have had some legislative experience, and I believe that the wise thing for the friends of this measure is to support the amendments, one of which has already been offered and others which will be offered if this amendment prevails, reducing the salaries proposed in the bill so as to bring them into alignment with the salaries fixed in the reclassification bill. I know the need for increased help and increased pay in the Patent Office, although I am not a patent lawyer and never had a case in the Patent Office except as I have had official occasion to know something about it. I shall vote for the bill whether the reductions in salaries are made or not, although I am inclined to think that if the reductions as suggested are not made the chances are that I or other Members of the next Congress will have an opportunity then to consider this bill again at the fourth trial. There will be many rocks and precipices in the path of this bill if it now be determined that we shall step away from the road laid out by the reclassification bill and endeavor to fix higher salaries for a particular service of the Government in spite of the reclassification salaries. If we do it in this case, of course we will be called upon to do it in other cases. Therefore, speaking as a friend of the measure, I think it is wise to increase the salaries now in the Patent Office along the lines of the salaries fixed in the reclassification bill rather than to have no increase, as I think would be the case if we declined now to accept these amendments.

Mr. Chairman, the Patent Office is a great institution. It does require technical knowledge. The men in it ought to be men who remain a long time in the Government service. No new examiner going into the Patent Office can render the same service to the Government which one who has been there a long time can render. The Patent Office is a Government school. They teach the men there how to perform their duties, and inevitably there always will be many who leave the Patent Office, because, so far as salary is concerned, the Government can not compete with great private institutions, who insist upon a particular man at whatever salary he requires in order to obtain him. This bill is opposed, and I undertsand from the speeches that have been made that an effort will be made to recommit the bill. If the bill is recommitted it is practically dead. This bill comes up on a Calendar Wednesday call; the Committee on Patents is reached on that call. I do not know when it will be reached again. If the bill should be recommitted probably it will not be reached in time to do any good, as far as the bill is concerned, at this session. I shall not vote for a recommitment, in any event, so far as I am concerned. I believe that the Government managing this great business institution ought to be willing to pay reasonable salaries, ought to provide sufficient personnel to keep the business in that bureau up to date, or practically up to date. The men who pay for the service ought to receive service. They pay the bill. The money paid the Patent Office does not come out of the general taxes of the people at all.

It comes out of funds contributed by the men who apply to that office for service, and in the last House we increased the filing fee as carried in this bill from $15 to $20, and the increase will pay all the additional expense of the Government in maintaining the office with sufficient personnel and with sufficient salaries.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a minute.

The Government that takes money from a man to perform a certain function of the Government ought to apply sufficient money to render the service. That is all the Patent Office asks for.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Speaking also as a friend of the bill, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he believes that if this amendment and the other amendments to be offered by the gentleman from New Jersey are adopted, conditions will be substantially improved in the Patent Office?

Mr. MANN. I certainly believe they will not only be substantially improved but sufficiently improved to make the Patent Office a business institution down to date. No one in the Government receives as much pay as he would like to get, most of them do not receive as much as they think they ought to have. These other gentlemen will remain in their places at the existing salaries. But if we fix the salary of the commissioner, for instance, at $5,400 and the reclassification bill takes effect, his salary will be automatically increased, if the same man remains as commissioner, until it becomes higher than is provided in this bill, and the inducement by the proposed increases will be sufficient to keep an ordinary man on the job.

I want to increase the efficiency of the Patent Office. I think the wise thing to do is to make these reductions and pass the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I am speaking to the gentleman who has just spoken, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as well as the rest who are friends of the bill, to point out that the Patent Office is not a mere Government institution employing clerks. These men, the Commissioner of Patents and the principal examiners, are judges. They can say whether a man shall have a patent or no. On their judgment the millions and millions of dollars which come from the use of patents depend. There must not only be enough of them, but they must be men of judicial character, who can not be tempted by money, who will decide great questions that come before them according to law and according to a very complicated and difficult examination of facts in the office.

This not only, in my judgment, distinguishes them from the rest of the employees of the Government, and that was the theory when the present Patent Office system was established, at a time when Government salaries were way down below $1,000. So they gave the examiners in the Patent Office by the act of May 27, 1848, $2,500, which was the salary of most of the judges of the United States at that time, the salary that was paid to a Member of the House, and the salary that was paid to a Member of the Senate. This then high salary was fixed not simply because of the amount of work that was done, but because of the character of work and responsibility that was given to and imposed upon the Patent Office examiner and commissioner as a judge acting for the industries of this country, as well as for the Government, and to see that right should be done. The United States can not get that character of man for a small salary. He is no clerk. He is an examiner or he is a commissioner, and he is the examiner or commissioner that has to determine matters that involve millions of dollars, and where he makes a refusal it will be final.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

I want to say to the friends of the bill, and I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who just took his seat, that when I came here in 1913 a new Patent Commissioner was appointed, a very high-class lawyer, and probably one of the best patent attorneys in America, Mr. Ewing. During the Democratic administration three Patent Commissioners resigned, largely on account of the salary. Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] carries it will increase the present salary of the Patent Commissioner from $5,000 to $5,400.

Let me give you a little bit of the history of this bill. The Patent Committee of the House did not draft it. This bill was presented to Congress as one of three. One of the bills was for the purpose of reclassifying and raising the salaries of the Patent Office employees; another was to make the Patent Office an independent institution and to carry a Cabinet officer; and the third dealt with general legislation. The bill providing for salaries for the Patent Office employees carried a salary for the commissioner of $7,500 a year. The Committee on Patents of the House in the Sixty-sixth Congress sat during the month of July, 1918, for approximately the entire month, hearing from those who were in favor of increasing the personnel and pay of the Patent Office, and were in favor of these bills. Sprague, the great electrical inventor; Sperry, the inventor of the gyroscopic compass; and some others of the greatest inventors of America and representatives of the National Research Council all drafted a measure, and they came before our committee and argued tooth and nail for the stipulated sums that they put in, starting with $7,500 for the commissioner.

We sat for a month. You can find in the committee room of the Committee on Patents of the House testimony, covering three hundred and some-odd pages, taken in connection with this bill. And after we took that testimony we went over it item by item, and we fixed what we thought were decent salaries for not only the Commissioner of Patents but every employee of the Patent Office. Now, the chairman of the Committee on Reclassification—I do not know whether it is pride of authorship or not—is desirous of making the Patent Office fit his ideas of reclassification. We sat for months——

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. In a moment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. They are not my ideas. The House passed the bill.

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; but the gentleman is trying to incorporate it in this bill, and his name is on the reclassification bill. We gave weeks and months of study to what we thought ought to be done for the Patent Office, and we decided on the rates that are in this bill; and you friends of the Patent Office, you men who want to see industry in this country thrive, you men who want to see the inventors of this country get a square deal, should start in right now and vote down these amendments and vote for the committee bill. That is the only way you can put a firm foundation under the Patent Office.

Let me call your attention to what has happened. During the first five months of this year they had 37,740 applications for patents and six thousand and some odd hundred applications for trade-marks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. A total for the first five months, gentlemen, of 44,690 applications. Three years ago, after the war or during the war, they had only 57,100 applications all told. If they keep up a corresponding rate for this entire 12 months you will have over 100,000 applications in the Patent Office, during a period of depression, during 1921, not during times of great prosperity, but during a period of depression; and you are going to get for every one of those applications, if you pass this bill, $5 additional, which will mean over half a million dollars each year.

Gentlemen, the rates in this bill are not too high, notwithstanding your general classification measure. There is no general measure that passes this House that is altogether perfect. There is no committee of the House that can consider itself perfect. But the Committee on Patents of this House is a better judge of what ought to be done for the Patent Office than is the Reclassification Committee, which gave only a general thought to the idea of salary classifications in the Government service.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. On that same argument the gentleman would contend that the Committee on Agriculture and committees interested in all the other departments ought to come in and make special recommendations in behalf of their departments.

Mr. NOLAN. If they told us that the Department of Agriculture or other great interests in this country are suffering because of a certain condition existing down here in the Department of Agriculture which means the breaking down of that department I would say yes.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; I will.

Mr. BEGG. Can the gentleman cite a single——

Mr. NOLAN. And, further, I will take their testimony and I will take their judgment before I will take the judgment of the Reclassification Committee.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman cite a single industry in the United States that is closed down or even handicapped because of any breakdown in the Patent Office?

Mr. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman that lately I have not been physically able to keep up with the Patent Office, but I will say this to the gentleman: The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] said something about several institutions where because their applications have been made special they have started in and are doing business. Only the other day, after I got out of bed, I took up with the Commissioner of Patents the matter of making special an application for a patent on an invention of a man in California, and they told me that if I could get that man to show by affidavit that he could improve conditions and set men to work they would make his application special but that if he could not do it they could not do anything within 10 months.

Mr. PERKINS. The National Metallurgical Co., of New Jersey, was operating under a blast system patented by this Government, and had invested a hundred million dollars, and——

Mr. NOLAN. Gentlemen, you have got to make your choice on this bill now. You have got to beat this amendment, and you have got to beat the rest of the amendments. You have a fair bill. The Committee on Patents has given a great deal of time to the preparation of this bill. It is a bill that will pay for itself. The taxpayers of this country will not have a dollar taken away from them, but the taxpayers of this country, if this measure goes through, will see several hundred thousand dollars of additional money paid into the Treasury of the United States. Vote down this amendment and vote down the other amendment and adopt this bill as it was reported by this committee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no particular interest in the personal differences that gentlemen may have arising out of pride of opinion with regard to this or any other legislation, but I do feel that the House is confronted with a very important question, and that as we shall vote on it we shall show whether in voting in detail under pressure on behalf of a certain individual or service we vote differently than we do when voting our best judgment with regard to the public service generally.

If the Commissioner of Patents should have a salary of $6,000, the Commissioner of the General Land Office should have a salary equally as high or higher, because, with all due deference to the Patent Office, the duties and responsibilities of the Commissioner of the General Land Office are much greater and more important and involve very much more of vital interest to the American people.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MONDELL. Just briefly.

Mr. NOLAN. Does the gentleman know that the only appeal from the decisions of the Commissioner of Patents is to the courts, but that there is an appeal from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that that has anything to do with it.

Mr. NOLAN. I think it has.

Mr. MONDELL. A great majority of the men who are defending the interests of the Government in the matter of patents in the Department of Justice receive salaries ranging from $2,500 to $3,500. It is necessary that they shall be learned in the law and have experience in patent legislation. If these salaries in the Patent Office shall be advanced, as proposed, we must equally advance salaries in the Attorney General's office and many other Government offices.

Something has been said about the action taken upon and the attitude of gentlemen touching this legislation in the past. Although I do not fully recall, I probably voted for a similar bill twice. The bill was first brought here under very great pressure, at a time when we were expecting a very great expansion of business at the close of the war. There was a most active and aggressive propaganda behind it, a propaganda more active than has been behind any similar bill in my recollection. That pressure affected and influenced the committee, affected and influenced the Committee on Rules, and a rule was brought out for consideration of the bill. It was my duty at that time to do all that I could to aid the Committee on Rules in having the bill presented and considered. I then examined the bill carefully. I then believed that the higher salaries were too high. I believed that the increase in the personnel was rather liberal. But conditions were such that it was insisted that it was necessary to have immediate action or the Bureau of Patents would cease to function. That was two years ago. The Government still goes on, business is still proceeding in the customary way. At that time we had fixed no yardstick of Government service. It might have been said, and it was said, in support of the legislation at that time when salaries and wages were very high all over the country, that this was a salary and wage rate we would be justified in applying to the public service generally. We had adopted no yardstick with which to measure or form a judgment as to the general level of governmental salaries. Since then we have adopted a yardstick in the reclassification by an overwhelming vote in the House, and we shortened it after the bill came here on the insistent demand of gentlemen on both sides.

Now, the ink is scarcely dry on that general measure when we are asked to lift one bureau above, beyond, and out of all harmony with the general plan and purpose of classification and establish a rule with regard to that bureau that does not apply to any other governmental service.

If gentlemen want to do that under pressure of the patent attorneys and those who feel that this legislation must be had, let us abandon all thought of a logical, reasonable, businesslike reclassification of the Government service. If we are to do this, we shall be expected to dip into the Government service here and there as pressure comes, as demand is made, as telegrams and letters are sent, and raise or lower or shift, not in accordance with our judgment but in view of the pressure that is brought upon us.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. Now, I am a friend of the Patent Office. I have long believed that something ought to be done for the Patent Office. I have pleaded with men who claimed they wanted to do something for the Patent Office to let us do something practical instead of insisting on forcing through the House legislation that failed to become a law. If you crowd this through out of all harmony with the balance of the Government service, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the probability of the bill becoming a law under these circumstances is faint and uncertain. If we pass a reasonable bill in harmony with the Government service generally and plans we have proposed for it, there is no reason why it should not become a law promptly. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. I want to ask the gentleman if there is any question of the fact stated here on one side that the arrearages of business in the Patent Office have risen from 15,000 to 66,000 cases?

Mr. MONDELL. I think there is; I think there is some question about the accuracy of the figures that have been stated. At any rate, some of the figures stated are not in harmony with the report, but it may be that the report is wrong and the gentleman right. But let me call attention to the fact that it is not an unusual thing for the Government service to get behind in its business.

The General Land Office of the Department of the Interior has been several months behind now in passing upon applications for permits to prospect on the public domain. If the General Land Office had pursued the same policy that this office has, there would have been the same pressure on Members to increase the force and the salaries there that there is here. If every time anyone went to the Land Office and asked to have their matters attended to they were told that attention to their business depended on the action of Congress in increasing salaries and personnel, we would have had the same pressure on Congress in regard to that bureau that we have in regard to this. But that bureau has taken a different view of its obligations to the Government and the administration. They evidently have not believed that it was proper to burden everyone who approached their doors, or had anything to do with their activities, with complaints with regard to the state of business in the office.

The gentleman from New York, who is familiar with these matters, has placed his finger squarely on one of the great difficulties, one of the reasons, perhaps the principal reason, for the present condition in the Patent Office. The Patent Office, I understand, has encouraged the practice, which is increasing, of greatly multiplying claims under applications for patent. If the policy goes on and is constantly encouraged, you may equip the Patent Office with double the present personnel and the business will still be delayed and congested.

Mr. COCKRAN. I want to ask the gentleman if it is equally conceded that there have been a great number of resignations from the Patent Office service?

Mr. MONDELL. During the war and following the war——

Mr. COCKRAN. I am speaking of the last 16 months.

Mr. MONDELL. In the last 16 months, according to the report. I do not know just when the report was made. That was some time ago. It would not be 16 months from to-day, but it would be 16 months from the date of the report. There are half a dozen bureaus of the Government with regard to which the same statement can be made. The personnel of the Geological Survey was largely depleted during and immediately after the war because of the demand for those men in the mining regions and particularly in the regions where oil was being developed. Men drawing $2,500 a year were offered and given $5,000, $10,000, $15,000, and $25,000 in private business. And furthermore that will continue in all these public services so long as time runs whenever business is good.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCKRAN. I want to ask this: It is stated that there have been a great number of resignations and that they have been chiefly on account of the low salaries paid; is it a fact that under this bill the increase, whatever it may be, will be supplied by additional fees that will be paid by the persons who are asking for the passage of this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that of all the arguments that have been advanced in support of this increase of compensation that is entitled to the least consideration.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am not making an argument. I am asking if it is a fact.

Mr. MONDELL. Assuming that it were true, at one time I sat at a desk in what is known as the Patent Office Building, just across the corridor from the office of the Commissioner of Patents. Would I have been happy or comfortable, or would those who were serving in the Land Office about me have been happy or comfortable had our salaries been 10, 20, or 30 per cent below those of employees of the Patent Office? Would we have been satisfied and content with the explanation that, while it was assumed that the taxpayers generally were paying our salaries, it was assumed that some individual taxpayer was paying the salaries across the corridor, and therefore those salaries ought to be higher.

Here is another matter which has not been given proper consideration. It is known to all men who have had to do with the Government service, and with this service, that, as a matter of fact, since the Patent Office was established—and that is true of certain other scientific and technical bureaus of the Government—men have sought employment in those departments and bureaus for the purpose of securing the experience essential to enable them successfully to conduct certain classes of private business. There is no other school on earth, except the Bureau of Patents, where a man can receive the education, the training, and the information which it is necessary and essential to any firm of patent attorneys, and men by the score enter this service with the expectation of leaving it so soon as their experience in the service brings them a bid from private employers. That is true not only of this service but it is true of several technical services under the Government and always will be. If we should double the salaries we would not, in times of extraordinary commercial and industrial activity and expansion, prevent the withdrawal from these bureaus and departments of the best and the brightest and the most capable of the employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I came into the House to-day prepared to vote for this bill, and to vote for it as it was drawn. I have listened to all the debate with an open mind, desirous simply to arrive at a correct conclusion.

Now, let us see how far we have gotten. Nobody in the House is opposing the relief of the Patent Office. We are simply in a dispute as to how that can be best effected. On the one hand, here is the veteran legislator from Illinois, who says that if we will accept a bill in accord with the reclassification affecting all of the departments of Government he believes that the bill will speedily be enacted into law and will afford the relief which we seek.

On the other hand, here is the bill itself, higher than that provided by the reclassification. Now, one of the most troublesome things to legislators is the question of the passage of bills fixing the compensation of Government employees.

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; not for the present. I prefer not to. It is one of the difficulties that is with us always, and we have been endeavoring by a general bill to settle that question and to settle it for some considerable time. We have agreed upon that bill. It passed overwhelmingly. The only contest in this House upon that bill was as to whether it was not too high. That is what we met, and it was only after we had overcome it by reducing the amounts in the bill that it passed the House. We are all of us ready to grant relief to the Patent Office. Every man of us believes in it and in the enormous benefits which will result to the business of the country.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; not at present. Not one man of us disputes the benefits which would come from relieving the Patent Office. We all realize that in this country, where we produce more inventions and where we advance productiveness by the genius of our people in inventions more than anywhere else in the world, we all realize that the machinery of the Patent Office for the granting of patents must be efficient, and we must give them help enough so that they can do their work. But here come the men who say, "We have passed this general reclassification bill. It is soon to become a law. We have passed it at as high a rate as the condition of the country will warrant in a time of depression. We are in hard times, we are in times of unemployment, we are in times when men are walking the streets, and we say that in such times as that we have passed this bill at as high a rate as we can. Let us try this bill and see if putting these employees on a higher basis, giving them an increase above the present rate, but granting it only in accord with this general rule, will answer the purpose."

We can do this speedily. The other thing may not be done at all, and at best it will only be done after a long and a hard fight. We all want to keep the general principle of the reclassification bill, if we can. Let us make the effort along the lines of granting the reclassification increase, keeping to that rule, and if that fails, if we do not get enough technical help in the Patent Office at that rate, I am ready, and every man here will be ready, to grant a still further increase; but let us make this trial first and see if it will not answer the purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this Patent Office discussion has become more or less academic, whereas, as a matter of real fact, it is a cold-blooded, away-down, fundamental business proposition. We have heard about our division of thought and mind and votes as affecting different industries of the country—and I have no objection to it—but here is a time when the manufacturers all over this land, who employ millions of people who buy the foodstuffs of the people who raise them, are asking us to give them a chance to obtain their fair rights in business, so that they may furnish the money for their employed people to buy the food and land products of the other half. Ten months is not much time, as an academic proposition, for the issuance of a patent, but if the 10 months must round out into 12 and the 12 into 15 and the 15 to 18, and so on, we will become more and more behind.

I have heard no one in the discussion of this matter refer to the activities of foreign countries in respect of keeping up their patent-office divisions. Those who have had experience know mighty well that the patent-office regulations of Germany, of France, and of Great Britain are tagging right on to us, like a terrier after your flapping trousers, every day in the year, keeping at us, and it takes a force of lawyers now to keep any American manufacturer straight, in order to protect a patent in any one of those countries, and yet we are willing to sit here and become academic and perhaps consider for the sake of a few dollars, whether more or less I do not know, the possibility of staving off the operations of our Patent Office. We are to-day in the process of reconstructing many industries. We are about to meet a competition from the manufacturing world keener than ever before. We have to meet the finest minds of the world in countries where they produce at a time when those minds are actuated by the keenest endeavor to obtain and retain trade.

Mr. BEGG rose.

Mr. WINSLOW. I shall come to the gentleman later, if he will make an effort to have my time extended.

Mr. BEGG. I shall do it if I can.

Mr. WINSLOW. I thank the gentleman. Meanwhile for myself: The inventors of other countries in the world will be stimulated by all the incentives which come to us, and more and yet beyond, by virtue of being in a worse financial condition than we are. We will have contrivances and mechanical inventions in the next 10 or 20 years that will outstrip anything that the world has ever known. People right now in this country, the operatives, the inventors, the men who work at the lathe and the bench, have had nothing to do for months, and in my own neighborhood, which is typical of the best of them from a mechanical and manufacturing and producing point of view, there are scores and hundreds and thousands of men who are sitting around their houses scheming up something in the way of mechanical devices which will help along the work in the factories of which they are a part. The man who invents as a rule is not the proprietor of a vast business. He is apt to be the practical man, the man who works at a machine. He gets an idea and he carries it to the boss of the concern or the proper official and says, "Here, I have this idea." "Very well." "Is it of use to you? What will you give me for it?" And so forth. These ideas are generally picked up by the heads of concerns and handed over to engineers to work out, and eventually a patent is taken as being conceived in its invention by John Smith, and assigned to corporation X Y Z on some arrangement between them. The corporation then undertakes to put it through. They have their engineers to prepare the specifications and the plans. They have their attorney draw up the legal specifications and they go to the Patent Office and request a patent.

That opens the field in another direction. In the last 25 years the manufacturing and producing concerns as soon as they arrive at a point of income enough to warrant it have put on engineers, draftsmen, chemists, physicists, laboratory men for all purposes, and many now, not all of them the biggest in the country, but many of moderate size, have a resident patent attorney to keep pace with everything that is going on and look out for their business of such character. It is true that the Patent Office in Washington is a fitting school for these young men. They go out of the law school perhaps and go immediately into the Patent Office, or they may go through some law office and decide to become patent lawyers, or they meanwhile may go to a technical school, but ultimately many of them wind up in the Patent Office.

They take positions in the low grades and they get enough money to skin along on maybe, and they get by for two or three years. They do not stay there, however, long enough to fill the offices at the top and to make of themselves good men who become resident and so be of real importance to the Government. The result is that they go into private practice in one way or another. They can not afford to and they will not stay in the Patent Office. We want those men here. There is a great deal of difference on the one hand between the opinion of a man who goes superficially over a patent and on account of whose decision a patent is issued, only to be contested in the courts and later thrown out, and the findings of a man who, on the other hand, has had long experience in one of the departments of the Patent Office, whose opinion and decision are worth something. You can not upbuild that department too much. The manufacturers of this country, the fabricating element, have come before you now and have asked that this be done. They say they are willing to pay for it. They do not regulate the amount they shall pay to any fee that the Government has set, but they offer to pay any fee in order to get the service. It is all well enough for an academic debater to stand here and talk about propaganda and the influence of telegrams and letters, and all that sort of thing, but great heavens, how in the world is a business man to get his ideas before Congress if he can neither speak, write, nor telegraph? [Laughter and applause.] They have to find some way of conveying individual and public thought. I remember a time when I was besieged to vote for woman suffrage, when telegrams and letters and telephones and skirts were in evidence all of the time. I did not hear anything from the gentleman from Wyoming then about propaganda stunts. He was the leader of the procession. [Laughter.] But we all have to take it for one reason or another.

I will tell you, my friends, that the practical, hard-headed idea is that the Patent Office is a thing apart. It may well be regarded as the exception which proves the rule. And why should we not pay any select department more than we pay another which is ordinary and can easily be filled up, if the laborer in the former case is worthy of his hire? [Applause.] We want to have the men. I do not believe we would have any difficulty in this House—I hope not—in raising the pay of the Department of Agriculture in certain lines of endeavor if all the great farmers of this country—North, South, East, and West—would come to us with propaganda, or otherwise, and say, "We believe you should attract better men there, and they can not work for the present salaries. Raise their pay." [Applause.]

I will vote for the salary of any set of men whose merit can be demonstrated. It is not enough to say in an easy-come easy-go sort of a way that some of the rest of them will feel bad. Of course they will feel bad, but if they are not qualified by virtue of experience or training to proceed in one of the lines of human endeavor which requires a special talent and ought to bring in a special reward, they are to be pitied, but the men who have that talent should not be blamed or penalized. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio will get me a little more time, I will try to answer his questions.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEGG. I want to ask the gentleman a question seriously. More personnel and more help will turn out more work——

Mr. WINSLOW. Far from it. That is the curse of the departments here now. We have too much personnel, too much help, too little efficiency, and not enough courage to "kick the rascals out" and put good, well-paid men in their places. [Applause.]

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman has no quarrel with me on that score, and if he can get the executive department to break the civil service, I am with him.

Mr. WINSLOW. We can begin to puncture situations right here.

Mr. BEGG. Why does not the gentleman introduce such a bill, then. He will find some support for it. I want to ask the gentleman seriously—and I know he is a good kidder [laughter]—is the personnel that is now in the department doing all it can?

Mr. WINSLOW. I never heard to the contrary until I came in here this afternoon.

Mr. BEGG. I did not hear that. Now, then, will merely increasing the salaries of the men that are in there now above the salaries of everybody else in the Government produce more work?

Mr. WINSLOW. No.

Mr. BEGG. That is all you propose to do. That is everything the gentleman is advocating.

Mr. UPSHAW. If the gentleman will allow, I would like to answer the gentleman from Ohio, that increasing the salary will prevent the further resignation of magnificent men, expert men, without whom the Patent Office can not rightly function.

Mr. WINSLOW. Amen! [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 1, line 8, after the word "patents," strike out "$5,500" and insert "$4,800."

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, that the figures $5,500 be stricken out, and the figures "$5,000" inserted. That keeps it within the classification bill. That is a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. VESTAL for the amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBAH: Page 1, line 8, strike out "$5,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000."

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion for this reason, that this is the only salary mentioned in the bill H. R. 7077 that is above the reclassification bill. All the other salaries mentioned in the bill H. R. 7077 come within the provision of the reclassification bill that was passed. I only make this motion so as to bring this within the reclassification.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Then the bill thus amended would not in anywise conflict——

Mr. VESTAL. Would not conflict with the reclassification bill in any particular.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take up any further time of the committee, but I can not let the last statement go unchallenged, because it is made in misapprehension of the provisions of the reclassification act. The reclassification act provides for each grade and range of salary and provides that, unless an employee at the present time is receiving a salary in excess of the minimum salary fixed within that range of salaries, he is to have his salary fixed at the lower rate in the range, and progress from there by merit, and by recommendation based on ascertainment of merit, to the higher ranges.

To state that under the terms of the reclassification bill these salaries contained in the Lampert bill for the various positions are in consonance with the terms of the reclassification bill is not to state the facts, because in this instance the salary would be $4,860, and the lines of promotion would be to $5,160 and $5,460. There is no salary at all in the reclassification bill for a position known as that of the First Assistant Patent Commissioner at $5,000. The salary is not what it would be under the reclassification bill if it were passed.

I have here, Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to digress from the subject matter of this amendment, amendments prepared for substantially the greater portion of these positions, which would reduce the figures in the present bill to the figures that would be received by the incumbents of these positions under a classification immediately to be effective. I desire that these comparisons be inserted in the RECORD, as this bill is under consideration; but I do not wish to take up the time of the committee by offering them seriatim. I therefore ask unanimous consent that I may submit this series of amendments as amendments that I would have offered had I not deemed it useless to do so. Under an extension of remarks I offer to have printed these amendments which I refrain from offering now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the way indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman is going to insert in the RECORD amendments to the bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. For the information of the House; amendments which, if there was favorable opportunity for action, would actually be offered. But in view of the situation it is useless to waste the time of the committee and that of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] by pursuing that course. The amendments ought to be before the House for its information, just as amendments are sometimes inserted in the RECORD for information at a time when they are not actually offered. I ask unanimous consent to do that here. The amendments are very instructive, and they are immediately pertinent and germane to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. I appreciate the gentleman's solicitude about my time being valuable, but——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the amendments are offered only to be put in the RECORD to show what the gentleman from New Jersey would have offered if he had opportunity. If he gets leave to extend his remarks he should state what it ought to be. Of course, that is explanatory and shows what the gentleman would propose. Merely printing the amendments would not mean anything, because they refer to amounts in the bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my further request, and having spoken so far on the pending amendment, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the following amendments I would have offered were there a chance of their adoption. In each instance the salary proposed in lieu of the amount carried in the bill is the pay the incumbent would receive were the reclassification placed in effect to-day:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "Patents," strike out "$5,000" and insert "$4,860."

Page 2, line 7, after the word "matters," strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,720."

Page 2, line 1, after the word "chief," strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,720."

Page 2, line 7, after the word "solicitor," strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,720."

Page 2, line 7, after the word "at," strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,720."

Page 2, line 8, after the word "classification," strike out "$4,200" and insert "$3,720."

Page 2, line 9, after the word "at," strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,720."

Page 2, line 10, after the word "designs," strike out "$3,900" and insert "$2,820."

Page 2, line 11, after the word "designs," strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,460."

Page 2, line 12, strike out "$2,700"; after the word "at," strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,280."

Page 2, line 17, after the word "at," strike out "$3,900" and insert "$2,820."

Page 2, lines 18 and 19, after the word "at," strike out "$3,300, $3,100, and $2,900" and insert "$2,640."

Page 2, line 20, strike out "$2,800, $2,500, $2,350" and insert "$2,460."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk began the reading of section 2 of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. WINGO. The Clerk was reading at the time the gentleman from Wisconsin interjected his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is made that the Clerk was reading.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was merely standing on my feet and submitting an amendment to follow other amendments to the section.

Mr. WINGO. I also was standing on my feet. The Clerk can not stop reading because the very handsome gentleman from Wisconsin was standing on his feet.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course; nor should the Clerk stop reading because the gentleman from Arkansas was standing on his feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 1, insert a new section, to read as follows:

"That the provisions of section 6 of the act of March 3, 1921, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, shall not apply to any of the employees whose compensation is fixed by this act."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, section 6 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act provides the bonus of $240 to all of the employees in the Government service. This bill is predicated upon the idea that the salaries carried will be the maximum salaries, regardless of the bonus. If the bill becomes a law before the expiration of the present fiscal year, it should not include the bonus for the remainder of the fiscal year. Should provision be made for a bonus for the next fiscal year, an exception may be made so as to exclude the employees provided in this act. But suppose this bill becomes a law—and we have good reason to expect that it will become a law within a month or two—and we are fixing the maximum salaries of all these clerks, based upon the idea that the bonus is included; certainly the bonus ought not to be added to the salaries provided for in this act. The Lehlbach bill was predicated upon the idea of including the bonus in the salaries as carried. It was admitted on the floor that the present bonus of $240 was included in those salaries. If the salaries carried in that bill are predicated on that idea—and I do not think it is questioned—then, certainly, $240 ought not to be added to the increased salaries as here provided.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The bonus applies only to salaries up to $2,500, and if it were added to a salary of $2,500 it would raise that salary up to $2,740. It does not touch it at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill also increases the messenger service at $1,080. It increases the salaries of typists, who are receiving only $780, up to $1,100. This amendment is predicated on the idea of taking care of that feature. If the bill becomes a law, we do not wish to add $240 when we have already included that in the framing of the bill. That is the purpose of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. NOLAN. Division, Mr. Chairman,

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 26.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That so much of section 440 of the Revised Statutes as follows the words "in the Patent Office" and refers to said office only be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Chief clerk, who shall be skilled in patent matters, $4,000; 1 solicitor, $5,000; 5 law examiners, at $4,000 each; examiner of classification, $4,200; 2 examiners of interference, at $5,000 each; examiner of trade-marks and designs, $3,900; first assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs, $3,000; 1 second assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs, at $2,700, and 1 at $2,500; 1 third assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs, at $2,200, and 1 at $2,050; 6 fourth assistant examiners of trade-marks and designs—2 at $1,800 each, 2 at $1,650 each, and 2 at $1,500 each; examiners—48 principals, at $3,900 each; 100 first assistants—40 at $3,300 each, 30 at $3,100 each, and 30 at $2,900 each; 100 second assistants—40 at $2,800 each, 30 at $2,500 each, and 30 at $2,350 each; 100 third assistants—40 at $2,200 each,

30 at $2,050 each, and 30 at $1,925 each; 100 fourth assistants—40 at $1,800 each, 30 at $1,650 each, and 30 at $1,500 each; financial clerk, who shall give bond in such amount as the Commissioner of Patents may determine, $2,500; librarian, $2,700; 8 chiefs of nonexamining divisions, at $2,500 each; 8 assistant chiefs of nonexamining divisions, at $2,100 each; private secretary, to be selected and appointed by the commissioner, $2,000; translator of languages, $2,400; assistant translator of languages, $2,000; clerks—22 of class 4, at $1,800 each; 33 of class 3, at $1,600 each; 100 of class 2, at $1,400 each; 125 of class 1, at $1,200 each; 100, at $1,100 each; skilled draftsmen, 1 at $1,800 and 3 at $1,600 each; 3 draftsmen, at $1,400 each; 40 copyists, at $1,100 each; 36 messengers, at $1,080 each; 13 laborers, at $1,080 each; 47 examiners' aids and 39 copy pullers, who shall be selected without regard to apportionment, $720 each.

"For special and temporary services of typewriters certified by the Civil Service Commission, who may be employed in such numbers, at $3 per diem, as may, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Patents, be necessary to keep current the work of furnishing manuscript copies of records, $7,500.

"For purchase of law, professional, and other reference books and publications and scientific books, and expense of transporting publications of patents issued by the Patent Office to foreign Governments, $10,000.

"For investigating the question of public use or sale of inventions for two years or more prior to filing applications for patents, and such other questions arising in connection with applications for patents as may be deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Patents, and expense attending defense of suits instituted against the Commissioner of Patents $2,500.

"For the share of the United States in the expense of conducting the International Bureau at Berne, Switzerland, $750."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of the action taken by the committee, which was so emphatic upon the matter of salary increases, I only wish to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that in 1917 the net increase in the personnel of the Patent Office was 13 and the net increase in the appropriation was $52,650.

In 1919 the net increase in personnel was 26, with a net increase of appropriation of $46,500.

In 1920 the net increase in the personnel was 17 and the net increase in the appropriation was $16,400.

In 1921 the net increase in personnel was 36 and the net increase in appropriation was $67,300.

For 1918 we gave them a lump sum of $10,000 to keep the work current and for furnishing copies. In 1919 we gave them $5,000 for the same purpose, and apparently by 1920 their work had become current because that appropriation was dropped. For the year 1922 the total of appropriations for the Patent Office was $2,329,550, of which $1,500,200 was for salaries.

Now, of course, the action taken by the committee in adopting the increases in the bill will probably make unnecessary any increases in appropriations for the Patent Office——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he stated the total number of employees?

Mr. WALSH. The total number of additional employees provided for since 1917 is 92 and the total increase in appropriations is $182,850.

I was about to say that the action of the House upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] will probably make unnecessary any increases in appropriations, because we will probably not have this bill back here.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, in opposition to the pro forma amendment I wish to say that I think in this connection it is fair to have stated in the RECORD that this very bill proposes to increase the revenues of the Patent Office perhaps $500,000. The report estimates an increase of $409,235, based upon the applications of the first five months in 1921. Also a recent increase in the price of copies furnished by the Patent Office during the last year provided an additional income of $112,000.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. NOLAN. Would it not be well to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the gentleman from Massachusetts to this fact also, that in 1918 the fees received were $1,961,704.32, in 1919 they were $2,400,071.77, and in 1920 they were $2,658,948. Increasing the personnel a few employees and increasing the appropriation a few thousand dollars resulted in bringing into the Treasury of the United States hundreds of thousands of dollars through that office. [Applause.] Let gentlemen be fair in their statements.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of gentlemen to this fact, that the increase in the charge for copies, which the gentleman states amounted to $112,000, was made to take care of the increases to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] refers, and therefore can not be counted as an increase which will take care of these proposed increases in salary.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I did not mean to say that they will take care of these increases, but certainly the approximately $500,000 which will result from the increases in the business of the Patent Office will be more than sufficient to provide for these increases here.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PERKINS. Supplementing the last statement, the total receipts from the Patent Office for 1921 were $2,775,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, with respect to these figures as to appropriations and increased personnel in the Patent Office, according to the figures furnished by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] there was an increase in personnel of about 9 per cent, while during the same time, according to the actual figures which we have here, there was an increase in business of nearly 50 per cent in the number of applications actually filed. Consequently it will be seen that a 9 per cent increase of personnel, with the corresponding increase in appropriations, attempted to take care of this enormous increase in business, but it was unable to take care of it, and the result is that, as has already been stated, the Patent Office is now 66,000 applications in arrears. That does not simply mean that many pending, but there are that many applications that have been filed that are awaiting any action whatever.

During the last year there were 87,000 applications for patents, whereas in 1917, before this increase was made that was referred to, the number of applications was about 16,000 less. The result is that the whole Patent Office is falling down in its work, and necessarily so. In all the proof that has been introduced before the Committee on Patents and in all the communications we have received nobody has claimed that the Patent Office is not doing the best it can. Nobody claims that it is not rendering as efficient service as it is able to render; but right on that point, any man knows that a new, inexperienced examiner can not transact as much business and can not perform his duties as efficiently as he can after he becomes experienced.

Patent examiners have been and are resigning at the rate of about 25 per cent annually, and it naturally happens that they are practically all experienced examiners who resign. They are the ones who are taken out into private business at largely increased salaries. The result is that the patent examining force is largely made up of inexperienced men, and it is growing worse. There are 20 places now filled by temporary appointments because they can not get a sufficient number of even new men who can qualify to fill the places.

Mr. TILSON. Can the gentleman speak as to the injury that is done by examiners making mistakes?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes; I was coming to that. The Government does not guarantee a patent. The Government does not guarantee that the owner of a patent has exclusive rights. All that the Government purports to do is to have an examination made, and if they do not discover any patent in conflict with the application and if the invention is otherwise patentable, a patent is issued. If an examiner makes a mistake and issues a patent to a man not entitled to it for the reason that some one has already obtained a patent on the same invention, the owner of the patent may go to a large expense in manufacturing it and putting it on the market before he finds out that he has infringed on a previous patent. Consequently, not only ought we to have the business transacted expeditiously but it should be transacted accurately, and those making applications for patents and paying therefor are entitled to that service. [Applause.]

You gain some conception of the labor and skill required in making a proper search in order to determine whether an invention has been previously patented when you are reminded that our Patent Office has issued millions of patents.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the words "who shall be skilled in patent matters" and insert "who shall be qualified to act as principal examiner."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the language I propose is language carried in the Nolan bill two years ago, and is the language carried in the appropriation bill making appropriations for chief clerk since 1908. It is appropriate language for a chief clerk and means something, while the language in the bill "skilled in patent matters" means what the officials choose to call it.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that these patent attorneys and scientists who drafted the bill do not know better what language should be employed than the Committee on Patents?

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman has eased his mind, as the question does not call for an answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 2, lines 9 and 10, after the words "trade-marks," strike out the words "and designs."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it was intended two years ago to create a division of trade-marks and designs. That language was carried in the bill two years ago. Since that time there is a Division of Trade-marks and also the Division of Designs, and while the other examiners may be assigned to either division, the chief examiner ought to be only an examiner of trade-marks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the third paragraph of the act of January 12, 1895 (ch. 23, sec. 73, 28 Stat. L., p. 619), as amended, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Third. The Official Gazette of the United States Patent Office in numbers sufficient to supply all who shall subscribe therefor at $5 per annum; also for exchange for other scientific publications desirable for the use of the Patent Office; also to supply 1 copy to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress; also to supply 1 copy to eight such public libraries having over 1,000 volumes, exclusive of Government publications, as shall be designated by each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, with 100 additional copies, together with weekly, monthly, and annual indexes for all the same; of the Official Gazette the 'usual number' shall not be printed."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking what change is made in this section of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the only change from existing law occurs on page 6, in line 6, in which the word "weekly" is inserted, which simply permits the issuance of those copies weekly as well as monthly and annually.

Mr. WALSH. Weekly indexes?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes. The only change in existing law is the insertion of the word "weekly."

Mr. WALSH. Why is it necessary to include that word, if the indexes have not been so issued heretofore?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I do not recall the reasons given by the Commissioner of Patents, but I think there is a demand for this, and they are paid for when issued. They are issued to those who call for them at specified prices.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give us his interpretation of what is meant by the language "with 100 additional copies"? Is it meant that each Representative shall have at his disposal 100 additional copies? What is the purpose of that language? At the present time, as I understand it, we are not privileged to designate any copies of the Official Gazette to any library in the District.

Mr. WALSH. That means 100 additional copies after these others are taken care of.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking information as to what is meant by the language "with 100 additional copies." The language is rather ambiguous as I read it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That is in the existing law. The only change in the existing law in this section is the insertion of the word "weekly" in line 6.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose the 100 additional copies is the number of copies to be issued after these distributions and subscriptions have been taken care of.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I think they exchange them with other countries and I think they furnish them to certain libraries.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, let us read the language—also to supply one copy to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress; also to supply one copy to eight such public libraries having over 1,000 volumes, exclusive of Government publications, as shall be designated by each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, with 100 additional copies.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman must read the first part of the first sentence:

Third. The Official Gazette of the United States Patent Office in numbers sufficient to supply all who shall subscribe therefor at $5 per annum.

That is a paragraph in section 73, and I assume it will be necessary to refer to the first part of section 73 in order to get just what is meant by that language.

Mr. STAFFORD. To me it does not give clear intendment as to its purpose.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is surrounded by members of the committee who are familiar with the law.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I think they found from experience that that covers about the number of additional copies they have applications for, and they sell them.

Mr. MANN. This provides that the Gazette shall be printed in sufficient numbers to supply those who subscribe for them, to furnish each Member of Congress with a copy, to furnish 8 copies to the libraries in congressional districts and 100 additional copies. That is all it says.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the punctuation and the phraseology do not give that intendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That means just 100 extra copies, not counting those who subscribe for them by the year.

Mr. MANN. There is 100 copies for the office.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not say so.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 4883 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4883. All patents shall be issued in the name of the United States of America, under the seal of the Patent Office, and shall either be signed by the Commissioner of Patents or have his name printed thereon and attested by an Assistant Commissioner of Patents or by one of the law examiners duly designated by the commissioner, and shall be recorded, together with the specifications, in the Patent Office in books to be kept for that purpose."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inquiring about the change in existing law in this section.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, beginning on line 14, after the word "patents," and extending through the balance of the paragraph—in other words, the present law simply authorizes the patents to be signed by the Commissioner of Patents, and it had become such a very burdensome duty, involving so very much time, that upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Patents this additional language was added in order that these specified officials, when duly designated by the commissioner, might attest the patents when the commissioner's name was printed thereon.

Mr. WALSH. This permits the patents to be signed by these other officials?

Mr. NOLAN. It permits the attesting of the signature of the Commissioner of Patents by one of the assistant commissioners.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Instead of signing it in longhand it permits his name to be engraved and attested by these officials when duly designated to do so by him.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 4898 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4898. Every patent or any interest therein shall be assignable in law by an instrument in writing, and the patentee or his assigns or legal representatives may in like manner grant and convey an exclusive right under his patent to the whole or any specified part of the United States. An assignment, grant, or conveyance shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for a valuable consideration without notice, unless it is recorded in the Patent Office within three months from the date thereof or prior to such subsequent purchase or mortgage.

"If any such assignment, grant, or conveyance of any patent shall be acknowledged before any notary public of the several States or Territories or the District of Columbia, or any commissioner of any court of the United States for any district or Territory, or before any secretary or legation or consular officer authorized to administer oaths or perform notarial acts under section 1750 of the Revised Statutes, the certificate of such acknowledgment, under the hand and official seal of such notary or other officer, shall be prima facie evidence of the execution of such assignment, grant, or conveyance."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman state briefly what the change is in existing law?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The only change in existing law occurs in lines 9 and 10 on page 7. The existing law reads "or any commissioner of the United States circuit court," and this is changed so as to substitute in lieu of the words "United States circuit court" the words "any court of the United States for any district or Territory."

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 4906 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4906. The clerk of any court of the United States, for any District or Territory wherein testimony is to be taken for use in any contested case pending in the Patent Office, shall, upon the application of any party thereto, or of his agent or attorney, issue a subpœna for any witness residing or being within such District or Territory, commanding him to appear and testify before any officer in such District or Territory authorized to take depositions and affidavits at any time and place in the subpœna stated. But no witness shall be required to attend at any place more than 40 miles from the place where the subpœna is served upon him; and the provisions of section 869 of the Revised Statutes relating to the issuance of subpœnas duces tecum shall apply to contested cases in the Patent Office."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman state briefly the change in this section?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes, sir. The change occurs in the addition of the language beginning with the word "and" on page 8, line 4, and then the language in lines 5, 6, and 7. That language does not appear in the existing law.

If the gentleman will yield further, I wish to state that in my reply to the gentleman's question as to the preceding section I inadvertently overlooked one other change, and that is that on page 7, line 5, there is added to the existing law the words "or prior to such subsequent purchase or mortgage."

Mr. WALSH. Now, can the gentleman state what the provisions of 869 are relative to the issuance of subpœnas? What are these provisions that are made applicable to a contested case in the Patent Office relative to subpœna?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Without looking it up, I will state that it gives the detailed manner in which subpœnas duces tecum shall be issued, and this language was added upon the recommendation of the patent committee of the national research council.

Mr. WALSH. I understand this entire measure is the product of their recommendation?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Part of it.

Mr. WALSH. There is nothing in the report. The report stopped with the salary feature. Here is a change of existing law in reference to the issuance, and, I assume, the service, of subpœnas, and making section 869 applicable to contested cases in the Patent Office.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Is that intended to facilitate action?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I think it is to make it conform to the general practice.

Mr. WALSH. They have not been conforming to the general practice, apparently, heretofore. They have not been acting under this section. Nobody knows what it is, but I would like to know if the committee gave any consideration to this matter at all, or had any hearings which would disclose what the provisions of this section are?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. It just provides this, that under the former law the subpœna could be issued for a party. They did not require the party to bring certain documents with him, but this provides the subpœna duces tecum may be issued, which will direct the party to bring certain documents or instruments connected with the inquiry with him.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Or, in other words, under the present law there is no power now to issue a subpœna duces tecum, and this gives that power.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman for the information. It ought to be in the RECORD in connection with this particular section of the bill. I withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 4921 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4921. The several courts vested with jurisdiction of cases arising under the patent laws shall have power to grant injunctions according to the course and principles of courts of equity, to prevent the violation of any right secured by patent, on such terms as the court may deem reasonable; and upon a decree being rendered in any such case for an infringement the complainant shall be entitled to recover, in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the defendant, the damages the complainant has sustained thereby, and the court shall assess the same or cause the same to be assessed under its direction. If on the proofs it shall appear that the complainant has suffered damage from the infringement or that the defendant has realized profits therefrom to which the complainant is justly entitled, but that such damages or profits are not susceptible of calculation and determination with reasonable certainty, the court may, on evidence tending to establish the same, in its discretion, receive opinion of expert testimony, which is hereby declared to be competent and admissible, subject to the general rules of evidence applicable to this character of testimony; and upon such evidence and all other evidence in the record the court may adjudge and decree the payment by the defendant to the complainant of a reasonable sum as profits or general damages for the infringement: Provided, That this provision shall not affect pending litigation. And the court shall have the same power to increase such damages, in its discretion, as is given to increase the damages found by verdicts in actions in the nature of actions of trespass upon the case; but in any suit or action brought for the infringement of any patent there shall be no recovery of profits or damages for any infringement committed more than six years before the filing of the bill of complaint or the issuing of the writ in such suit or action, and this provision shall apply to existing causes of action. And it shall be the duty of the clerks of such courts within one month after the filing of any action, suit, or proceeding arising under the patent laws to give notice thereof in writing to the Commissioner of Patents, setting forth in order so far as known the names and addresses of the litigants, names of the inventors, and the designating number or numbers of the patent or patents upon which the action, suit, or proceeding has been brought, and in the event any other patent or patents be subsequently included in the action, suit, or proceeding by amendment, answer, cross bill, or other pleading, the clerk shall give like notice thereof to the Commissioner of Patents, and within one month after the decision is rendered or a decree issued the clerk of the court shall give notice thereof to the Commissioner of Patents, and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents on receipt of such notice forthwith to indorse the same upon the file wrapper of the said patent or patents and to incorporate the same as a part of the contents of said file or file wrapper; and for each notice required to be furnished to the Commissioner of Patents in compliance herewith a fee of 50 cents shall be taxed by the clerk as costs of suit."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman state briefly what the change in existing law is under this section?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The change consists of the insertion of the language beginning on page 8, line 20, after the word "If," and concludes on page 9, line 10, with the word "litigation." The remainder of the section is just as it is in existing law.

Mr. WALSH. Now, what was the reason or the emergency that persuaded the committee to accept this language?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It very frequently occurred that a patent had been infringed and damages sustained, but that it was impossible to go into court and prove with any mathematical accuracy what the damages were. For instance, a patent is granted upon a feature of a piano. Some other manufacturer of pianos incorporates that patented device in his piano and proceeds, perhaps for an indefinite period of time, to manufacture and sell that piano with this infringed device as a feature. When the owner of the patent goes into the court and undertakes to recover damages or royalty for this infringement, of course it is utterly impossible for him to prove with any degree of mathematical accuracy what the value of the sale of this device bears to the sale price of the piano. This permits him in a case of that kind to introduce expert testimony and arrive at the value.

Mr. NOLAN. That was indorsed by a number of the circuit judges.

Mr. DAVIS. A large number of Federal judges.

Mr. WALSH. It probably has some merit.

Will the gentleman state about section 5, line 14, where it says the Commissioner of Patents may have his name printed thereon? Now, that would mean that these people could attest printed names; they could be stamped on there with a rubber stamp. Should it not provide that he could have his signature engraved thereon, and let that be attested?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I see no objection to that, but I will state this to the gentleman, that in order to provide against any abuse of that privilege we provide that only those few named officials who are duly and specifically designated shall exercise it, and furthermore that a record shall be kept in a book provided for the purpose of all patents where they have been authorized to sign.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but an official might be designated to sign one document, and the signature might be printed on it, and people might procure the printing of that name on other documents, and there might be an abuse.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If it were engraved the only objection would be a question of expense.

Mr. WALSH. If it is a profit-making and profit-sharing institution the expense ought not to stand in the way of making secure these documents when issued, so that there can be no doubt, when the commissioner's signature is engraved on a patent, that there is assurance that it is official and authentic. I suggest that to the committee, and I believe it would be a better practice.

Mr. NOLAN. Later on we may take it up and get some language to take care of it.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman from California, and in view of his suggestion I will withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 4934 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4934. The following shall be the rates for patent fees:

"On filing each original application for a patent, except in design cases, $20.

"On issuing each original patent, except in design cases, $20.

"In design cases: For 3 years and 6 months, $10; for 7 years, $15; for 14 years, $30.

"On every application for the reissue of a patent, $30.

"On filing each disclaimer, $10.

"On an appeal for the first time from the primary examiners to the examiners in chief, $10.

"On every appeal from the examiners in chief to the commissioner, $20.

"For uncertified printed copies of specifications and drawings of patents, 10 cents per copy: Provided, That the Commissioner of Patents may supply public libraries of the United States with such copies as published for $50 per annum: Provided further, That the Commissioner of Patents may exchange copies of United States patents for those of foreign countries.

"For copies of records made by the Patent Office, excluding printed copies, 10 cents per hundred words.

"For each certificate, 25 cents.

"For recording every assignment, agreement, power of attorney, or other paper of 300 words or under, $1; of over 300 words and under 1,000 words, $2; and for each additional thousand words or fraction thereof, $1; for each additional patent or application included or involved in one writing, where more than one is so included or involved, 25 cents additional.

"For copies of drawings, the reasonable cost of making them."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: On page 10, line 21, after the word "cases," strike out "$20" and insert in lieu thereof "$15."

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I tried to get a few minutes under general debate. Now, I want to get in this way.

I have no interest in the political side of this proposition nor in the personnel of the office. I am interested in the $5 proposition, and I know several hundred men in my home city who would get $5 or more each day if this bill would assist in putting over a certain patent. That part of it I am interested in. The factory in which those men are employed is quiet to-day because they can not assure the men who have the money to invest that a certain machine is patentable, and without the capital they can not operate that factory.

I filed affidavits as to the number of men they would employ, and tried to get preferred action on this patent, and I understood yesterday from the officials of the Patent Office that perhaps in nine months they might reach it, but that the number of applications in the Patent Office could not be cleaned up in the ordinary course of events in less than three or four years. Now, I am interested in that part of it, and I hope that if this bill will bring more efficiency to the department, as the committee think it will, it will pass this House. Therefore I simply want to raise my voice in favor of this bill if it will hasten action and increase the efficiency of the Patent Office. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, from the votes that have been taken on the amendments to-day I judge that this bill is likely to pass. I congratulate the gentlemen who have been behind the propaganda which will put it over. They have done a great job. Since I last spoke 42 additional telegrams have come to my office. [Laughter.] I will guarantee there are not 2 out of the 42 signers of those telegrams who know of any really good reason why these salaries should be what they are or who are really insistent that these salaries be paid.

I recall that just a few days ago in the discharge of my duties I arranged to have a general reclassification bill brought before the House. It came before the House in the form in which the committee after due deliberation had reported it. Not only was there criticism on the floor with regard to it, but gentlemen came to my office and met me in the lobby and wanted to know why that kind of a bill was presented to the House, why in these days when we are preaching economy it was proposed to increase the cost of the public service, as they understood it would be increased by this bill. Gentlemen who have been supporting this bill to-day claimed that that bill as originally presented would have increased the cost of the public service $20,000,000, and one of them said $40,000,000 per annum. I do not know but what one gentleman in his exuberance went still further.

Now, if it is true that the reclassification bill as originally presented would have increased the cost of the public service $10,000,000, this bill, if applied to all the public service, would certainly increase its cost $50,000,000, and that is a very conservative statement. Yet gentlemen who insisted on having that general bill reduced, and who were not very good-natured, some of them, in the way they talked about it on the floor and elsewhere are now supporting this bill, which adds more to the pay of individuals in the public service than ever has been added to individual pay at one time in all the history of the Government, so far as I recall. They support this bill with enthusiasm. Well, gentlemen may believe that they are justified, but I hope if they do so feel they will be a little more reasonable in the future when measures are brought here that are believed to be conceived with some notion of governmental economy. It may be that here is a service that ought to be raised 50 per cent above all the other Government services, but I do not believe it and I can not understand how any other gentleman can in his heart believe it. But the pressure is strong and the bill undoubtedly will pass, but not to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am strongly in favor of passing H. R. 7077 as unanimously reported by the House Committee on Patents.

I would be in favor of this bill even if the additional salaries and other expenses were charged directly to the taxpayer, but when I find that instead of being paid by the already overburdened taxpayer the increases are paid entirely out of the increase of fees provided by the bill, I can see no reason whatever for any opposition to the bill, and when I learn from the printed report of the Committee on Patents that after all the increases are paid for there will be an annual surplus of almost $300,000 per year, I am enthusiastically for the bill.

Our American patent system is a feature of our Government distinctly and wholly American. As the New York Tribune said in its leading editorial of December 1, 1921:

America is America largely because of its inventions.

The Tribune goes on to state that many important business and industrial enterprises depend directly upon patents and that unless the patents are granted operations can not be begun, with the result that the factories are compelled to wait from six to eight months or longer for an official action concerning whether or not the invention is to be patented.

The New York Times in its editorial of December 17, 1921, said:

Inventions are the main builders of American manufactures. Nine-tenths of our industries have sprung from patents. They are the great makers of employment, the creators of new channels for labor. They have doubly helped the farmer by providing him with improved implements and machinery and by enlarging vastly the markets for his products.

After setting forth the needs of the Patent Office for a whole column on its editorial page, the New York Times asks:

How long will it take to hammer into the head of Congress that larger salaries must be paid to the Patent Office examiners. * * * If the work of the Patent Office is to go on; if it is to retain the comparatively few veterans it still has; if it is to be able to fill vacancies, Congress must provide better pay. The House bill for that purpose is much too modest, even though by raising fees it avoids tapping the taxpayer's pocketbook.

The New York Globe, of December 2, 1921, says:

Hundreds of millions of dollars and the encouragement of progressive ideas are involved in the decline of efficiency forced upon the Patent Office by congressional false economy.

The New York Herald, of December 5, 1921, says:

Clogging the Patent Office means clogging American industry, which rests largely on American invention. * * * The remedy is by Congress raising the salaries of examiners and assistant examiners. * * * This is a Nation of inventors. Our American system was the best on earth; it is on the way to be the poorest. The disintegration should be checked at once.

The Duluth Herald, of December 5, 1921, urges larger salaries for the Patent Office, and says:

Inventors eat their hearts out in costly suspense and the country waits, unknowingly but nevertheless at a loss, for whatever good to it there may be in these many inventions. * * * The policy that suffers this condition to continue is as stupid, as unintelligent, and as costly as it is to hire five clerks to do what one clerk could do easily. * * *

The Boston Post, of December 13, 1921, says:

Let's have no false economy of the kind that has been going on in the Patent Office for years.

The Joliet (Ill.) Herald News, of November 25, 1921, says:

The breakdown [of the Patent Office] has a bearing on industry. There are many complaints of delay in the handling of patent applications from all parts of the country, and manufacturing activity which would be stimulated by the production of new inventions is checked.

The Minneapolis Tribune, of December 1, 1921, characterizes conditions in the Patent Office as disgraceful.

The Minneapolis Tribune, of December 6, 1921, says that the bill for increasing the pay of the Patent Office examiners should be expedited.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer of December 14, 1921, quotes Secretary Fall as saying—that the Patent Office has more business than it can attend to—

And that—

Cleveland, as an industrial city, is much interested in seeing the Patent Office conditions corrected.

The Clarksburg (W. Va.) Telegram of December 12, 1921, states that—

The Patent Office is closely allied with the progress of industry in this Nation of inventors, and it is highly desirable that this department of the Government be made to function properly and usefully.

Mr. Chairman, I think that we have never had a bill brought before this House for increasing salaries which has had so much justification, both as a matter of right and logic, and which is so universally supported by the press of the country. The only regret I have in connection with the bill is that, as the New York Times puts it, "the bill is much too modest." It should provide still higher salaries and many more employees. The chairman of the Patent Committee shows that patent applications have increased from 57,000 in 1918 to 87,000 in 1921, or 52 per cent. During the same time trade-marks, so essential to commerce, have increased from 6,846 per year to 16,240, or 137 per cent. The fees taken in by the Patent Office were $1,977,000 in 1918 and more than $2,750,000 in 1921, an increase of $800,000, or over 40 per cent, while the personnel has increased only 5½ per cent and the salaries not at all. With this staggering amount of work before it, and with the trained examiners resigning every month, the Patent Office is at the parting of the ways.

I earnestly support the bill and urge is passage.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. LAMPERT. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. LONGWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7077) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, had instructed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LAMPERT. I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to the final passage.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. NOLAN. I demand a separate vote on the Stafford amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts withdraw the point of no quorum?

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will withhold it a minute.

Mr. WALSH. I understand there is an important appropriation bill to be reported, and I will withhold the point temporarily.

Mr. LAMPERT. I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to the final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to report the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, will that deprive me of my right to demand a separate vote on the Stafford amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SLEMP, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 558), which was read the first and second time and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARNER reserved all points of order.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. OLIVER, for two days, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. FIELDS, for to-day, on account of illness.

To Mr. STEVENSON, for to-day, on account of illness.

CLARENCE B. MILLER.

Mr. LARSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a very brief announcement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am grieved to announce the untimely and unexpected death of the Hon. Clarence B. Miller, who died at St. Paul yesterday afternoon. Mr. Miller was for 10 years a Member of this House. He served in the Sixty-first, Sixty-second, Sixty-third, Sixty fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses. He represented with distinction the eighth congressional district of Minnesota, which I now have the honor to represent. He served his country faithfully and well. He always took an active and leading part in the proceedings of this House. He was a ready debater and a brilliant, convincing, and eloquent orator. After his retirement from this House he became the secretary of the Republican national committee, which position he held at the time of his death. He had real genius for political organization and management. All who had the good fortune to be acquainted with him grieve his passing away.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. VOLK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on House resolution 258 and House resolution 259.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, what are those resolutions?

Mr. VOLK. They call for an investigation of the narcotic question in the United States.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 12, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

464. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report as to rent received from properties located on sites of proposed public buildings purchased by the United States Government in Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

465. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, showing the withdrawal and restorations made during the year ending November 30, 1921; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

466. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation for the Post Office Department, for personal or property damage claims for the fiscal year 1923, in the amount of $35,000, supplementing the budget estimates (H. Doc. No. 151); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. MAPES, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) to amend Senate joint resolution 89, approved March 14, 1912, amending the joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal and other material used in war from any seaport of the United States, approved April 22, 1898, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 557), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.
